For the first time, the Saharans in the Tinduf camps have medical care, in the form of three hospitals and several outpatient clinics, in a bid to erase the consequences of malnutrition and, in many cases, treks through the desert that have left indelible marks on the exiles. Attempts are also being made to practice preventive medicine so as to improve the population's general state of health and eradicate endemic diseases, such as tuberculosis, and to raise the birth rate, which means that particular care is accorded to mothers and children. Hence, the best equipped services are pediatrics, gynecology and obstetrics.

Another leading concern has been the startup of a school system. The first objective is to teach the entire population to read and write. Though not achieving results as spectacular as the Cubans and Nicaraguans have (we have to bear in mind that war is still the most immediate reality for the Saharan people), the Polisario Front has seen to it that 70 percent of the population can read and write in 1981.

Schools offer not only instruction; they also inculcate in children the values of the new Saharan nation: discipline, dedication and love for the Saharan homeland. This is the way to overcome the tribal mentality that many of the refugees brought with them and to create a society so compact that it does not permit the slightest dissent.

Winning the war and creating a nation, the objectives of the Polisario Front, mean that civilian life has to be organized in a paramilitary fashion. Discipline and the involvement of all in camp activities are considered essential.

The camp constitutes the framework for the lives of the refugee population. In addition to meeting the needs of daily life, the Front tries to organize the return home or rather, the hope of a return. A camp resident must not only take part in the organization of daily life; he must also get involved in the battle against nostalgia, against flagging spirits, against despair. He must believe in what he does every day, knowing that he is thus helping to win a war that is going to drag on for a long time yet.

Civilian life is a function of the war. As a representative of the Polisario says: "The battle is also being fought in the camps, not with guns but with daily work, not against the Moroccans but against despondency." In this battle the soldiers have been replaced by the women.

In the camps (where there are few men because most of them are waging war in the desert), the women, organized in the Union of Polisario Front Women, are in charge of organizing supplies, foodstuffs, handicraft work and the production of clothing and household utensils. They work in the health care centers and schools, taking the place of the fighting men. Moreover, of course, they have ceased obeying the orders of fathers or husbands, thus shattering a deeply rooted tradition. Their relationships with men are increasingly as between equals, parallel to their growing involvement in every facet of Saharan life, even the war. All young women receive military training, and many of them have already been at the "front."

At age 14, when schooling is completed, all men and women enroll in the Polisario Front's Liberation Army. But they are not enough. Many more than the 12,000 soldiers that the Saharan Army now has, in round numbers, will be needed to decide the outcome of the war.

The Polisario's strategy so far has been based on the mobility of the nomads and the surprise factor. Barreling down at an enemy position in a jeep going 100 kilometers an hour is a way to pin the Moroccans down and prevent them from controlling the territory. Dislodging them from their bases is an undertaking that requires additional equipment.

From 1980 to 1981 it looked like the Polisario could give the war a new twist. The first battle that took place in the southern part of Morocco, in the Ouarkzik, in the spring of 1980, resulted in major losses for Hassan's army and in the capture of considerable spoils (SK-105 battle tanks, French and South African AML-90 tanks, rifles, guns, vehicles...), enough, as a Polisario leader said, "to outfit an entire army," the Polisario army, of course, which asserts that its best supplier of weapons is the Moroccan Army.

Two months after the first battle, the Polisario Front attacked again, with superior forces, but this time it had to retreat in the face of a considerably bolstered Moroccan military machine. Since then, combat has been reduced to harassment activities: ambush and sabotage, whose short-term effectiveness is very limited.

The Polisario Front controls 80 or 90 percent of the territory, but this enormous stretch of land is really little more than a rear guard from which attacks can be organized and in which war materiel can be stored and troops trained.

In order to dislodge the Moroccan troops from the zones they occupy, the Polisario Front would have to shift from a guerrilla to a conventional war, and it has neither the manpower nor the weapons to do this.

But neither does Morocco have the means to control the entire Western Sahara. Its retreat to the "useful triangle" resolves nothing either, inasmuch as the Polisario Front wants to expel the Moroccans completely from the territory.

Thus, militarily speaking, the continuation of the war hinges on the aid that the two foes receive. Meanwhile, the Polisario Front's standing in the diplomatic field is growing stronger with each day. At present, more than 40 countries recognize the SDAR, and the imminence of an OAU resolution denouncing Morocco has forced King Hassan to agree to a referendum.

It has taken 6 years of war to achieve this result, which, in principle, brings the Polisario Front and Morocco closer together. There is a long way to go yet, however, before an agreement is reached on the conditions for the referendum.

In the meantime, there is the problem of population statistics. The 1974 Spanish census recorded a total of 70,000 inhabitants (this is the number that Morocco uses), whereas the Polisario says that there are a half million Saharans, an enormous discrepancy.

The Polisario is demanding that the exiled Saharans, including the more than 100 000 living in the Tinduf camps, be allowed to return to their homeland for the referendum. It is also calling for the withdrawal of Moroccan troops from the occupied lands in the Western Sahara, so that the Saharans who remained there can freely express their will, as well as the departure of Moroccan settlers, to whom the Rabat government portrayed the Western Sahara as a new promised land.

It seems unlikely that Morocco and the Polisario Front will come to terms when the time comes to determine the conditions for holding the referendum. Until Morocco agrees to sit down at the bargaining table with the Polisario Front, war will continue to ravage the Western Sahara and a people will have to endure exile.

RETURN OF EXILED OFFICIALS--Northern Yemen has lately been going through a period it has been waiting for for several years. Several leaders who had great political power have begun to return to the country in response to an appeal made by Yemeni President 'Ali 'Abdallah Salih. Among those who have returned so far are Judge 'Abd-al-Rahman al-Aryani, who had been living in Latakia since he decided to go into exile 6 years ago, and Field Marshal 'Abdallah al-Sallal, who had been living in Alexandria. But other Yemeni political figures are still living in exile and have not yet decided to return. Among these are Mr Ahmad Muhammad Nu'man, a former member of the Republican Assembly, who is living in Cairo with his grandchildren from the late Muhammad Nu'man, who was assassinated in Beirut and who was formerly minister of foreign affairs. The return of certain political leaders is being mentioned while the confrontation between the regime and certain tribal leaders continues. By far the most important of these tribes is the Bakil tribe whose leader is said to have fled to southern Yemen last week. [Text] [Paris AL-MUSTAQBAL in Arabic No 243, 17 Oct 81 p 20] 9123

ROMANIA, PLO REPORTEDLY HELD SECRET CONTACTS

TA031220 Tel Aviv MA'ARIV in Hebrew 3 Nov 81 p 7

[Report by 'Oded Granot]

[Text] Secret contacts have recently been held between Romania and the PLO as part of a new Romanian initiative aimed at persuading the terrorists to allow Palestinian representatives to participate in the autonomy talks. This has been reported by Arab sources.

The report, which has so far not been confirmed by other sources, which appeared in the Kuwaiti weekly AR-RA'Y AL-'AMM, reports that a few days ago Romanian President Nicolae Ceausescu met with the chairman of the "Palestinian National Council," Khalid (Fahum). Ceausescu reportedly tried to persuade him to have the [word indistinct] allow Judaea, Samaria and Gaza Strip mayors participate in the autonomy talks being conducted between Egypt, Israel and the United States.

Basing its report on information from Palestinian sources, the weekly reported that the Romanian leader has made it clear that in his view there is a chance that the autonomy talks might develop into a framework of an independent Palestinian state and it would therefore be important to incorporate Palestinians from the territories, identified as PLO supporters, in those talks.

The Romanian leader has "been very active" in holding meetings with Palestinian leaders visiting Romania.

Meanwhile, the Palestinian sources cited in the Kuwaiti weekly are reported to have said that Bucharest had encouraged the PLO to simultaneously support Saudi Crown Prince Fahd's plan for an arrangement in the Middle East claiming that the terrorists' support for the plan would pave the road for "a U.S.-Palestinian dialogue." Thus the number of countries that have granted the terrorist organizations diplomatic recognition would also increase.

The sources did not mention Khalid (Fahum's) reaction to President Ceausescu's suggestion, nor did they say whether the Romanian initiative was part of a political process that had been coordinated with other countries.

GUIDANCE MINISTER COMPLAINS OF WESTERN MEDIA

Tehran TEHRAN TIMES in English 26 Oct 81 p 1, 3

[Text] TEHRAN, (Pars) - In the wake of recent propaganda attacks on the Islamic Republic of Iran the minister of Islamic Guidance, Hojjatoleslam Abodolmajid Ma'adikhah, addressed a letter to the information ministers of the member-states of the Non-Aligned Movement in order to expose the specious nature of these attacks. At the same time Minister Ma'adikhah enclosed a list of terrorist incidents by counterrevolutionaries in Iran generally not known outside of Iran in order to futher substantiate the biased nature of news imperialism.

"In the Name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful.

"Your eminence:

"As you know the Islamic Revolution of Iran has triumphed as a divine revolution by priority to spirituality and attempting to return man to his God-given identity and origin....

"This revolution according to its divine essence and on the basis of the guidance of its eternal book, the Qoran, has constantly maintained the highest values for mankind to such an extent that it considers killing an innocent man equivalent to killing all the people of the world.

It is precisely at this point that the roots of the present confrontations and difficulties of this revolution have to be sought in its God-given and humane essence as opposed to the ungodly and inhumane character of its principal enemy, the United States and its allies.

"The greatest danger that imperialism has been faced with as a result of the Islamic Revolution is not the fact that it has lost its interests in the Iranian oil resources or has been prevented from destroying industry or agriculture in Iran, or even that its foreign advisers have been expelled, but is rather the fact that the revolution has presented the world with a set of sublime and pure values for liberating mankind from oppression. It is precisely for this reason that imperialism is making every efforts to distort and present an unreal image of this revolution and has thus embarked on its most extensive international plots through rumourmongers and the Zionist news agencies, by distorting the news and disseminating falsehoods.

Recently this plot has focused on distorting the truth about our people's just confrontation with the internal agents of great satan, the corrupt and terrorists.

"Compared to the Islamic Revolution of Iran, few revolutions in the world have been so benevolent and forgiving towards their enemies...

"In few revolutions have the counterrevolutionaries so ferociously and savagely assassinated innocent people in the streets and public forum, great scholars and representatives of the people. Even infants are not spared from their cruelty. We believe that all this brutality and savagery of the internal and external enemies of this revolution are due to the fact that the continuation of this revolution endangers the entire existance of the world's super criminals.

Considering the great responsibility that we feel, these actions do not frighten us and, being aware of our enemy's anti-humanitarian nature, we do not expect anything else.

"We are certain that you are not unaware of the fabricated nature of the news and propaganda system of international imperialism under American leadership and the philosophy behind it. Have you taken steps to expose it?

"Have you thought of any solution to save the oppressed countries from the domination of the Western mass media that attempt to repress the facts about authentic revolutions according to imperialism's whims? In that case inform us as well, so that we may support and accompany you.

"Do you not believe that the Iranian revolution in spite of the greatness of its dimensions has had the lowest number of counterrevolutionaries executed in spite of which it has been the target of the most extensive and at the same time, the most ugly slanders? The imperialistic mass media had spread the greatest and most unprecedented propaganda on an international level in the manner of a sympathetic nanny. If this is your belief what have you done to clarify the truth?

"God Almighty, the oppressed people whose liberation from the most complicated forms of slavery, we seek and future history which is unfolding of at astonishing rate, shall be the witnesses of our actions and the just judges. 9

ISLAM WOULD RULE ENTIRE WORLD SHOULD MOSLEMS 'RISE EN MASSE'

Tehran TEHRAN TIMES in English 25 Oct 81 p 1

[Commentary by Seyyed Hoseyn Musavian: "Why Only Iran?"]

[Text]

ONE of the most valuable lessons we learned in the course of Hajj rituals in our meetings with people of all nationalities and politico-religious personalities from different countries was that "now people expect everything from Iran alone!!"

It would appear that today all the world's Moslems expect Iran to fight back all conspiracies of Eastern and Western imperialists, to topple the US and USSR with all their satanic power, to win the imposed war and to do away with Saddam's regime, to establish radio stations in all languages and to . . . . In short, I must say that the world's Moslems expect Islamic Iran to revenge all exploitative and treacherous acts done to the oppressed throughout history.

What is to be said is that the Moslem nation of Iran has risen for the oblitration of tyranny throughout the world and will not seize its struggle until a global Islamic government is established.

To topple the ex-shah, the symbol of American dictatorship, the Iranians dedicated over 70,000 martyrs and 100,000 crippled fighters and after his toppling when the time came for standing face to face with the US, they have sacrificed thousands of martyrs and crippled for the cause of Islam.

And, it has been for the first time in the history of world's revolution that both people and their leaders have been martyred for the same goal.

This nation has presented its greatest political and Islamic personalities such as Beheshti, Motahari, Rajai and Bahonar for the sake of its revolution. It has also sacrificed thousands of its children in the battlefronts and as a result of the internal conspiracies of Monafeqin (hypocrites) in order to preserve its Islamic Revolution.

Regardless of victory or defeat, this nation considers its combat and resistance as Godly duties and it will remain faithful to fulfil its commitments until the last drop of blood in the veins of such fighters.

But the question we would like to set forth before world's Moslems, is that are the Iranians the only Moslem people? Should the Jehad against infidelity (the US and Russia) and hypocricy be considered as the exclusive duty of Iranian Moslems? Are the hands of the Eastern-Western exploiters cut from the other Islamic countries? Are there now real Islamologists and successors of the Holy Prophet ruling over them? Were hundreds of the Qoranic verses regarding Jehad against disbelievers and hypocrites sent down to the Holy Prophet and the Iranian Moslems alone? Aren't there any other infidel and Monafeq in other Islamic lands?

The world's Moslems should know that though the Iranian Moslem nation is active according to Divine obligation and also has sacrificed lives and properties to this end. But the Iranian nation is just one nation while the enemies of Islam are almost all the government of the world!

It is true that the Iran's Moslem nation has taken the responsibility of leading the uprising of the world Moslems, but each leadership needs a nation and the Iranian Moslems, therefore, need all the world nations as one whole nation.

If the world's Moslems would rise to liberate themselves from the domination of the Superpowers and establish a real Islamic government, the exploiters could not then engineer all kinds of plots against Iranian Moslems. If the Superpowers were engaged in some critical situation in other lands, the Iranian nation could easily accomplish all the goals of the oppressed.

Our last word is that if all of the world's Moslems feel committed before Islam and be ready to strive and sacrifice for its goals and rise enmasse, in a day's time all the enemies of Islam such as the US, USSR, Israel and . . . would be sent to the dustbin of history and the liberating Islam will rule all-over the world.

PARTICIPATION OF CLERGY IN POLITICS EMPHASIZED

Tehran TEHRAN TIMES in English 27 Oct 81 p 1

[Commentary by Seyyed Hoseyn Musavian: "Clergy and Politics"]

[Text] An African brother once told me that the cause of all the misfortunes of the world's Moslems are their clergy, while the reason for your victory and materializing of Islam in Iran was also your clerics.

He added that through separating religion from politics, the clergy was the main factor in creating misfortunes for the Moslems around the world and that he had actually experienced it in his land.

He believed that such clergymen had left the fate of the Moslems in the hands of the Eastern-Western superpowers while they believed it sufficed to talk only on how to perform religious rituals etc.

"Iran's Islamic Revolution" he said "proved that the main elements for your victory were also your clerics. But it is not clear to us how it happened so and how are Iranian affairs are now run. He also asked us how it was possible to have so many clergymen in our Islamic Consultative Assembly and how they could decide on all those various political, administrative and governmental issues?

In reply we explained the issues to him and our other brothers should also know that:

The Iranian clergy has seriously entered the arena of Jihad and Islamic politics through its unceasing campaign against the tyrant and puppet regimes of the Superpowers in the last 100 years.

Imam Khomeini's thesis is that "our religion is our very politics and our politics is our very religion." This thesis has practically been put into practice by Seyyed Jamal Asadabadi almost hundred years ago and it has today reached a 100 percent positive result with Imam Khomeini.

The Iranian clergy have realized the practices of the Prophet of Islam (SAW) and are following in his line. Hazrat Mohammad (SAW) spent most of his time in the battlefronts against infidelity and hypocricy and for the establishment of Islamic government and the social issues of the Moslems, while paying attention to worship in Islam a primary duty.

The prophet of Islam (SAW) never sat in the mosque so that the Abu-Sofians could do whatever they wanted and let the Superpowers of East (old Iran) and West (old Rome) do as they wanted. In every day congregational prayers in the Mosque of Hazrat Mohammad (SAW) people attended prayers in well-formed lines and after that the Mujahedins of Islam were present at the Mosque in well-informed and determined lines for the Jihad (waging the Holy war in the cause of Islam.)

Anyhow, the Islamic clergy in Iran with their struggles throughout the centuries, have become experts in the Islamic content in every respect of the country's affairs. Our Parliament is formed of clergymen, economists, Socialists, mathematicians and....

And the oppressed martyr, Ayatollah Behshti, a symbol of Islamic clergy in Iran, in addition to his mastery on Islamic jurisprudence, was also in full command of the four languages, English, Arabic German and Farsi. On political affairs, he was a very knowledgeable man as well as an efficient and prudent and at the same time he was an efficient economist. No intellectual in the world could be like him.

However, Islamic clergymen should avoid looking on Islam from only one dimension and they must enter into Islamic politics in the same way that the Holy Prophet of Islam did. They must cut the hands of the Usurpers from political power and they form an Islamic government. And they must strive to become competent and efficient elements on all political and administrative affairs of the government.

Our last word is that until such time as governments are not formed by Islamic jurisprudence and policies not determined by them, any hope for implementing Islamic principles, or striving for justice and the liberation of the oppressed will be in vain.

ISLAMIC PLAN FOR ECONOMY, TRADE OUTLINED

Tehran KEYHAN in Persian 12 Oct 81 p 6

[Text] The most important goals of the nationalization of foreign trade are to secure the economic independence of the country, accelerate national economic growth, prevent the escape and plunder of capital, regulate the general level of prices, and secure revenues for the government.

The following plan for foreign and domestic national trade has been founded on the basis of the objectives and principles of an Islamic economy. In Part One, the present structure of foreign and domestic trade within and outside the country is presented. In Part Two, the principles of the organization and connections of the plan are stated. In Part Three, the difficulties and operational stages are studied. It is hoped that this plan, which is only general, will be noted by the proper authorities. What you read below has been taken from EQTESAD-E ESLAMI, No 4:

Part One

1. The nationalization of foreign trade has many objectives, the most important of which are:

A. Securing the country's economic independence.

B. Accelerating the country's economic growth.

C. Preventing foreign plunderers from transferring capital and national resources abroad.

D. Regulating the general level of prices and the just distribution of wealth.

E. Securing governmental revenues.

2. The import structure of the domestic sector consists of the following groups:

A. Importers who are familiar with foreign markets, prices, customs issues, currency and banking affairs, transportation, insurance, and the release of merchandise [from customs] and who are responsible for determining the market, kind of merchandise, prices, purchasing, transportation, and release of commodities.

B. Major merchants who, with their familiarity with the domestic market, determine the kind and amount of imported goods and commodities to be purchased and put the information at the disposal of the first group.

C. The major distributors in cities in various fields who are responsible for receiving goods from the major merchants for distribution among the retailers.

D. Small distributors or retailers, who receive the goods from the above group and sell them to the consumers.

Obviously, concerning certain goods and commodities, especially industrial and investment goods and commodities, the form of the various groups might not be complete as mentioned. In certain cases, two or even the first three groups might be combined. Occasionally, even, a consumer which is also a production or assembly unit may take over the purchase and consumption of the goods directly.

3. The structure of imports in the foreign sector usually consists of the following groups:

A. Producers who, for the most part, only produce and leave the export of their goods to other groups.

B. Export agents of the producers, which may be representatives of the producer or independent export companies.

C. Regional export agents, who are responsible for determining the sale policies, prices, and general conditions which are selected by the previous group.

D. Special export agents of each country who are given the responsibility by the previous group to negotiate, determine prices and kinds of commodities, conditions set on banking affairs, transportation, and the signing of contracts.

Obviously, in this case too, for certain goods and commodities, in accordance with the policies or resources of the producers, the first two or three groups or the last three groups might be combined and the producers might directly deal with the importer, the merchant, or the industrial or governmental consumer.

4. Noting the makeup of the groups concerned with the import affairs of the domestic and foreign sectors, one can see how high the cost to the consumer may increase. In the economy of an Islamic society, there is no room for such middlemen. Efforts must be made, as much as possible, to purchase goods directly from the producers or their authorized representatives and put them at the disposal of the ultimate consumers or their representatives.

5. The ultimate consumers of imported goods and commodities consist of the following groups:

A. Families who are the consumers of foodstuff, perishable and durable consumer goods and commodities, and hygiene and medical goods and commodities.

B. Producers who are consumers of raw materials and intermediary industrial, agricultural, animal husbandry, and construction goods.

6. The export structure in the domestic sector consists of the following groups:

A. Small dealers and middlemen who purchase agricultural, animal husbandry, handicraft industrial products and carpets from villages and small workshops.

B. Major dealers and middlemen in the cities who purchase the above-mentioned goods from the first group or directly from the producers.

C. Exporting merchants or producers of some of the consumer goods who are responsible for exporting foodstuff, animal products, handicrafts, carpets, and perishable and durable consumer goods.

Obviously, in cases concerning some goods or commodities, two or three groups may be combined.

7. The export structure in the foreign sector consists of the following groups:

A. Major Iranian or foreign importers.

B. Major distributors.

C. Retailers.

Obviously, again, in the case of some goods or commodities, such as carpets, agricultural raw materials, and animal products, two or three groups may be combined. The importer and the ultimate consumer of some industrial and agricultural raw materials may even be the same.

8. Exports are the most important channel of transferring capital abroad. The importing power of any country depends on its exporting power. If monetary resources obtained through exports do not return to the country as imports, economic poverty and stagnation will result.

9. Considering the makeup of the export groups in both the domestic and foreign sectors, one can see that the actual money received by the producer makes up a rather insignificant part of the final selling price and the major portion goes to domestic and foreign middlemen. In the economy of an Islamic society, there is no room for these middlemen. The government must receive the materials and goods directly from the producers or their representatives and, as far as possible, put them at the disposal of the ultimate consumers abroad directly. The increased share received by domestic producers will provide the necessary motivation for the production of export goods.

Part Two

10. With the establishment of "distribution and consumption cooperative companies" and "distribution and production cooperative companies" in every city, guild, and area and with the nationwide formation of "cooperative unions" in consumer and production areas, in addition to the elimination of all the different middlemen in the areas of production, distribution, and consumption, certain equipped distribution units will be created directly which will be able to determine the annual needs of their members from the standpoints of the kind and amount of goods and commodities as well as other particulars and put them at the disposal of the Ministry of Commerce.

11. In the consumer sector consisting of families which usually consume foodstuff and perishable and durable goods, the "cooperative organization of cities and villages" may carry out the duty of the distribution and consumption cooperative union nationwide. Of course, the distribution network of cities and villages must expand greatly.

12. In the production sector, every special production area must first take steps to create distribution and production cooperative units in that special field. For instance, the following unions might be named.

A cooperative union for the production and distribution of agricultural goods and products.

A cooperative union for the production and distribution of animal husbandry goods and commodities.

A cooperative union for the production and distribution of construction goods and commodities.

A cooperative union for the production and distribution of metal products and the like.

13. The major duty of these unions concerning imports is to determine the annual needs in terms of goods and commodities of all the cooperative companies which are members of the union. These estimates will be put at the disposal of the Ministry of Commerce in the form of requests for the purchase of import goods and commodities. In exports, the above-mentioned unions will purchase all the exportable goods and commodities of their member cooperative companies and submit the proposals for their sale to the Ministry of Commerce.

14. The net profit of the cooperative companies may be determined at a maximum of five percent and the net profit of cooperative unions at a maximum of two percent.

15. Specialized "import groups" and "export groups" will be formed in the Ministry of Commerce to carry out import and export duties. These groups may be formed in accordance with the classifications of the Brussels customs tarrif of goods and commodities. In certain cases, two or three parts of this classification may be combined or one part may be divided into two or three groups. All imported and exported goods and commodities may be officially classified on the basis of the Brussels customs tarrif which was ratified on 1350/3/30 [24 May 71] in 21 parts and 19 chapters, which the government of Iran also follows in regards to the regulations and statistics on its foreign trade.

The 21 main parts of the trade classification of goods and commodities of the above-mentioned customs tarrif are as follows.

Part 1. Livestock and animal products

Part 2. [Vegetable] products

Part 3. Edible fats and oils

Part 4. Food industry products

Part 5. Mineral products

Part 6. The products of chemical and related industries

Part 7. Plastic materials and related and similar goods

Part 8. Hide and leather goods and commodities

Part 9. Wooden goods and commodities and similar products

Part 10. Paper and related and similar goods and products

Part 11. Textile fibers and related goods and products

Part 12. Shoes, umbrellas, and similar goods

Part 13. Stone and cement products and similar goods and commodities

Part 14. Pearls and similar precious goods and products

Part 15. Ordinary metals and related products

Part 16. Machinery and mechanical and electrical equipment

Part 17. Vehicles and parts

Part 18. Photography and cinema goods and commodities

Part 19. Arms and ammunition

Part 20. Various miscellaneous objects and commodities (consumer)

Part 21. Art objects, collections, and antiques

The import and export groups may be formed on the basis of the above classification with regards to volume, marketing difficulties, and the amount and kind of goods and commodities.

16. The import or export groups in the Ministry of Commerce may consist of the following members.

1. The director of the group (the senior commerce specialist)

2. Commerce specialist

3. Commerce specialist

17. Each one of these groups must be specialized in one particular area of import or export goods and commodities from the standpoints of production markets, consumer markets, production costs, wholesale and retail prices, domestic and international transportation costs, insurance, domestic and international trade regulations, currency and banking regulations, establishing credit, the transfer of currency and release of goods from customs. As mentioned, these groups must be classified according to kind of commercial goods and commodities and not on the basis of country or geographical region, because a particular commodity might possible be produced and offered in various parts of the world with similar or different characteristics and prices and it is necessary for the decision maker to be aware of all these conditions.

18. The Ministry of Commerce will receive the [information concerning the] import needs or the specifications on export goods directly from the consumption or production cooperative unions and will put the information at the disposal of the appropriate import or export groups. The import or export group, with consideration for governmental trade policies, the national plan for economic growth, and national foreign policy, will determine the best suppliers of the imported goods and commodities or the best purchaser of export goods and commodities. This shall be done through direct contacts by these groups with the foreign producers or their official export agents and also the major purchasers of Iranian export goods. To facilitate this work, the embassies and consulates of the government of the Islamic Republic of Iran in foreign countries may collect information concerning the specifications of the [goods] of the buyers or suppliers and the kind and price of their goods and commodities. This information will be given to the Ministry of Commerce and ultimately to the import and export groups.

19. Before any final transactions by the above-mentioned groups, the results of their investigations will be taken to the "purchasing and selling commission" or the commission of transactions for a final decision and approval. The members of the commission are appointed by the minister of commerce. Their major duties are:

A. To approve the kind, amount, price, and source of purchase of the imported goods and commodities.

B. To approve the kind, amount, price, and destination of the sale of exported materials and goods.

C. To approve the sale price of imported goods and commodities to cooperative unions.

D. To approve the purchasing price of export materials and goods from the cooperative unions.

The above very important duties play an essential role in determining the level of domestic prices, the rate of domestic inflation, the rate of governmental revenues and expenditures in the area of commerce, encouraging or discouraging imports or exports, encouraging or stopping domestic growth of production and goods, increasing or decreasing domestic or foreign consumer goods and commodities, and also distributing the wealth among the different economic and social groups. The plans for economic growth in different production and consumption sectors, the economic and political independence of the country, and the distribution of income and wealth among the various domestic groups and domestic and foreign groups [as published] will be immediately and strongly affected by the various changes in the above policies. Hence, the government must clarify in detail its essential guidelines and policies in all the above cases and put them at the disposal of the Ministry of Commerce.

20. The members of the purchasing and selling commission may be made up of nine senior experts of whom four are presented by the Ministries of Agriculture, Finance and Economic Affairs, Industries and Mines, and Housing and Development.

21. Upon the approval of the purchasing and selling commission, the import and export groups will take steps to establish credit for imports or request the establishment of bank credits for export from the buyer in accordance with the regulations on governmental transactions and they will transport or deliver the materials and goods in accordance with the credit conditions ratified by the above Commission.

22. Imported materials and goods shall be distributed, after their release, among the cooperative unions on the basis of prices set by the purchasing and selling commission. In certain cases, the release of some of the goods and commodities may be conferred on the cooperative unions. The export materials and goods must be purchased by foreign buyers from the cooperative unions on the basis of prices approved by the purchasing and selling commission and put at the disposal of the Ministry before the establishment of bank credit. Essentially, it would be better for the Ministry of Commerce to announce beforehand its export policies concerning the kind, amount, and price of goods and commodities and take steps to purchase and deliver them as soon as the cooperative unions present them. These goods and commodities may be offered again in certain cases in the domestic market in order to regulate the level of prices or eliminate shortages.

23. Since the import and export of goods is the prerogative of the government and their prices, as mentioned, are determined by the purchasing and selling commission of the Ministry of Commerce, the extensive customs organization which evaluates, collects customs duties, and handles financial affairs, and which can become a source of corruption, may be completely eliminated. The government revenues from the import and export of goods and commodities will result from the policies and actions of the purchasing and selling commission. These revenues may be kept in an account opened for this purpose. All monetary transactions of the government involving imports and exports should be handled through this account.

24. Obviously, the government may, in many cases, exchange goods with countries upon determining the purchase price of imports and the selling price of exports in rials. Meanwhile, foreign trade must be primarily directed towards expanding import sources and, secondly, towards dealing with the developing countries of the Third World.

25. The nationwide distribution of imported goods and commodities or the collection of export goods and commodities, as mentioned, is the responsibility of the private sector through the network of cooperative unions and companies. The role of the government is only to import or export the goods and commodities and determine their distribution prices. In order to prevent real or artificial shortages and to prevent the black market, the government must create many storages and store an abundance of goods and commodities.

26. The organizational plan concerning the above items is summarized in detail in the attached chart.

Part Three

27. The issues specified above consist of the guidelines and organization of the foreign and domestic trade of the government sector and the private sector at such a stage when the above plan has been fully implemented and all the difficulties in the operational stages have been eliminated. But, achieving that stage will not be without its difficulties and restrictions, the most important of which are:

A. The existence of importing and exporting groups, major merchants, wholesalers, and retailers in every commodity group on the national level.

B. The lack of distribution, consumption, and production cooperative companies and unions.

C. The lack of expert import and export groups and the lack of expertise.

The existing people in the cadre of the Ministry of Commerce in carrying out the above-mentioned duties and responsibilities [as published].

D. The lack of a purchasing and selling commission.

E. The lack of a general governmental policy regarding economic growth, importing and exporting, the general level of prices, the rate of inflation, etc.

Should the government make an immediate decision concerning Paragraphs D and E above, the difficulties and restrictions of Paragraphs A, B, and C above would still impede the rapid and immediate implementation of the plan.

28. The individuals and groups cited in Paragraph A, Item 27, not only refuse to cooperate with the government and the Ministry of Commerce, but create obstacles to the plan's successful implementation. It is said that by putting an end to their hold over imports and exports, not only will a belligerent faction be created, but smuggling operations and the black market will increase. In regards to these groups, it must be noted that except for the retailers and major distributors, who can gradually be absorbed by the cooperative companies and unions, the number of these individuals hardly reaches 2,000. Therefore, the issue of unemployment will not be a major problem for them, who mostly enjoy sufficient financial power. And as for smuggling and the black market, it must be noted that these issues have existed in other countries which have taken steps towards nationalizing foreign trade and saving domestic trade from the hands of middlemen and dealers, however gradually, through government control and the elimination of their main source of income, which is mostly currency obtained through exports. Through imposing strong penalties as well as the government offering an abundance of inexpensive goods and commodities, these factors and difficulties have been eliminated. In any case, the engagement in smuggling of a small group cannot prevent the implementation of the general policies of a country.

29. By solving the difficulties caused by Paragraph A, Item 27, in the above manner, the real and practical restrictions will only be those of Paragraphs B and C of the above-mentioned item. The creation of cooperative companies and unions and the formation of import and export groups with the above-mentioned information and expertise requires detailed planning, the complete implementation of which will take at least one to two years. The preparation and implementation of this plan may be conferred on the Ministry of Commerce, which, in addition to forming and training the Ministry's import and export groups, will establish distribution, consumption, or production companies and unions in every place and guild with the cooperation of other ministries and government and private organizations.

30. Noting the time, expertise, training, and organizational restrictions mentioned in the above item, we are forced to speak of the gradual implementation of the plan to nationalize foreign and domestic trade. In other countries, too, this has been done gradually. Noting the ultimate goals before us and noting the above restrictions, it seems better to start with goods and commodities for which where there exists more preparedness and resources. For instance, (as the government has previously announced) [as published].

A first step might be taken in the area of foodstuff and consumer goods (for families), for which there is more expertise and preparedness in the Ministry of Commerce and the cooperative organization of cities and villages, which have the ability to determine the kind and amount of their purchase and distribution.

Then, we can immediately work on the next area of goods and commodities for which there is the most preparedness and resources in comparison with other goods and commodities. In this way, with the gradual formation of import and export groups and their training in all areas of goods and commodities and with the gradual establishment of cooperative companies and unions in the area of goods and commodities, the job can be accomplished to its final stage.

31. The gradual implementation of the nationalization of foreign and domestic trade reduces the dangers mentioned in Item 28 to a great extent. In otherwords, without creating the danger of sudden shortages of imported goods and commodities in the country, the persons of the groups cited in Paragraph A of Item 27 will have the opportunity to conform the implementation of their plan with the new conditions and with this opportunity, they can begin to select new professional fields. As mentioned, retailers can begin work in the sale network of the cooperative companies and wholesalers in the cooperative unions. In the course of regulating the plan to transfer these individuals, the Ministry of Commerce can benefit from their expertise and experiences in the cooperative companies and unions.

32. The next important point is how to control imports and exports in the course of the implementary stages of the plan. In the case of imported goods, it may be decided that the establishment of any kind of credit for the import of goods and commodities before the formation of the groups and the cooperative companies and unions be subject to the approval of the "purchasing and selling commission" mentioned above of the Ministry of Commerce. This commission will study the import requests from the standpoints of kind, price, amount, and source, noting the issues discussed previously, and will either approve or reject them according to the policies of the government. With exports, the export of carpets may be conferred upon the "Iranian Carpet Company" until the formation of cooperative companies and unions of the producers of carpets. The Iranian Carpet Company can either purchase the export carpets directly and export them, or set their export prices and by obtaining monetary agreements issue permits for their export. In the case of other export items, since they do not make up a major portion and are generally goods which can be consumed domestically, their export can be postponed until the formation of cooperative companies and unions. In the case of pressure in this area, the export of these goods may also be studied and either approved or rejected by the purchasing and selling commission on the basis of the kind, price, amount, and destination.

33. Obviously, the issues raised above form a general plan and only essential, major issues have been studied and considered. Therefore, dozens of foreseeable and unforseeable problems and difficulties must all be analyzed and eliminated in the course of the implementation of the plan with considerations for the essential and ultimate goals of the plan and the Islamic economy.

Oh faithful, help yourself and God will help you and strengthen your steps.

FUTURE ECONOMY OF COUNTRY TO BE BASED ON COOPERATIVES

Tehran ETTELA'AT in Persian 27 Oct 81 p 11

[Text] The government must directly take steps to import goods.

The local cooperatives for consumption which stem from the mosques are the most reliable distribution system at the present time.

We do not have a free economy in the sense that anyone can do whatever he wants.

Previously established cooperatives need basic revision.

The interview with brother Hasan Ja'fari, the deputy commerce minister for domestic trade, which you read below, was done by the correspondent of the internal publication TA'AVON, one of the publications of the central organization of national cooperatives. In this interview, difficulties in the national economy, cooperatives in Islam, and the solution to the problem of distribution are discussed. Since the views of brother Hasan Ja'fari may reflect the ideological line governing the Ministry of Commerce concerning the solution to the problem of distribution, we will read together a summary of this interview.

Trade and Distribution

[Question] Much of the economic difficulties lie in the areas of trade and distribution. In your view, what solutions can be offered to ensure that the trade and distribution of domestically produced and imported goods are carried out so as to eliminate the present middlemen and merchants?

Ja'fari: This question has two basic parts: one concerning foreign trade and the other, the issue of domestic trade. As for foreign trade, the Constitution has clarified what must be done. Foreign trade must be nationalized. In this part, in regards to our monetary limitations, on the whole, we must follow a line (which we are presently following) of nationalizing foreign trade. In other words, the government must take direct steps to import goods.

But, in the areas of domestic trade or distribution, the government need not enter into action in that form to such an extent. Depending on the particular existing economic conditions, the government must only supervise distribution. That is, we do not have and cannot have a free economy in the sense that anyone can do whatever he wants. But, within the framework of Islamic standards and with the supervision of the government, that is, with the government as a supervisor, we will be able to, God willing, improve the conditions of domestic distribution. Now, this condition of domestic distribution depends partly on those who work in the private sector, who do their work freely, and partly on the cooperatives. In my opinion, the latter plays the most essential role.

> [Question] In your opinion, can the present cooperatives for distribution and consumption, in their present form, play an essential and useful role in eliminating the economic difficulties?

Ja'fari: Cooperatives for distribution, which usually concern the guilds, have not, unfortunately, been created in the desired form or with that motivation. Some of them are leftover from the past and need basic reform. The distribution cooperatives are acceptable themselves, but when they have been reformed. And, concerning cooperatives for consumption, they exist in general forms: First, those cooperatives such as the Ettehadiyyeh-ye Emkan [Resource Union] and Ettehadiyyeh-ye Markazi-ye Ta'avoni-ye Keshvar [Central Union of National Cooperatives] and so on. Then, those cooperatives which were established as local cooperatives for consumption. The government, resource, or military cooperatives and other cooperatives were established before and, like the distribution cooperatives, in my opinion, need basic revision. But the cooperatives which were established after the revolution, the local cooperatives for consumption, can, for different reasons, better carry out the duties which have been assigned to the distribution sector since the revolution. And the reasons are many.

> [Question] Do the cooperatives, especially cooperatives for consumption, operate on the basis of Islamic economic standards or not and what are the reasons?

Ja'fari: Of course, some of them operate on this basis, that is, among them, there are cooperatives for distribution which operate in accordance with Islamic standards. Precisely those items which we see on the market with controlled prices that have not been manipulated or overly inflated are the result of the cooperatives which maintain the prices. But in most instances, unfortunately, this is not the case. The reasons are as I mentioned earlier: because they were created before and they did not have the desired motivation which, from the standpoint of cooperatives, would be in harmony with the conditions of the revolution. They require reform and must be reformed. We are presently making an effort in this regard to rapidly aid the brothers in the central organization of cooperatives to make reforms. God willing, we will reform them to the best of our ability very soon and place them in a just Islamic distribution system.

Ja'fari: The truth is, the presence of the government and government aid to the cooperatives in some cases cannot be negated. On the other hand, if the government were to be totally in charge of the cooperatives, or in other words, the cooperatives were to rely heavily on the government or belong to the government, these cooperatives could not solve their own problems. Therefore, to answer more openly, the problem is that cooperatives require the assistance of the people in solving their own problems and the government can play a helping role. But, if the government were to directly involve itself, to be in charge completely and create governmental cooperatives, then, this would be uncharacteristic of cooperatives. But, in some places, cooperatives need financial help. They need a place to go to city halls and banks [as published]. And the government helps them in their business. But, in the long run, they must stand on their own feet and the people must manage their own affairs.

[Question] What thesis does Islam offer concerning cooperatives and what is the socio-economic philosophy concerning cooperatives in Islam?

Ja'fari: Perhaps it can be stated clearly that cooperatives in the form that exists in Islam have not been presented in any other school of thought.

The clear reason is that in different economic systems, cooperatives are not allowed to flourish. That is, it has been a phenomenon that would not fit completely, as it must, in these systems. But, in Islam, cooperatives, in a broad sense, exist in all areas, which cannot be enumerated. And cooperatives exist in the specific economic sense as well in the form of local cooperatives for consumption which stem from the mosques, are supervised by the mosques, and which assist the people. They have been formed with shares invested by the people and can serve as examples of Islamic economic cooperatives, which have already shown themselves to be one of our most reliable systems of distribution at the present time.

[Question] What is meant by general cooperatives and the production and distribution economy mentioned in the Constitution?

Ja'fari: It seems that that part of the general cooperative concerns the first part of the previous question, which I explained. That is, in Islam, a cooperative, in its general form concerns all areas and in the next part, an economy based on cooperatives for production and distribution. That is, the basis of our economy in the future, God willing, will be cooperatives. That is, a great part of our economy will be cooperative. That is, it will be the economy of the people themselves, people who have gathered to form the cooperatives. Their activity is in production, which concerns the most essential kind of cooperatives, which must be discussed and worked on more. And then, distribution must be worked on. Perhaps what is meant by distribution in the Constitution covers consumption as well. That is, they come together themselves, produce goods and distribute them themselves. More work than in any other area must be done in cooperatives for production. Especially the central organization of cooperatives and related organizations must spend more time and energy in this area. Specifically because if there is a cure for our economy, the source is production and we must solve our production problems in any way possible. One of the solutions is in the form of cooperatives for production, which can work very successfully within the framework of Islamic guidelines.

Another issue that comes to mind is that in the future, as it has been foreseen in the Constitution, we will have an economy of Islamic cooperatives. It is a great duty to have the greater part of our economy based on cooperatives. It is a great duty which will be placed on the shoulders of organizations working in cooperative areas. And the necessary manpower and planning must be provided, which is being provided, as some of us who are involved know. And these will prepare the necessary bases and grounds for creating such an Islamic cooperative economy. This is no small responsibility for our brothers who work in these areas. We hope that within the framework of Islamic guidelines, through understanding cooperatives in Islam, finding Islamic guidelines for cooperatives, and implementing them, we will be able to show in practice that what has been mentioned in the Constitution as a cooperative economy is implementable in our country, especially to other Islamic countries and all countries of the world which want to follow these guidelines. And, God willing, our brothers will be successful.

NEWSPAPER RESPONDS TO SYRIAN EMBASSY LETTER OF PROTEST

Tehran TEHRAN TIMES in English 31 Oct 81 p 3

[Text]

WITH REGARD TO inaccurate information published in the TEHRAN TIMES newspaper about Syria, a reply is being provided by the Syrian Embassy in Tehran.

When the new management of the TEHRAN TIMES accepted the responsibility of this paper a few months ago, they announced that they are determined to spread the Islamic teachings and operate the daily as the real voice of the Islamic Revolution. We were among those who considered this as a good omen and expressed our hopes for their success.

But unfortunately within the last few months it is observed that this daily or it is better to say that some of the members on the management, whenever they can, in editorials signed by Mousavian or Jama-at Ol-Moslemin or without any endorsement and by relying on mischievous news released by Zionistic news agencies, are trying to harm the close relations between Iran and Syria, in this way they are expressing their disenchantment over such friendly ties.

They are not happy with the relations of Revolution with its closest allies. And recently, these people unable to tolerate the growing relations between Syria and Iran, have clearly shown their hatred on these relations. They also expect rom the Foreign Ministry of the Islamic Republic of Iran to spoil these relations.

Following is the short description taken out from the TIMES which are enough to prove their hatred.

This newspaper on 19-10-1981 in its editorial section published an article, signed by Haj Mousavian, in which it was said that in his meeting with Syrian Moslem brothers during the Hajj (Pilgrimage) ceremonies, the Syrian Moslem brothers expressed their dissatisfaction on the close relations of the Islamic Republic of Iran with unpopular and Soviet affiliated government of Syria.

Brother Mousavian, after his meeting with Syrian Moslem brothers promised them the termination of relations between Syria and Iran if their claims were proven true. Then brother Mousavian openly avoided the Foreign Ministry of Iran from its expansion of relation with a government such as Syrian government,. There were also some other issues published in this article of which repeatation is only a waste of time.

But we ask from the writer of this article who are those you met in Saudi Arabia?

And how is it possible that you defend their position and publish their views while requesting the Foreign Ministry of the Islamic Republic of Iran to sever its relation with Syria so quickly?

Is it possible that, for example, a Syrian reporter, after meeting with a few opposers of the Islamic regime of Iran, while claiming that they support Islam, support their position and publish their claims in Syrian papers?

This is only a part of the fact that is being published in the respectful newspaper of the TEHRAN TIMES and we leave the judgement to you.

Besides, the just stand and the support Syria enjoys from the Islamic Revolution of Iran helps us to ignore such issues and prevents us from getting enraged over them. And we are sure that what has been published in this newspaper cannot reflect the stand and opinion of the Islamic Revolution as well as the line of Imam.

WE recently received a letter from the Syrian Embassy in Tehran protesting our articles of "A look at the Foreign Policy of Islamic Republic of Iran" which appeared in our Monday, Oct. 19, 81 issue. The letter says in part:

Of course the above is not the full text of the Syrian Embassy's letter but since our editorial has been the main object of their protest, we, therefore quoted the concerned part only.

In connection, with our editorial the embassy has claimed that "Brother Musavian has promised his brothers that if their claims are proven true the Iranian-Syrian relations will be severed."

In other part of their letter the Syrian embassy has asked us to substantiate our reason for defending so hastily the stand of those we met in Mecca and Medina and for asking the Iranian Foreign Ministry to sever ties with Syria.

However, our defending stand of the opponents of Syrian government , it must be observed that after quoting their views we have explicitly said .. "and we do not propose to enter in the polemics as to whether the Libyan and Syrian governments are actually being supported by their people or not. Nor do we propose to determine whether they are Islamic governments or not. Nor again do we wish to go into the question of whether their relations with the Eastern Imperialists are the same as the relations that of Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Iraq and others with the US."

Concerning the issue of breaking relations with Syrian government , it should be noted that we did not have any notion as such and we only expressed one of the principles of the Islamic Republic's foreign policy that : "..... It has always been the firm and undeviating policy of the Islamic Republic regime to base its relations with other regimes taking into consideration inalienable popularity of regimes among the masses of their people, and the corollary of their independence both from the USSR and US."

And in another part of the same editorial we wrote" .... If it were proved that any government was serving the interests of a Superpower, be it either from the East or West, and it stood against Islam and its own people then Islamic Republic of Iran stood ready to severe its political relations with such a regime or regimes

We had also added that We asked our pilgrim brothers to take a look at the way in which Iran had severed ties completely with the regime of Anwar Sadat in Egypt, or that of the Jordanian Shah Hussein or at our limited contacts with the Saudi regime "

And "The Islamic Republic has time and again expressed itself prepared to extend help to all people wherever it becomes necessary

Hence, our call for severing ties was only in the context of what has already been mentioned above, and we do not think we have committed anything wrong by stating so.

We believe it to be a 100 per cent truthful concept and similarly the officials of the islamic government and the Iranian Moslem nation believe it in too.

We have not asked the Foreign Ministry to sever ties with Syria but what we asked them was:

(a) Relations should be established through sounding out views held by the common people of that country and not limit it to diplomatic levels. They must send delegations among the masses of that country to investigate and realise the stand of that government.

(b) They must establish relations with any government according to views and wills of the nations, and they should evaluate each government through the popularity it enjoys with the masses.

Regrettably, the Syrian Embassy in Tehran has claimed that "the views published in the said editorials cannot reflect the stand of the Islamic Revolution and the Imam's line."

We hereby ask them to refer to the statements made by the Imam so that they can get better acquainted with the position of the Islamic Revolution which in itself is the Imam's line and not so hastily condemn the children of the Revolution and followers of Imam.

Imam Khomeini in his address made on October 14, 1981 had said; "We should think of the peoples and not the government. Besides official delegations to foreign countries, non-official delegations should also be sent so as to awaken the world." And also note his remark, which is known to every one which says that most of the governments are far apart from their nations."

In the end we would like to suggest the embassy even if the Syrian mass media, or all the newsagencies including western and eastern, were to exercise our policy and interview the Iranian counter-revolutionaries and later mingle with the masses and investigate the depth of the popularity enjoyed by the leadership, government, Majlis, . . . , we would still never feel bad about it because in that way all our government's and people's claims would be proven to the hilt.

Wa's Salaam

CHIEF PROSECUTOR DEFENDS 'CAPITAL PUNISHMENT'

Tehran KAHYAN INTERNATIONAL in English 27 Oct 81 p 1

[Report on TV interview with Chief Justice Ardebili on 25 Oct 81: "Foreign Reports on Justice in Iran Exaggerated and Sensationalistic"]

[Text] TEHRAN, Oct. 26 (Pars) — Foreign reports on executions in Iran are both exaggerated and sensationalistic, stated Chief Justice Ardebili on Sunday. The Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the Islamic Republic of Iran further said that such reports were obscurantist although the motivations behind them were not, all the same.

Ardebili said that those who were opposed to capital punishment in general had nothing interesting to say in his view since Islamic principles had decreed such punishments and besides, he added, all attempts to abolish capital punishment had proven the invalidity of this approach despite the claims of the abolitionists that doing away with the capital punishment would be progressive and would bear good social results.

The Chief Justice said that others who objected to executions in Iran accepted capital punishment in principle but claimed that punishments in Iran were not proportionate to the offences. He commented that this was at least a factual disagreement. The Chief Justice rejected completely the claims of others who claimed that due process was not being observed in trials in Iran involving capital cases.

In another part of Chief Justice Ardebili's interview televised last night he said that foreign critics of the judicial system in Iran were making exaggerated claims about the number of executions in spite of the fact that records on these executions were made public and thus their exaggerations could not be factually supported. He said that whereas only 500 convicts had been executed claims were made that up to 5,000 persons were executed.

Ardebili said one could not ignore the context in which all this was occurring. On the one hand, he said, Iran was the target of propaganda attacks by powers seeking to intervene in Iran's affairs and were only using the alleged abuses as pretexts for further attacking Iran. On the other hand he said the ferocity of the attacks of the internal seditionists was such that the number of executions was entirely appropriate and proportionate to the crimes being committed against public peace and security inside Iran.

Ardebili stressed that the quantitative figures given by Iranian authorities were absolutely correct and said that those concerned about justice and due process should read the files on those condemned in order to fill in a qualitative understanding of the enormous crimes the condemned had committed without which they could not understand the reasons for the executions. Ardebili said that some complaints of abuses, such as alleged instances of violation of due process or cases of innocent persons having suffered wrongs, were being investigated.

Chief Justice Ardebili said: "I do not want to claim that there have been no cases of violations among all these trials and court cases."

He went on to add that the propaganda campaign against the judicial system was contrived for purely political ends since these critics could'nt care less about the lives of Iranian citizens. Speaking about the formation of special administrative courts, which is pending approval of a bill presently before the Islamic Consultative Assembly, Ardebili said that if such courts operated in conjunction with an effective inspection bureau whose juriadiction would cover all organs and institutions of the country, including the prime ministry, the presidency, the judiciary and the inspection bureau itself, most administrative problems would be solved.

At the end of this interview Chief Justice Ardebili said that honorable, competent, responsible and committed judges are serving in the Justice Ministry who had heard and ruled on some 1,800,000 cases filled during the preceding Iranian year.

INTERVIEW WITH FOREIGN MINISTER SHAMIR ON AWACS DEAL

TA301915 Jerusalem Domestic Television Service in Hebrew 1820 GMT 30 Oct 81

[Interview with Foreign Minister Yitzhaq Shamir by Yoram Ronen in the television studio; time not given--videotaped]

[Text] [Question] Mr Shamir, following the approval of the AWACS deal the fear expressed in Jerusalem and in Washington is that this precedes a full or a partial U.S. recognition of the Saudi peace plan, the main points of which we have just heard on television again. Are there any grounds for this fear?

[Answer] There are fears since the present U.S. administration attaches excessive importance to that plan, which I do not know whether it could be called one at all. This is, on the whole, a collection of views picked from a selection of the most anti-Israeli resolutions adopted by the United Nations or by Arab League conventions. The plan contains several clauses, and each I would say is tantamount to a poisonous dagger directed at the heart of Israel, at Israel's existence. Is there anything missing in it? No, it has a withdrawal to the 1949 borders which do not exist anymore, Arab sovereignty over Jerusalem, the return of the 1949 refugees, the establishment of a Palestinian state, everything that will render Israel's survival impossible.

[Question] Can such a grave plan then be accepted by the U.S. administration? The U.S. secretary of state, after all, said yesterday that certain parts of the plan seem reasonable to him.

[Answer] This is very surprising. One can come up with some explanation here. There is one clause in this plan which is very vague and very evasively formulated, on recognizing the right of all regional countries to exist securely. Israel's name is not mentioned. There is no mention of the word peace in this entire Saudi document. There is no mention of negotiations either. We do not think that the U.S. administration can conceive of the possibility that Israel will ever accept such proposals or ever view them as a basis for negotiations at all.

[Question] Does the U.S. administration then not recognize that the acceptance of such a program, fully or partially, practically means a withdrawal from the Camp David agreements?

[Answer] Well, the Egyptian foreign minister said here that the sole practical plan for peace existing in the region today is the Camp David one and whoever raises other plans is, in fact, weakening and undermining the Camp David accords for the implementation and completion of which we are continually toiling.

[Question] Do you not see then signs indicating that the U.S. administration is somewhat starting to withdraw from the Camp David accords?

[Answer] I did say there are fears and worrisome signs. On the other hand though, we hear the U.S. President's clear declarations which reaffirm the commitment of the United States and of the U.S. President to Israel's security and which speak of the need to take care that Israel's military and technological advantages are maintained. We cannot but listen to these remarks which are in themselves encouraging. However, there have always been ups and downs in the dialogue between the United States and us. It never went completely smoothly. Ever since the early days of the present administration it was clearly noticeable that one of the major problems we would have to challenge is the excess importance the administration attaches to Saudi positions.

[Question] Mr Shamir, do you not think that the danger inherent in this excess importance, the pro-Saudi orientation, is that Saudi Arabia will ultimately gain a prime status in the Middle East, more than any other regional country?

[Answer] We will have to challenge this and I think there is still hope here. If we listen, if we analyze the remarks made in the U.S. Senate during the last debate on this double [hakefula] deal, the clear impression is that it was not the thesis that Saudi Arabia is a moderate and peace-seeking country in the region that had the upper hand. This was finely put by one of the senators who finally changed his position but had, nevertheless, said: I know Saudi Arabia is not moderate. It is as moderate as 'Arafat. These remarks reflect the situation indeed. Many others who voted for the president's stand said so clearly, stated they did not accept this thesis. Therefore, I believe there is hope and there are grounds to assume that this policy--if anybody thinks about it--will not be implemented in our region.

[Question] Mr Shamir, do we intend to demand compensation for the approval of the AWACS deal? Do we expect the Americans to offer us a financial, political or security compensation?

[Answer] We do not talk of compensation here. However, it is possible to assume that following the president's declaration, following the remarks in his last letter to the prime minister--to the effect that he recognizes the need for Israel to have military and technological advantages and that he reaffirms the commitment to Israel's security--that the U.S. administration will have to give this a practical expression in strengthening Israel in such a way as to provide an answer to the challenge we will face when this deal is implemented.

[Question] In other words, do we anticipate additional U.S. security aid to Israel?

[Answer] We hope that we are entering a stage of security cooperation with the United States. In the framework of this cooperation I assume we will have to increase our power to the point where we will be able to face these new challenges.

[Question] In this context I would like to ask, Mr Shamir, the AWACS deal has often been associated with Israeli-U.S. strategic cooperation. Among other things President Reagan and Prime Minister Begin talked of an invitation to the defense minister to visit the United States in November to discuss the implementation of this agreement. So far the invitation has not been extended. Are there any delays here?

[Answer] Well, this is not a question of dates. We hope that this promise of cooperation will be kept and implemented.

[Question] In view of the AWACS deal, do you think there should be a reassessment of our relations with the United States?

[Answer] This is not a question of reassessment. I have said that all along, there have always been arguments and differences with the United States. This is understandable since there are different interests involved. Nevertheless, for all the struggles and amidst the arguments we ultimately reach cooperation which in turn helps Israel to strengthen and progress still further.

[Question] In conclusion, Mr Shamir, what in your opinion is the next stage in the Israeli-U.S. dialogue? Will it be the strategic cooperation agreement which will get underway now?

[Answer] This will surely be one of the most vital and important things.

[Question] Will this be implemented within the coming weeks, in your opinion?

[Answer] I cannot set a time. This is not a matter of weeks. It is not a matter of months either. At any rate it has to be started.

[Question] I understand this depends mainly on the Americans. The ball is in their court.

[Answer] There are two partners involved here, of course.

[Ronen] Thank you Mr Foreign Minister.

'MA'ARIV DISCUSSES U.S.-ISRAELI RELATIONS

TA301234 Tel Aviv MA'ARIV in Hebrew 30 Oct 81 pp 17, 25

[Commentary by Yosef Harif: "By the Time You Get Something From the Saudis, the Soviets and the Syrians Will Be Stewing Something Up in Lebanon, Israel Warned the United States"]

[Excerpt] The problem is not only the AWACS deal and the offensive equipment included in the Saudi deal. The problem goes much deeper: Is Saudi Arabia the end-all and be-all of U.S. assets in the region, as one might surmise from the arguments put forward by the administration during the struggle to put the deal through; and what can Israel expect of this administration in regard to the PLO, in regard to a desirable settlement in Lebanon, in regard to implementation of the Camp David accords, and in regard to the negation of the Saudi "peace plan?"

In their last conversation in the White House, President Reagan tried to soften Begin's opposition to the deal with Saudi Arabia and in the process said to him: Why be so scared, since this deal is not going to be put into effect for another 5 years?

Begin's reply was: I do not know how things are going to be in 5 years' time. Certainly I will not be prime minister in 5 years' time, but I am obliged to safeguard the life of my country and a country cannot live on borrowed time....

When Begin took leave of Reagan, he had apparently no substantive reason to think that this friendly administration would be like its predecessor on basic issues. Does he still have that conviction only weeks after his visit to Washington?

Begin has not disclosed his views on the matter, but it would not seem far-fetched to assume that he, too, has begun to entertain doubts. Too many seemingly unconnected minor happenings have occurred in recent days to exclude the thought that what is going on here and now in the Reagan administration is not haphazard....

In the communique issued by the cabinet after its last meeting, as per the text proposed by the prime minister, the deal with Saudi Arabia is called the "double arms deal." This is in order to draw attention to what the administration systematically and astonishingly fails to say--namely, that here we have not only the five surveillance planes but also outright offensive weapons (plus equipment enabling Saudi aircraft to reach Israel without having to refuel en route). This wording was by way of dropping a further hint that the prime minister, under constraint to display restraint, could not express his displeasure otherwise than by this play on words: "The double arms deal"--meaning double-talk, the mouth at variance with the heart....

And whoever this week followed the by no means haphazard series of events, could not but be impressed by the evident "double dealing" in word and deed.

In the cabinet communique--the first version--the prime minister saw fit to include part of the message sent him by President Reagan on 22 October, a few days before the Senate vote. Begin picked these two passages: "Whatever the differences of opinion between us, I can only reiterate that the United States remains completely committed to the security of Israel and that we expect a fruitful outcome of our ongoing discussions on strategic cooperation."

In a preceding passage the president states (the prime minister "renounced" this passage, perhaps on account of its personal tone): "We enjoyed your appraisals"--thus writes Reagan--"on a wide range of topics facing us, and I am confident that we now have a better understanding of matters common to us."

Well, the note per se is positive and "very friendly." But what does it actually mean? Again another "coincidence": On the 28th of this month, on the very morning of the day set for the Senate vote, U.S. counsellor Robert McFarlane was due to arrive here to discuss the "implementation of strategic cooperation" with the prime minister and others concerned. Two days earlier, Israel was informed that McFarlane was postponing his visit (a "2 to 3-week postponement" was not mentioned). Why? The official explanation was for "personal reasons." The true explanation we could gather from the response offered to the Foreign Ministry by U.S. ambassador in Israel Samuel Lewis, namely that the advance publicity on the visit of the U.S. envoy was not to the latter's liking. It was as if to imply an understanding that his coming should be kept secret, away from the limelight, and the news-leakage of his coming infringed upon this understanding.

Does advance publicity warrant postponement of a visit announced to the prime minister and reported by him to the cabinet, a visit relevant to the president's note stating the expectation of a "fruitful outcome to our ongoing discussions on strategic cooperation?"

Why these "double deals?"--it is being asked here--with Saudi Arabia openly, above-board for all to see; and with Israel hush-hush, in utter secrecy? It certainly stands to reason that the topics under discussion should be kept secret by their very nature, but why conceal a visit by an official U.S. dignitary who comes to Israel for talks on matters of common concern to the two countries? And did not Reagan himself publicly declare that Israel is not only a "friend and ally" of the United States but also its "partner," so why did McFarlane put off his visit?

During the prime minister's Washington visit it was agreed that in November (more precisely, at the beginning of November) Defense Minister Ari'el Sharon would be going to Washington for talks with his counterpart, Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger, on matters directly related to strategic cooperation between the two countries. What is more, on the agenda was the drafting of what was termed an agreed memorandum of understanding on strategy. Why has thus far no invitation come for Minister Sharon to visit Washington? Both the fixing of a date for such a visit and the talks McFarlane was to have conducted here would have made it clear that the United States means what it says and is serious in its stated intentions.

All these things occurred while President Reagan was not at all sure of victory, when all the polls foresaw defeat for him. And evidence of this uncertainty is to be found in the "personal" visit Ambassador Lewis paid, at his own request, to the prime minister on Thursday of last week, 22 October (by chance this coincided with the day on which the date for the president's note was set).... As far as is known, even though the ambassador professed to have come in a "personal" way and not on anyone's initiative, the conversation did dwell on the AWACS deal. It is a fair guess that Lewis expected Begin to soften his stand and thereby put out signals to Israel's friends in the United States, both in the Jewish community and in the Senate. The fact that on the day following this meeting the prime minister, in an interview given to the WASHINGTON POST, lashed out at the "double deal," goes to show that he was not won over by the personal arguments put forward by the amiable and friendly ambassador. It suffices to quote Begin's dictum, "if you, the Americans, had struck a similar deal with Denmark, you would not hear a word from me," to get the hang of what Begin said in response to the ambassador's initiative.

There is practically no doubt that the "obsession" of this administration vis-a-vis Saudi Arabia will make its impact on contacts between Washington and Jerusalem in the near future, and already there is evidence of this. For example, the U.S. secretary of state, Alexander Haig, admits that in truth, when this administration took office, it did not much like the Camp David accords and that the administration now sees the need to bring Saudi Arabia into the peace process; what this means is that Israel must brace itself for the imminent discovery by the administration of "positive points" in the eight-point plan of Prince Fahd, despite the fact that here is a plan which poses as a pre-condition, a sine qua non, the establishment of a Palestinian state.

A couple of days ago Ambassador 'Evron had a conversation with Secretary of State Haig. It is reasonable to assume that he too heard some echo to the thoughts attributed to Haig concerning the character and role of Saudi Arabia and likewise, the "unattractiveness" of the Camp David accords which this administration has inherited from its predecessor. Meanwhile, we read that President Reagan, too, has discovered in the Saudi plan something that is not there--recognition of Israel...and readiness for peace. Not only that, but he is quoted by the news agencies as saying--after the Senate vote on the AWACS--that "The Saudi proposal is praiseworthy." The Saudi proposal calls for the establishment of a Palestinian state with Jerusalem as its capital.

To go by Haig's pronouncements in a closed forum: the Reagan administration does not accept the Camp David accords because it believes in them, but simply because it inherited them. Thus, Haig's testimony.

Haig was asked, en passant, why the administration was fighting so strenuously to push through the AWACS deal likewise inherited from the previous administration, while not feeling obliged to adhere with equal enthusiasm to the Camp David inheritance. He had no answer to this.

Maybe that is why Haig withheld support for the idea that the autonomy talks be conducted on the ministerial level. When Israel and Egypt suggested he go to Cairo in a few days' time for autonomy talks on the ministerial level, calculated to give the negotiations a real push forward, he replied that he would be busy in Washington preparing for King Husayn's visit. But Haig did not try to set another date, convenient for him, for holding ministerial-level talks, nor did he appoint a senior emissary on the Sol Linowitz-level; instead, he intends to send one of his aides, Mr Viliotes.

There is no choice but to grant President Reagan renewed credit and believe that such indeed is the will of his administration: to discuss in broad scope the strategic problems of the region. Thus far, however, Israel has witnessed worrisom developments. For example, the administration affirms its concern at what are seen as imminent developments in Lebanon. The Americans reckon that the Russians are "cooking up" something there. In any case, it is obvious to them that the Russians will not allow the Syrians to leave Lebanon, for Moscow means to govern there through the intermediary of the Syrians and the PLO, of course. If the Russians so wish, things will stay quiet. Or, by the same token, the sector [word indistinct] on Israel will be "heated up" as they contrived to do before the cease-fire. Is this not a topic pertaining to the broad range of subjects which the United States should discuss with Israel? The plain fact is that the Americans have not raised it in any dialog with Israel on "strategic cooperation."

Some while ago Soviet Foreign Minister Andrei Gromyko met U.S. Secretary of State Alexander Haig. Interestingly, nowhere in their wide-ranging conversation was there are reference made to the Middle East. It may be assumed that this weird omission kindled a red light in the administration: Why, they said, this only goes to show that Moscow wants to lull us while it is concocting something--maybe in Lebanon...?

If the concept of a strategic dialog has any meaning, here is a topic pertaining to such a dialog but instead, all that the Americans saw fit to say to Israel when the Lebanese-Syrian topic was broached was that Israel should exercise "tolerance."

Israel saw fit the other day to observe at a high-level encounter in Washington that Israel's strategic importance is enhanced now that Greece intends to secede from NATO. Well, the Americans listened and did not dispute this appraisal, but no dialog ensued, be it on a "broad scale" or a restricted scale. Israel merely heard from authoritative sources in Washington that the United States intends to assume a "low profile" in the Greek affair and that was that....

Consider another issue still: Israel complained that a situation was emerging where Israel's position was getting increasingly inferior since Iraq, for instance, was already receiving arms both from the Soviet Union and the United States. The problem is not only military. The stronger the Arab countries become and the more confidence they gain in their power, the less inducement they will have to make peace. Now, does this issue not call for in-depth discussions?

The political quarter that heard this from an authoritative Israeli representative might have agreed to this logic, but this political quarter had nothing logical to say and, as a matter of fact, offered no reply at all....

The problem, therefore, is not just AWACS. Israel has learned from an authoritative administration source that when the heads of the U.S. delegation met with their European colleagues at the Cancun conference in Mexico, they heard at least two West European foreign ministers say that they do not believe in autonomy and that, in their view, the Camp David accords will wither away of their own accord. No impression was gleaned that the Americans tried to contest this view, albeit neither did they say they accept it in so many words.

Washington has also lost its logic: Why should the Arabs give up their demands of Israel, when they can be against it, demand the establishment of a Palestinian state governed by the PLO and at the same time enjoy U.S. support? And this pertains not only to Saudi Arabia. One has to be incurably naive not to believe that the current orchestration on the theme of the PLO and a Palestinian state (Nixon wants such a state, but he would have it "demilitarized...") is spontaneous. "All of a sudden," of their own accord, THE NEW YORK TIMES, THE WASHINGTON POST, Professor Brzezinski, Carter and Nixon have all together, all at once, "discovered" the PLO and come to the conclusion that one will have to talk to it, "if," of course, it recognizes Israel. Well, it transpires that the PLO has already been talked to--among others by Sir Brzezinski--without its having recognized Israel. What guarantee is there that he who has capitulated to Saudi Arabia in the AWACS affair will not yield to so modest a request from Riyadh as to go and talk to the PLO, on the "peace process," naturally....

The signs are that if Washington tries to pursue this path, with the same dubious craftiness that characterized the Carter administration on this score, it will meet with sharp opposition. The U.S. media may not love Menahem Begin or Arik Sharon, but the administration personnel will have to speak to them and them alone. They can supply many dollars worth of weapons to Saudi Arabia or Iraq without heeding Israel's opposition. However, to reach a "political settlement," like it or not, they must look to Israel which isn't that pitiful after all.

In a conversation with a U.S. administration official in Washington, an Israeli representative said: What are you heading for? You are wooing Saudi Arabia and meanwhile you are losing Greece. Moreover, before you get anything out of the cheeky Saudis, as you yourselves admit, the Russians and the Syrians will have cooked up something in Lebanon. That being so, what is so clever about acting in a way that will lead to the isolation of Israel?

That in effect is the question to which the United States has as yet given no answer. President Reagan's letter, which came during the cabinet meeting, is more positive than his previous letter a week ago (which, for some reasons, was held up at the sender's end some 3 weeks...), and is seen as a tranquilizer after the approval of the AWACS deal. This letter, however, does not at present offer promise of a genuine and trustworthy policy toward Israel.

The administration's victory is not really all that impressive. What is impressive is the abundant proof offered by this administration, for all to see, that the United States is addicted to Riyadh's considerations and not vice versa.

If there is any real substance to the note which President Reagan hastened to send Begin, that is something we shall not know until, in the due course of events, the Saudis raise their new demands--this time in the political sphere. Reagan's enthusiasm for the Saudi eight-point plan is not a harbinger of good.

'HA'ARETZ' COMMENTS ON PALESTINIAN STATE IN JORDAN

TA301036 Tel Aviv HA'ARETZ in Hebrew 30 Oct 81 p 13

[Poles commentary: "A Palestinian State A La Shamir"]

[Excerpt] Anyone who says today that Israel can permit itself to show difference over the question of who is to rule Jordan--that is, across the Jordan River--is in fact declaring that Israel is prepared to accept Yasir 'Arafat's rule there. What is the basis for this approach? Does Mr Yitzhaq Shamir really believe that the PLO will give up the Arabs of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip if Israel is prepared to recognize its rule over the eastern bank of the Jordan? And is there no reason to fear that, in the event of a PLO revolution succeeding in Jordan, the regime that will be established there on the ruins of the monarchistic rule will try even harder to "liberate" the Arabs of the West Bank and Gaza from an Israeli rule and arouse irredentist ferment among the Arabs of Israel inside the green line, too?

Should we believe that national responsibility for Jordan, if it is laid upon the terrorist organizations, will completely change their terrorist habits? Will organizations that have been fostered for years by the Soviet Union really fit in a pro-Western lineup such as that which the United States is working hard to establish in the Middle East and, in the framework of this lineup, cooperate with Israel? Should we not assume that the Kingdom of Jordan under PLO rule will invite advisers from the communist bloc countries to its regular army, whose officer corps will be recruited from the PLO organizations' commanders?

If we object to a Palestinian state that would come between us and Jordan, for the reason that it would be another base for Soviet activity throughout the area, then we would be faced with many times that danger if the PLO is permitted to take over the reins of power in such a large country as Jordan, in which it is unnecessary to build national arrangements since they exist.

It is irresponsible to recommend an anti-Hashemite line in order to answer the propaganda of the supporters of the PLO in the UN General Assembly and Western capitals. When our foreign minister declares that Israel is indifferent as to the identity of the rule in Jordan, Israel is authorizing the PLO as a political factor worthy of heading a Palestinian state, more than everything Brezhnev, Carrington, Mr Papandreau and others have done up to now. It is most dangerous to affirm in principle the concept of a Palestinian state, even if such a defendant already exists in Jordan. Nobody will "buy" dialectic-geographical jugglery from us and it is not to be assumed that the U.S. leadership will regard the expulsion of King Husayn with equanimity.

The problem of the political future of the Arabs of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip has come up on the agenda of the international argument. We will not be able to repel the pressure of the questions aimed at us by the fact of our encouraging the overthrow of the regime in Amman. In contrast to this, we can point to the Camp David agreements, which recognize the legitimate rights of the Palestinians and their just needs. This has been agreed upon between Israel and Egypt, with the support of the United States; the fact that these agreements postpone the permanent solution for 5 years should not make matters difficult for our publicity, if we are clever enough to present this postponement as a prize for safeguarding peace in the area.

The difficulties piling up on our way to explaining the Camp David agreements are well known, but we cannot get out of them by providing legitimization for the PLO to make a revolution in Jordan.

COMMENTATOR DISCUSSES AUTONOMY TALKS PROBLEMS

TA021126 Tel Aviv MA'ARIV in Hebrew 2 Nov 81 p 5

[Commentary by Shmu'el Segev: "Coup de Grace to the Autonomy Negotiations"]

[Text] The assumption by Professor Menahem Milson of the post of head of the civilian administration in Judaea, Samaria and the Gaza District is praiseworthy from every point of view. Despite the growing recognition of the PLO's political standing, and despite the support being voiced in the United States and Europe for the "Saudi plan," this well-known Orientalist has chosen to employ his personal experience and his scientific prestige toward promotion of the autonomy plan, whose prospects for success were never too bright anyway.

Professor Milson's appointment is designed to create a distinction between military responsibility and the civilian positions, and to encourage the integration of local Palestinians into the autonomy talks in the future. But this separation of powers is too little, too late.

Following a break of 16 months, Israel and Egypt have agreed to resume the autonomy talks in the hope of concluding the negotiations before the completion of the Israeli withdrawal from Sinai next April. The increased personal weight of Defense Minister Ari'el Sharon within the Israeli political team has reinforced this hope, and has led to the appointment of Professor Milson to head the civilian administration in the territories.

The assassination of President al-Sadat; the decision by the Soviet Union, Malaysia and Greece to accord full diplomatic recognition to the PLO; and the support the United States has hinted it will extend to the Saudi Crown Prince's "eight-point plan"--all these have seemingly intertwined to torpedo the complicated task of the Israeli scholar. When the PLO is reaping success in the international sphere and is rapidly approaching the stage at which the leadership of the Algerian rebels stood on the eve of the opening of the talks between them and President De Gaulle (the Evian talks) in the spring of 1962, will any Palestinian dare publicly to condemn Yasir 'Arafat and lend a hand to Professor Milson in the crystallization of his "moderate" policy in the territories?

Moreover, ever since President al-Sadat's murder new winds have begun to blow on the banks of the Nile. Under the guise of a "government of continuation," President Mubarak is trying to improve his relations with the Arab world, and implicit Egyptian support for the Saudi peace plan is evident. If to this we add the call of former Presidents Ford and Carter for U.S. recognition of the PLO, and the revelations of Professor Brzezinski about his meeting with Yasir 'Arafat in Algeria, the reasons for the reservations in the territories about public cooperation with Israel become self-evident.

But the coup de grace to Professor Milson's efforts was delivered in the past few days precisely by the Reagan administration.

The public praise uttered by the U.S. President and his secretary of state for the Saudi "peace plan" is tantamount to implicit recognition of the PLO, and has scuttled in advance of any prospect of success the autonomy talks had. Naturally, U.S. officials dispute this view, arguing that the Saudi plan does not contradict the Camp David accords, and in fact constitutes recognition of Israel's existence. This may be the case, but the Saudi plan goes far beyond the Camp David agreements and calls for the creation of an independent Palestinian state with East Jerusalem as its capital; it also demands that the Palestinian refugees be given the right to choose between returning to their homes inside the green line, or receiving compensation for the property they left behind in Israel. Under these circumstances, is there any Palestinian leader in the territories who will agree to cooperate with Professor Milson--if the United States is now ready to give the Palestinians far more than Israel is?

The Israeli Government's outcry against the erosion in the Reagan administration's position and against its support for the Saudi plan is of course timely. But the U.S. damage has already been done; it is doubtful whether Begin's letter to Reagan can undo it.

Despite the poor formulation by former Prime Minister Rabin, the Israeli Government would do well to adopt his idea and seek the holding of an Israel-Egyptian-U.S. summit meeting to express renewed support for the Camp David accords. There is no political logic to doing away with the agreements--even if President al-Sadat was assassinated, and even if President Reagan took over from President Carter--but there was and is sense to give renewed validity to the agreements.

If the United States, Egypt and Israel are, in fact, interested in implementing the autonomy plan, then the three of them must dispel the doubts created by the recent U.S. pronouncements in order to convince the residents of Judaea, Samaria and Gaza that it would be fruitless for them to pin their hopes on the PLO or on the Saudi peace plan.

BRIEFS

W. BANK UNREST--It is estimated in the defense establishment that the recent events in Judaea and Samaria are ephemeral. Today military governors have acted among the mayors and education leaders there in order to calm the tempers in Judaea and Samaria. The curfew was lifted from the old city of Hebron this morning. Our correspondent Rafiq Halabi is reporting. [Begin videotape] The soldiers who reinforced the border police units in Judaea and Samaria did no report particularly irregular events in the region. In Hebron students threw stones at the building of the rural association which is headed by Mustafa Dudin who leads the moderate camp in the area. The soldiers dispersed them. Dudin is guarded by a special force following reports of threats to his life. A sit-down strike was staged in the Bethlehem municipal building by 100 students. The strikers agitated against the leaders of the rural association who, in their opinion, will put up with the civilian administration. On the surface of things it all seems calm but there is no doubt that the civilian administration idea has confused the system. In the meantime no change has been effected in the structure of the military authorities so that only in the future, when the civilian administration's machinery works, will the interaction between the two camps--the administration on the one hand and the local population on the other--become clear. BIRTHRATE DECREASE--The Israeli birth rate will be very low this year--the lowest since the state was established. This was reported by the director of the Central Bureau of Statistics, Dr Moshe Siqron. This year only 11,000 people will immigrate to Israel, whereas more than 20,000 will emigrate from it. Last year, more people left the country than entered for the first time in 28 years. It is estimated that since the state was created, 300,000 Israelis have left it. At the same time, the fertility rate has also gone down and there were less marriages and more divorces. By the end of the year 3,976,000 persons will reside in the country, even though the forecast had predicted 4 million. [Text] [TA041331 Jerusalem Domestic Service in Hebrew 1200 GMT 4 Nov 81]

HEBRON HILLS SETTLEMENTS--Beersheba, 2 Nov--A regional settlement of 400 families will soon be established in the Yattir Bloc in the southern slopes of the Hebron Hills. It will be established by the agriculturalists union and is part of the plan which involves the establishment of six settlements in the area. It has been reported from the agriculturalists union that the approval for the establishment of the settlement was given by the chairman of the ministerial committee on settlement affairs, Simha Ehrlich, and the Jewish agency's land settlement department. The nucleus that will reside in the settlement has been in existence since 1979 and currently numbers approximately 100 families which plan to establish light industry there as well as science-based industry and recreational facilities. The nucleus will set up temporary camp in (Ardon) in the Yattir forest and the establishment of a permanent settlement will be carried out simultaneously. The director of the agriculturalists union settlement department, Mr Mikha Golan, has reported that the union plans to establish two to three settlements in the Yattir bloc and the 'Arad Valley. Ten other settlements are also planned or in existence, in the Galilee, the Golan Heights and around Nahal 'Iron. [Text] [TA021953 Tel Aviv ITIM in Hebrew 1650 GMT 2 Nov 81]

NO AIRCRAFT ENGINE MODIFICATION--At this stage, despite the difficulties that have cropped up in the negotiations with the U.S. company, Pratt and Whitney, which manufactures the Lavi aircraft engine, there is no intention of again modifying it. Some months ago it was decided that a Pratt and Whitney-made engine will be mounted on the aircraft and not a General Electric one. A change of that decision resulted in an unnecessary expenditure of some $7 million. The Defense Ministry is interested in having Pratt and Whitney invest in the Bet Shemesh engine plant, where the Lavi engine will be manufactured. The negotiations with that company have run into some difficulties because of the latter's fear of making large investments in an Israeli plant. The company managers similarly fear possible reactions in Arab countries that purchase goods it produces. Senior Pratt and Whitney representatives have recently visited Israel and the president of the company will soon arrive here to continue the discussions. EXPORTS DOWN--Since the start of the year there has been an increase of less than 2 percent in exports, which is to say a real-term decline of about 10 percent. The largest decrease was in the export of clothing, textiles and diamonds. In contrast, there was a significant growth in exports in the metals, electronics and minerals branches. These data were issued today by the Ministry of Industry and Commerce. [Text] [Jerusalem Domestic Service in Hebrew 1600 GMT 1 Nov 81 TA]

ANTI-WITHDRAWAL GROUP--A branch of the movement to halt the withdrawal in Sinai has been established at Ofira, following a visit there last week by MK Ge'ula Kohen. This reporter has learned that 20 Ofira residents have so far signed up

as members of the movement. This branch will work in cooperation with the movement's main headquarters, located in Moshav Sadot in the Yamit District. The chairman of the Ofira resident's committee, Ya'acov Barlevy, said in reaction that this matter did not bother him or the majority of Ofira's residents, who will leave in April 1982, as planned. SINAI FORCE CAMPS--The U.S. companies constructing the camps for the Sinai multinational force will employ 498 Israeli workers. At first they wanted to bring 900 Thais to do that job. As a result of pressure by the employment service, backed by Histadrut Secretary General MK Yeruham Meshel, it was finally agreed to employ 498 Israelis, of whom 326 be employed in Etan and 172 in Ofira. The employment service is preparing to recruit the workers from the Negev development towns. So far it has succeeded in enlisting only 208 workers and it looks as though it will have difficulty in meeting with employment quota. The main difficulty is in finding manpower to work in Ofira. Employment service director general Barukh Haqlay has asked the U.S. companies to build living facilities for the workers in Ofira, hoping he would thus be able to fill the remaining vacancies. The foreign contractors have made it clear that if the employment service does not supply the required number of employees, they will immediately bring in 150 workers from Thailand in the first stage. LABOR, MAPAM RECONCILED--Labor Party chairman Shim'on Peres says differences with alignment partner MAPAM have been laid to rest. Peres met MAPAM leader Victor Shem-tov in Tel Aviv following this week's vote in the Knesset, in which MAPAM broke ranks and proposed sending a joint mission with the Likud to the United States to argue against the Saudi peace plan. It was agreed that the incident was exceptional and not characteristic of the long-time partnership between Labor and the smaller, leftwing MAPAM. INVESTMENT STRATEGIES, PROBLEMS OF 1980'S DISCUSSED

Beirut AL-IQTISAD WA AL-A'MAL in Arabic Jun 81 p 66

[Article: "Hikmat al-Nashashibi, director general of Kuwaiti International Investment Company: 'Arabs Will Turn To Direct Lending So Let Us Prepare Capabilities and Expertise'"]

[Text] Arab investments, the challenges of the 1980's and the role of Arab financial institutions are the focus of the following interview conducted by AL-IQTISAD WA AL-A'MAL with Hikmat al-Nashashibi.

Al-Nashashibi says that the accumulation rate of the financial surpluses of the major Arab oil exporting countries requires the formulation of comprehensive plans and strategies for the investment process to insure its effectiveness and vitality. The countries with surpluses must remain in constant contact with the various developments occurring within these vast accumulated resources. These resources vary from time to time in terms of the ideal outlet they make available, in terms of the location and form of this outlet and in terms of its maturation time and other aspects. All these contain a number of complex economic and non-economic considerations which must be taken into account to reach the correct investment decision. Moreover, the formulation of plans and strategies for the Arab investments abroad requires the investors to keep in regular touch with the broad dimensions of the international investment arena. When selecting a specific investment in a certain sector and a certain country, the investors may overlook another investment in another place, in a different form and with a different maturation period--all of which could have an impact on the investment decision taken.

Al-Nashashibi points out that the future trends indicate clearly that the monies of the [oil] producers will accumulate rapidly because it is expected that the OPEC surpluses, estimated at $168 billion at the end of 1978, will exceed $300 billion by the end of 1980, $450 billion by the end of 1982 and $550 billion by the end of 1985. The major part of these accumulated surpluses will belong to the Arab oil exporting countries. Moreover, this rate of surplus accumulation will push the issue of planning Arab foreign investments in the 1980's to a high place on the ladder of priorities concerning the short, medium and long-term plans which are of high importance to the future of the Arab world.

Al-Nashashibi asserts that this will be the result of not only the accumulated Arab financial surpluses but also a direct result of the fundamental changes in the international borrowing markets, keeping in mind that these markets did absorb the major part of Arab foreign investments in the 1970's.

But despite the difficulties and pressures arising from time to time, the international markets succeeded in the period from 1973-79 in realizing a major accomplishment, namely in recycling oil surpluses efficiently and in acting as middlemen in financing the deficits in the balances of payment of both advanced and developing countries in a manner exceeding all expectations. During the 1973-79 period, these markets were able to loan a net sum of $640 billion to numerous borrowers. Developing non-OPEC members acquired $150 billion from this sum.

Al-Nashashibi further says that it seems that the 1980's will not have the long-lasting momentum of the 1970's. It seems in this regard that the international lending markets will not be able in the 1980's to absorb the oil financial surpluses at the rates and in the dimensions prevalent in the 1970's. The international banks have approached the maximum permissible limit in expanding their borrowing purses in accordance with the sound banking tradition. This raises the question of whether the capacity of these banks will absorb future loans at the rates prevalent previously. Moreover, the capital of these banks is currently subjected to constant pressure when compared with the size of their operations. Therefore, it is logical to speculate that a large part of the accumulated surpluses will be invested directly by the oil exporters outside the system of the international financial market.

Kuwaiti International as Example

There is no better indication that the Arab financial institutions have begun to undertake direct lending operations than the results realized by the Kuwaiti International Investment Company last year and in the preceding years. The company's net profit amounted to 5.1 million Kuwaiti dinars at the end of 1980 compared to 4 million dinars at the end of 1979, i.e., with an increase of 25 percent. Moreover, the company's general budget has grown to 142 million dinars and the shareholders' net rights have amounted to 37 million Kuwaiti dinars.

These positive results have been realized despite the sharp fluctuations experienced by the local and international lending markets and by the interest rates and currency prices.

In this respect, the company has realized accomplishments embodied in its management of 36 international bond issues with a total value of $2.4 billion.

This is actually a record figure when compared with the company's accomplishments in this sphere in the preceding years. It is also a record figure when we learn that the volume of all the various bond issues offered in the international bond market did not exceed $24 billion in 1980.

Al-Nashashibi adds: "One of the fundamental services which the Kuwaiti International Investment Company has been eager to offer since 1976 is that of managing investment purses on behalf of the clients."

INVESTMENT FIRM OUTLINES POLICIES, ACCOMPLISHMENTS

Beirut AL-IQTISAD WA AL-A'MAL in Arabic Jun 81 pp 62-63

[Article: "Samir Khanshat, director of Investments at al-Shariqah Group: 'We Are Trying to Wrench Arab Investors Away From Swiss and U.S. Banks'"]

[Text] When al-Shariqah Group was founded in 1976, its founders, led by Shaykh Nasir Sabah al-Ahmad, never thought that it would constitute a turning point in the activities of companies in Kuwait. Only a few years after its foundation, the number of Gulf companies, i.e. companies founded by Kuwaitis, Gulf citizens and other Arabs, have reached 20. Al-Shariqah Group Company was the first. Here is an interview with Samir Khanshat, the company's director of investments, on the Arab investment activity in the Gulf and in the world.

Khanshat has said that this year, the group will bolster its activity and its investment in the Gulf and world markets through three means:

"First, persuade Kuwaiti and Gulf investors who entrust international banks, especially Swiss and U.S. banks, to manage the investment of their monies of our ability to perform this function in a better way and take them away from these banks. This is why we have opened a major investment office in London. This office is tantamount to a small investment bourse specialized in operating outside the Arab countries for Kuwaiti and Arab clients. The group will offer the services offered by the foreign investment banks and firms which manage the monies of Arab investors.

Second, bolster our investment presence by engaging in direct investment inside and outside the Arab countries, whether in terms of our own monies or of the monies of our clients. We will invest these monies either according to the wishes and instructions of our clients or according to our investment method and strategy.

Third, enter the Gulf money market as a financial consultant offering financial advice and planning to our clients, both individuals and firms, lending them money, building their relations with others or performing the role of middleman by arranging loans for them from local or foreign sources.

Khanshat has also pointed out that al-Shariqah Group's inclination to sell expertise enables the company to avoid "putting all the eggs in one basket," namely the basket of investments. This requires us to devote attention to individuals and to Arab capital owners, especially Kuwaiti capital owners.

International Investment

Regarding the inclination to invest internationally, the director of investments in al-Shariqah Group has said: "There are difficulties facing investors in all parts of the world generally. The international economic conditions dictate investment diversification so as to spread the risks from which nobody, regardless of how competent, is safe. This requires the investor to enter other and new spheres. Because of the fluctuations in the international economic situation, the investor is required to adopt a flexible investment policy that enables him to benefit from the high interest rate on the dollar, the rising real estate and land prices and from other spheres that realize a balance. So, should the interest rate drop, it would be possible to benefit from bonds and from real estate investment, for example. Should one sector experience a decline, then this can be made up for from a leap in another sector. This is an approach whereby we do not put 'all the eggs in one basket.'"

Far East

Regarding the official and private Kuwaiti turn toward the Far East, Khanshat said: "This inclination is taking the form of direct investment in production projects through the purchase of shares and through partnership in such projects."

Khanshat also said: "What distinguishes the Asian countries is that their economy is a free economy, and this provides the freedom needed by investors, whereas the investment conditions in Europe have changed and have become extremely difficult. The laws are complex, the taxes are rising, labor is expensive, labor laws are strict and have no mercy for the investor and the laws protecting the employees increase the burden to the foreign projects and plants set up in Europe.

"As for the Far East, economic growth has reached the phase where industry needs investments in order to meet the international demand at a cost lower than that of Europe and the United States and to enter international competition." But Khanshat adds: "However, we feel that the advantages we are getting in the Asian countries are on their way to disappearing because the costs of investment in these countries are rising daily."

At Arab and Local Levels

Khanshat said: "We are cautious in getting involved in speculation against the other Gulf companies engaged in activities similar to ours. The Gulf investment companies must increase their investments in the Gulf area. Despite the presence of risks to investments in most of the Arab countries, there are, however, big opportunities, especially in the Arab Maghreb countries. Distribution of investment among the Arab countries may be a solution that will reduce these risks."

Khanshat further added: "We manage our investments by ourselves, thus overstepping middlemen, because our expertise has reached a high international level only three of the eight employees we have in our London office are British whereas most of these employees are supposed to be British, considering that they are more capable than others of understanding the London market."

Khanshat has also expressed the belief that investing in long-term securities is not beneficial and that it is better for Arabs to invest in technology and in transferring it to Kuwait and the Arab world.

Khanshat also said that the Gulf governments are now dealing with private and semi-private national firms to do their investment for them. We hope to realize this at the level of both governments and individuals to curtail the major role of foreign banks in the investment and reinvestment of Arab money.

He added that the Kuwaiti banks are preoccupied with improving their commercial operations and services and expanding their activities in Kuwait, London, the Far East and, finally, the United States. Meanwhile, these banks shun any investment role, thus leaving the arena free for the Swiss and U.S. banks.

The director of investments in al-Shariqah Group has said that the company's offices in the world, which are linked by computer, will play a prominent role in enabling us to "pull the rug" out from under the feet of the foreigners so that our investment department may turn into something very similar to an international bank that gives us the opportunity to enter into investment operations that are faster than those of foreign banks.

Stocks

Concerning investment in stocks, Khanshat has said that the stock market is currently going through a phase of stagnation. But fortunately, our investments in stocks are few, especially when compared with the investments of the other Gulf and Kuwaiti firms.

Regarding industrial investment inside and outside Kuwait, Khanshat said: "Our investment purse contains various projects, including, for example, a company [plant] for construction materials in Oman. We are currently studying a plan to set up a company for lumber industries in Kuwait and other projects in the Arab countries."

Speaking of the inclination toward direct investment, Khanshat said: "It is important inside and outside the Arab countries because it is long-term investment, especially in industries and projects where we do not expect a quick profit when we set up such industries or projects. If our ownership of the percentage of such a plant or project is high, then we participate in the board of directors and in making the firm's policy, such as in the case of the batteries plant in Jordan and the tiles plant in Sharjah. Moreover, we are participants in several banks."

Khanshat further said that the 1979 profits amounted to $14.5 million whereas the 1980 profits amounted to $19.5 million. This represents an increase of 34 percent in the profits.

The profit of the Group's stocks amounted in 1980 to 23 percent of the paid capital. Moreover, we distributed 10 percent in grant stocks and 7.5 percent in cash profits.

BENEFITS OF ISLAMIC SYSTEM DISCUSSED

Beirut AL-IQTISAD WA AL-A'MAL in Arabic Jun 81 pp 60-61

[Interview With Ahmad Bazi' al-Yasin, hairman of Kuwaiti Financing House Company by Al-IQTISAD WA AL-A'MAL: "It Is Possible To Do Away With Usurious Banking System; We Are Inclined to Open Branches Abroad; We Deal With Usurious Banks, But in Accordance With Islamic Method"; date and place not specified]

[Text] The Kuwaiti Financing House Company, a bank founded in 1977 to operate in accordance with the Islamic Shari'a, is an experiment that has drawn the attention of the Kuwaiti and Arab banking circles since it was initiated.

AL-IQTISAD WA AL-A'MAL has had this interview with Ahmad Bazi' al-Yasin, the chairman of the company's Board of Directors and its appointed member, who has reviewed the experiment, its particulars and its accomplishments.

[Question] After 3 years since the start of the Kuwaiti Financing House's operations, can the experiment be evaluated despite its newness?

[Answer] The past 4 years were supposed to be a phase of foundation during which the establishment is not held accountable for results. But we have realized unexpected success since the start of operations. This is due to the desire of the Muslim Kuwaiti public to avoid dealing with usurious banks.

In the first 4 months, the Financing House opened 5,000 accounts with deposits amounting to 21 million Kuwaiti dinars. The total budget amounted to 26.7 million dinars at the end of 1978, to 81.5 million dinars at the end of 1979 and to 180.7 million dinars at the end of 1980.

The monies invested by the Financing House have amounted to the following: 90.6 million dinars in 1978; 62.5 million in 1978 [presumably meaning 1979] and 137.2 million in 1980.

[Question] How does the Financing House Operate?

[Answer] The Financing House conducts all banking operations, with the exception of lending and borrowing because it doesn't deal in interest. The depositors' relationship with the bank is the relationship of a commercial partner who shares both profit and loss with the partner.

We follow two ways of investment: First, direct investment and, second, investment with others in specific and well-defined projects that are of general social benefit. This condition is fundamental.

[Question] What is the aspect of similarity between the investment banks in the industrial countries and the Islamic banks?

[Answer] There is similarity insofar as a large part of the banking operations is concerned. As for the difference, it lies in the fact that the investment banks and firms invest their monies in stocks and collect interest for their investment whereas the Islamic banks focus on direct investment and partnership. There are two observations: First, an Islamic bank is founded on the spirit of solidiarity between itself and the depositors on the one hand and itself and the partners on the other. Second, an Islamic bank engages in specific and clearcut investment operations, contrary to the investment banks and firms which measure matters by usury and interest rates. It is of no concern to them where the monies are invested, whether in nightclubs, alcohol distilleries or in the production of destructive weapons, as long as the capital and the interest are guaranteed.

[Question] Do you intend to open branches abroad?

[Answer] We look forward to opening branches abroad, considering that the sphere of investment in the Kuwaiti market is very limited. However, the Financing House is still in the initial stages of development. At the start, it is better for us to establish ourselves firmly in the local market, despite the strong demand and the constant increase in the bank's resources.

[Question] Can you give us some details on how the depositors' monies are invested?

[Answer] The bank [House] invests its monies in profitable projects which have a social dimension, such as real estate and housing projects. It also deals in commodity trading, including cars. Moreover, we participate in some industrial projects.

We have laid down an investment rule. We invest 70 percent of the resources in short-term investments and 30 percent in medium- and long-range investments. We invest 60 percent of the saving deposits and retain 40 percent of them for liquidity. We also invest 80 percent of the 1-year deposit accounts, retaining the rest for liquidity, and 90 percent of the deposit accounts for an indefinite term, retaining the remaining 10 percent for liquidity.

[Question] What is the profit rate for deposits in 1980 and in the preceding years and have these rates been better than the local and international interest rates?

[Answer] In 1980, the average profit for the saving accounts amounted to 6.75 percent, for the 1-year deposit accounts to 9 percent and for the long-term deposit accounts 10 and 1/8 percent. As I have already pointed out, the obvious difference in the profit rates is the result of the duration of the deposits. The longer the duration of the deposit, the bigger the investment opportunity we get and the bigger the profit grows.

[Question] You have said that the Financing House doesn't borrow or lend. What, then, is the resale [al-murabahah] system?

[Answer] The Financing House advances no loans to individuals or organizations unless they are charity loans, i.e. loans for the purpose of assistance. This is out of the question at present due to the House's level. As for the resale system, it is one of the well-known Islamic systems and is based fundamentally on importing the commodity [by the House] and selling it to the client at a profit rate set by the client in advance. The client then repays the value of the commodity to the House within a period of no more than 6 months.

[Question] Is the Islamic banking system fit to be an alternative to the current banking system or does it complement the current system?

[Answer] The Islamic banking system is a good alternative to the usurious banking system. Contrary to what some people believe, the world can do away with the latter system and turn toward the Islamic banking system which has achieved unparalleled success in numerous Muslim countries. It is my opinion that the adoption of this system will lead to eliminating economic chaos in the world.

[Question] Does the Financing House deal with the other Kuwaiti banks?

[Answer] It is regrettable that usurious banks are the rule in all parts of the world and Islamic banks are the exception. Until Islamic banks spread in the various countries, we are compelled to deal with the usurious banks, but in accordance with our Islamic method. I would like to point out that major international banks have studied our system and have shown understanding toward it. I would also like to point out that Pakistan has made all its banks operate in accordance with the Islamic Shari'a.

PILOTS TRAIN IN FRANCE--Another group of Libyan pilots and technicians has arrived in France in the last few days for advanced training on the Mirage-5 aircraft. The members of the group have been housed in the city of Bayonne, in the southwestern part of the country. Last night a report was made about a group of approximately 60 Libyan pilots and technicians who are staying in Biarritz, getting advanced courses in the main Dassault plant. These reports have received no official confirmation from Paris. Political circles in the French capital this evening told our correspondent that if it transpires that the reports are accurate Mitterrand's socialist government will be very much ill at ease, as it is demanding that the Libyan leader remove his forces from Chad. Paris had, however, already announced in the past that it would continue to honor the commitments undertaken by all the previous governments, even though some delays may occur in the dispatches to Libya. DEBATE HELD ON SECURITY MEASURES

Khartoum SUNA DAILY BULLETIN in English 1 Oct 81 pp 5-6

[Text] Khartoum, Oct 1 (SUNA)--The Society of Law, University of Khartoum, organized here Tuesday evening a debate on the recent measures taken against vagrants and tramps in Khartoum Province.

A number of lawyers took part along with the Deputy Chief of the State Security.

Advocate Taha Ibrahim said the measures were governed by a number of codes, the Constitution, the Criminal Procedures Act, the State Security Act and the Police Act.

He said the measures could not be described as legal in view of Article 41 of the Constitution.

Deputy Chief of the State Security Kamal Hassan said the measures were dictated by the fact that the Capital has been overcrowded with vagrants and refugees who had deserted their camps. He said the armed crime was another cause of the measures besides trafficking in arms and unlicenced buildings.

Hassan said the detainees were given appropriate medical care and that tens of them were allowed to go to the hospitals. He said the measures were taken according to the State Security Act and that the detainees would be given jobs at the development projects.

Out of the 17,617 detainees only 5,600 have remained in custody, he further proclaimed.

He described the campaign as a success and that there was a remarkable drop in crime rate.

Hassan also confirmed that the law and the Constitution were observed.

Advocate Mustafa Abdel Gadir criticized the measures and said reference should always be made to the Constitution.

Ustaza Asma Mahmoud Mohamed Taha said the measures were dictated by the prevailing conditions and the need to guard the nation against the communist moves around us.

The opposition is unrealistic when it criticizes the current measures and this opposition's sole aim is to jump to power, Asma said.

Advocate Ali Osman Mohamed Taha said the Government has the right to apply the laws and that it should at the same time respect the humanity of citizens.

He indicated the decline of production and described it as a shame.

Advocate Abdalla Salih described the measures as illegal and unconstitutional and said the security forces could have monitered aliens and vagrants without the need to make arrests.

ILLEGAL ARMS DEALERS ARRESTED

Khartoum SUNA DAILY BULLETIN in English 28 Sep 81 p 1

[Text] Khartoum, Sep 28 (SUNA)--Unlicensed firearms were seized and arms dealers were arrested by security authorities here last week.

Small arms were captured while being moved by cabs, pickups or trucks at different places within the three-town capital and at highway check-points.

The arms were seized during the current campaign aimed at clearing capital from vagrants, pedlars and jobless persons.

The most recent catch was made last Thursday in Omdurman suburb of Um Badda where nine G-3 rifles, five Klashinkov, 545 G-3 bullets and 1,655 Klashenkov bullets were found in a taxi and a pickup. Owners who were arrested later told interrogators that they bought the arms from the eastern Sudanese border.

The captured arms totalled 22 G-3 rifles, 12 Klashinkovs, two sub-machine guns and two pistols plus a considerable quantity of ammunition.

The Defence Minister General Abdel Magid Hamid Khalil has promised financial reward to any civilian who informs the authorities of illegal arms or arms dealers.

A reward of 1,000 Sudanese pounds was distributed to the owner, driver and assistant driver of a truck found earlier this month loaded with firearms destined for sale in western Sudan.

The owners of truck-load also said they brought the arms from eastern Sudan.

BRIDGE PLANNED--Tenders for the construction of Bussari bridge will be opened during next month. The bridge will have a vital economic importance because it links the provinces of Bahr El Ghazal and Eastern Equatoria. The bridge is financed at 2 1/2 million Dutch marks extended by the German Federal Republic. [Text] [Khartoum SUNA DAILY BULLETIN in English 10 Oct 81 p 7]

TAX ON EMIGRE WORKERS--Khartoum, Oct. 1 (SUNA)--An income tax, equivalent to the Sudanese employees wage taxes, will be imposed on Sudanese Government employees seconded to work abroad, stated a provisional order issued by President Nimeri yesterday. The order, which is an amendment of the Income Tax Act 1981, also imposed a 10% income tax on Sudanese expatriates. It is noteworthy that the amendment came in response to the desire of the Sudanese nationals working abroad, as expressed during the recent expatriates conference, to take part in achieving development and prosperity of the country. PRICE COURTS BEGIN WORK--Khartoum, Sep 29 (SUNA)--Prices' courts began dispatching duties here yesterday. Khartoum 2 court sentences a confectioner for three months imprisonment and a fine of LS100 for not posting the prices' list. A bread seller was fined LS50 for selling bread at more than the legal price. The court was chaired by Col. El Amin El Zubeir El Tahir. Khartoum souk's court fined a shop owner, who had not posted the prices' list, LS50 or one month imprisonment. The court sent a bread seller to jail for six months because he was selling bread at more than the legal price. The court was chaired by Col. Mohd. Awad Mustafa. Khartoum North court suspended sentences on two cases on weight violation. [Text] [Khartoum SUNA DAILY BULLETIN in English 29 Sep 81 p 5] Khartoum, Oct. 2 (SUNA)--Prices courts here yesterday issued hard sentences of imprisonment, fines and flogging. SUNA toured the courts and followed up the various cases of law breaking. A shop-keeper was sentenced for three months for selling a tin of powdered milk at 210 p.t., which was above the legal price. Another shop-keeper was sentenced for three months because he had not posted the prices list. A soft drinks seller was flogged 25 lashes for selling a glass of grape juice at 15 p.t. Several other persons received sentences varying from six-month imprisonment to 25 lashes for other similar violations while others were fined between L.S.100 to L.S.50. PRC TRADE OFFICIAL VISITS--Khartoum, Sep 29 (SUNA)--Transport Minister Mustafa Osman Hassan met here yesterday with the visiting People's China External Economic Relations Deputy Minister and the accompanying delegation. Hassan briefed the delegation on his ministry's activity. On the other hand, the delegation expressed its appreciation for the great role played by the Ministry in the field of transport in the Sudan. The delegation further expressed the readiness of the People's China government to extend all possible assistance to the transport sector in the Sudan. LIBYA, ETHIOPIA, PDRY PACT SEEN AS REACTION TO GCC

[Article by Nuhad al-Mashnuq: "The Aden Summit Meeting Is for Those Excluded by the GCC"]

[Excerpt] The Soviets Are Assembling Their Cards in the Red Sea Area.

A Summit Meeting for the Steadfastness Countries in Libya, Even If Algeria Does Not Come.

Arab diplomatic sources say that President Anwar al-Sadat's visit to Washington publicly assumed the nature of discussions concerning the Middle East crisis and the Palstinian autonomy talks, but that the visit was actually mostly for the purpose of discussing the Libyan situation and how to work toward achieving the down fall of Col Qadhdhafi, the Libyan head of state.

Faced with this situation, what could Col Qadhdhafi do? 'Ali Nasir Muhammad, head of state of South Yemen, did not wait for [improvement in] the atmosphere [among the Arab countries] before starting to work on the holding of the Aden summit meeting. He clearly began to prepare for it a long time ago. He did not do this on the basis of Soviet advice or approval from the Soviet leaders, but rather on the basis of a request made by the chief Soviet leaders during the Soviet Communist Party's 26th Congress which was attended by the South Yemeni head of state. This is what Eastern-bloc diplomatic sources in Beirut say. Since the formation of the Gulf Cooperation Council [GCC], which includes six Gulf nations and excludes the two Yemens and Iraq, 'Ali Nasir Muhammad has been working on the creation of a new political and geographical equation. He signed a mutual friendship treaty with Ethiopia last February and has sought out his comrades in the Steadfastness and Confrontation Front in order to discuss his plan with them.

Alliance of the Excluded

The reactions to the plan were not negative, although the Steadfastness nations, with the exception of Libya, were not invited to this meeting. The subject of discussion was the Red Sea area, although the GCC nations found, in their unity, support for them and their policy toward the Western nations. What is wrong with such nations, which have been excluded on the basis of their friendship with the Soviet Union, forming a political bloc which both strengthens and supports them?

Aden worked on the preparation of a draft agreement for political, economic, and military cooperation between the three countries. The most important thing in the political part of the draft agreement is that it emphasizes the rejection by these countries of the presence of American military bases in the Horn of Africa, the Arabian Peninsula, and North Africa, demonstrates that these three nations are against the reactionary political, military and security alliances in Africa and the Arab world, and intensifies these countries' alliance with the progressive and socialist countries of the world.

In the economic realm, the draft agreement calls for mutual material aid among the three countries so that they can carry out their plans having to do with development. Naturally Libya has already begun to immediately grant aid to the other two countries.

As for the military and security realm, the agreement calls for cooperation in all rspects against the activities of imperialist, Zionist, and reactionary circles.

There is no doubt that the most important part of this agreement between these three countries was not made public. However, a glance at the map shows that they constitute a triangle, the sides of which surround the coastlines of Saudi Arabia, North Yemen, the Sudan, Egypt, and Somalia.

Ethiopia's Role

This does not mean that the nations which are located within the sides of this triangle--especially Saudi Arabia--are being endangered by this alliance. However, the exploitation of weak spots is something which is legitimate in the field of political action. Those associated with the summit meeting believe that the Sudan, North Yemen, and Somalia are weak spots which can be exploited if others contemplate action against one of the nations which took part in the summit meeting.

Eastern-bloc diplomatic circles in Beirut say that one of the results of the Aden summit meeting has been a commitment by Mengistu, the Ethiopian head of state, to move militarily against the Sudan if the Sudan tries to undertake any action against Libya. Thus the leader of Libya has made part of his border secure after relations between Ethiopia and the Sudan had been undergoing a positive development due to the Sudan's role in the Eritrean question. If it had not been for 'Ali Nasir Muhammad's efforts, this positive devlopment in [Ethiopian-Sudanese] relations would have had a negative effect on Ethiopian-Libyan relations. This is why they say that the Aden summit meeting has achieved a strategic polarization with regard to the Red Sa area, and what is needed is to transfer this example to other areas in the Arab world.

Leftist Palestinian sources assure us that, in principle, the summit meeting of the Steadfastness and Confrontation states will be held in Libya after the 1 September celebrations which all will be attending, even though the Algerian president, Chadli Bendjedid, might not come.

ARAB STEEL PRODUCTION CAPABILITIES EXAMINED

London 8 DAYS in English No 43, 31 Oct 81 pp 44-45

[Text] AS MORE and more Arab states accord priority to building up indigenous iron and steel industries to lessen their dependence on imports necessary to industrial development, the Algiers-based Arab Iron and Steel Metallurgical Institute (IASM) is playing an increasingly important role.

It has already established an iron, steel and metallurgical documentation centre and is setting up an iron and steel data bank for the Arab world. The final stage of its plan is to open a technical and economic studies department capable of providing Arab states with the latest technical data and market analyses.

'We were surprised to learn that information on the metal industry in the Arab world simply did not circulate from one country to another, so that economic planners in Algeria, for instance, were practically in the dark about the plans of their colleagues in Saudi Arabia,' Djaffar Salah, IASM's director, told 8 Days.

The importance to Arab countries of developing their iron and steel industries was underlined at a conference in Doha in spring, sponsored by the Gulf Organisation for Industrial Consultation (GOIC). It reviewed progress over the past two decades, laid plans for growth during the 1980s and laid down the principles of a common strategy for broadening inter-state cooperation.

Saudi Arabia, the UAE, Iraq, Kuwait, Oman, Bahrain and Qatar took part in the conference. All seven have made substantial progress in developing their capacity for producing iron and steel, but are still falling short of the region's rapidly climbing demand. Their combined production capacity is estimated at present at about 1.25m tonnes per year (t/y), while imports of steel products has been averaging 5m t/y over the past three years. The gap between local production and demand is likely to widen as the pace of Middle East development quickens.

Recognising that only a concerted effort to upgrade Gulf steel production infrastructure during the current decade could prevent the growth of costly imports, the Doha conference recommended that the seven states should strive to produce at least 60 per cent of their projected 10m t/y needs by 1990. Although the will to develop regional cooperation was evident, it seems that the 60 per cent target remains out of reach.

The problems facing the aspiring Gulf iron and steel manufacturers also affect other Middle Eastern states such as Syria, Jordan and Egypt, as well as North African countries such as Libya, Tunisia, Algeria and Morocco. Under the supervision of the Algerian ministry of heavy industry, IASM is helping to solve one of the most important of these problems, exchange of information.

'Since our documentation service started functioning some years back, we have a much clearer picture of what is really going on in different Arab countries,' says Salah. The institute is now in regular contact with most steel producing factories in the Arab world, keeping close tabs on current operations as well as future projects.

Salah believes that building up a powerful Arab metallurgical industry is absolutely essential. 'In the not too distant past, Arab economic planners were not agreed on the fact that heavy industry — like iron and steel factories — was the essential building block necessary for the construction of an integrated and rational industrial infrastructure,' he says. 'Now, however, a general consensus has started to emerge, and even Gulf economic experts feel that dependence on imported metal products could constitute a [illegible]ious brake on development prospects.'

'Without a doubt,' says Salah, 'during the first phase of iron and steel production in the industrialising Arab world, costs are liable to be higher than in the industrialised world. It is not likely that Algeria's El Hadjar steelworks, for example, could produce a tonne of steel as economically as Nippon Steel or US Steel. But we must not lose sight of the fact that a number of factors, which can be gradually overcome, condition the high-cost production structure in Arab and Third World countries. Factories in these countries must often pay inflated bills for imported technology and expatriate personnel.'

The IASM director, nonetheless, is optimistic about the future. 'Let's not forget that industrialisation is a long-term affair, and as Arab producers achieve a better mastery over the industrial cycle of iron and steel, their costs will be considerably trimmed. I would even say that given the escalating cost of ocean transport, domestically produced metal products in the Arab world will be increasingly competitive with foreign production by the end of the century.'

Salah is very sceptical about the effects of the transfer of technology from western steelmakers to the Arab world. 'These companies are interested in maintaining their monopoly over key production processes, and talk of effective technology transfer rarely is translated into reality,' Salah says.

He believes that only by training Arab personnel in iron and steel production techniques can extensive dependence on foreign firms be limited. He points out that the Tunisian steelworks in the northern part of the country at Menzel Bourguiba is now entirely staffed by Tunisian workers, technicians and engineers.

Salah thinks that Algerian experience in industrialisation could help other Arab countries avoid some of the shortcomings of cooperation with western firms. Instead of turnkey factories, Algeria imposes 'product in hand' contracts which oblige foreign companies to train local personnel and ensure that the plant functions according to specifications before pulling out.

'The Arab world could even become a net exporter of steel products by the end of the century, especially to sub-Saharan Africa,' says Salah. Already Tunisia, Algeria and Egypt are exporting — even to Western Europe — a number of steel products. With cheaper Arab labour this trend could be amplified.

Salah is firmly convinced that expansion will be the watchword for Arab iron and steel ventures in the next two decades. He listed a number of new schemes planned in the Gulf:

- Bahrain: a 25,000 t/y bar plant to convert scrap metal is now under construction.
- Kuwait: a feasibility study for a 100,000 t/y bar rolling mill has been completed by the Kuwaiti Industrial Bank, and awaits the go-ahead from the government.
- Oman: the sultanate is expected to approve an iron and steel plant with a production capacity of 400,000 t/y of sponge iron, of which 150,000 t/y would be earmarked for the manufacture of rolled products such as bars. A feasibility study is thought to have impressed the Omani government.
- UAE: Abu Dhabi has commissioned a feasibility study for a 500,000–900,000 t/y iron and steel complex, producing sponge ● Saudi Arabia: by far the most ambitious regional project is the Jubail steelworks, under the aegis of the Saudi Iron and Steel Company. The initial production target calls for 850,000 t/y of billets to supply downstream rolling mills. Facilities will include two direct iron ore reduction modules for producing sponge iron, a gas desulphurisation plant, a pelletisation mill and a 400,000-tonne ore storage yard. Total investment is put at Saudi riyals 2bn ($585m).

MINISTER OF EDUCATION INTERVIEWED ON BASIC INSTRUCTION PROGRAM

Algiers EL DJEICH in French No 220, Sep 81 pp 7-9

[Interview with Mohamed Cherif Kherroubi, minister of education and basic instruction; date and place not given]

[Text] Basic instruction, now in its second year, is one of the most important decisions concerning education made by the political leaders.

Given the importance of this institution, Mohamed Cherif Kherroubi, member of the Central Committee and minister of education and basic instruction, was interviewed.

The interview dealt with methods of applying this new system of education, its goals and prospects and the means used.

Basic instruction was not instituted in order to provide a solution to the problem of bilingualism, but in addition, to extend compulsory education from six to nine consecutive years and thereby create, based on an analysis of the negative points of the old system, a balance between educational systems, the demands of development and the country's real conditions.

We are convinced that this new orientation will enable us to kill two birds with one stone: By taking advantage of the resource which our young people signify, we shall correct the country's lack of skilled technical workers and put an end to the educational "waste" that fills our streets every year.

[Question] Mr Minister, basic instruction was instituted in order to solve the problem of bilingualism in education. How is its application progressing and what problems have you encountered?

[Answer] Basic instruction was not instituted solely for the purpose of solving this problem of bilingualism, but also of solving the problems of the young people who leave school at age 14. Compulsory education was six years. Basic instruction now puts it at nine and thereby provides an overall solution: unification of education, extension of schooling and the abolition of the image that idle young people filling the streets created. As education gave them little, they could not fit into active life. On the other hand, after the nine years provided by the basic education, our young people will be old enough and have a solid enough base to permit them either to continue their studies or fit into active life. They will be old enough and have solid knowledge.

With respect to problems, they do exist, but this is completely natural in the case of any change, whether in education or other sectors.

In decreeing the establishment and application of basic instruction, the Central Committee was quite aware of the problems that would arise: first of all, the problem of the school infrastructure, especially since the extension of schooling to nine years demanded further development; second, the retraining of teachers for the new model and new methodology.

For this first year of basic instruction, we proceeded to retrain all the first-year teachers. With respect to inspectors and advisers, whose number has considerably increased (over 1,200), we organized two seminars for them during the year.

We can therefore say that basic education has yielded a new boost and breathed new life into the Ministry of Education and Basic Instruction.

[Question] There can be no doubt that with the application of basic instruction, needs for school facilities, books and personnel will be greater than ever. What have you planned in order to meet these needs?

[Answer] Actually, I have already answered the first part of the question on the infrastructure, but I should like to pose a question also: Is basic instruction in general necessary or not?

In my opinion, it is necessary and we are forced to opt for it if we want to avoid losing in the future that asset which our young people represent. These young people who do not finish school are in the streets, where in one or two years they lose what they have learned because their basic training is not solid enough. Furthermore, as a result of their age, they cannot get jobs or enter the professional training centers.

Between now and 1984, we shall have hundreds of thousands of children in the streets and it is absurd that the education we provide should run counter to the demands of national development. Consequently, basic instruction is a need, whether we like it or not, and we must face up to it if we truly want the democratization of education. We are aware of everything that has to do with the field of education directly or indirectly, and all factors are taken into consideration in the 5-year plan. Concerning the construction of new schools, we have to continue the operation even if we have to use prefabricated buildings. Last year's experience, although for a relatively short period of time, was thoroughly satisfactory.

Concerning textbooks, we have already proceeded to change the content and methodology of the first-year books. Those for the second year have just been finished and will be distributed immediately. The third-year books are being prepared and we are taking the new methods into consideration, methods that we have applied to all subjects taught (languages, figuring) and to the aspect of the psychic and physical development of the child.

Moreover, we are mastering the training of teachers, and in some subjects, it has gone from one to two years, which will make it possible for future teachers to better assimilate the new methodology. In keeping with the new orientation, all governmental organs are fully convinced of the need to work to attract and encourage young people and cadres and consequently, thank heaven, the problem of the lack of teachers will no longer be posed, especially with the large number of high school graduates who will enter the training institutes every year. This year, we trained nearly 13,000. Moreover, we shall have the aid of the young people called up for National Service, who, as soon as they have finished their military instruction, will go into teaching. This contribution will be especially beneficial for the poor wilayate [governorates] in the south and on the high plateaux.

[Question] Will the assignment of young people called up for National Service begin this year?

[Answer] Yes, and that will take place gradually. We have concluded an agreement with the High Commission for National Service: A teacher called up for National Service will be directly assigned to education following his military training.

In this way, they will perhaps be able to train new teachers themselves.

[Question] With the application of the basic instruction, it is expected that in the future, there will be the problem of girls in technical education and their active life subsequently. How do you view this problem?

[Answer] The problem does not actually exist insofar as we already have several professional training centers reserved for girls and the results are substantial. However, the most important point for us is that every boy and girl will acquire, during their nine years of education, the main bases of their chosen technical training, whether it be carpentry, electricity, or whatever.

After that, and in keeping with the program of professional training applied, they will be guided, depending on their inclinations and aptitudes, either toward technical secondary education or professional training. There, they will receive a higher-level education than at present.

Naturally, there will be training centers and technical centers where the specific areas of specializations of girls will be taken into account.

[Question] The orientation has been the center of your concern this year. How are preparations going and how will that orientation take place?

[Answer] From the standpoint of the basic instruction, the academic orientation is the structuring of the democratization of education -- that is, the democratic organization of education by giving democratization its true meaning. Over the course of his nine years, the student serves the apprenticeship of the trade he has chosen for two or three hours a week. For that purpose, every school will have a small workshop. Throughout the nine years, the student is regularly followed through an annual activity record which will subsequently make it possible to analyze his aptitudes and inclinations: theoretical or practical studies, electricity, design or carpentry. In the light of that record, he is guided, after the first nine years, either toward general secondary education, which prepares him to enter the university, or toward the technical lycees from which he will graduate with a diploma orienting him toward the technical and scientific schools or the industrial establishments. Finally, the last outlet are the professional training centers. This is the real structuring of the democratization of education, based on the desires and aptitudes of each pupil.

After these different phases, it is absolutely necessary to create a bond and establish coordination between the different institutions so as to enable deserving students graduating from the training centers to enter the institutions of higher learning and to organize sessions for graduates working in the factories, which will allow them to go to the university. Only in this way will we truly succeed in democratizing education in keeping with the country's conditions. The method we are now using is not democratic at all and I would even say quite frankly that it borders on anarchy. Everyone wants to go to the university. We do not need them. Between now and 1984, we shall have 1 million pupils in the intermediate level of education. Will all of them go on to secondary schools? Will all of that number then go on to the university? If democratization of education is to follow the inclinations and competency of every child, it must also meet the country's needs.

In that way, every student will find a field for his ambition. A student working in the fields or factories and who is excellent and demonstrates his competency will see the doors of the universities and higher institutes open before him.

[Question] Mr Minister, the point concerning orientation is very important. Our view is that of all wali [provincial governors] at their last meeting, to the effect that their governorates are short of skilled workers in technical fields. The future application of this point will therefore respond to their needs.

[Answer] Actually, we are now seeing congestion in some disciplines. For example, there are thousands of jurists, just as there are in the literary disciplines. What are we to do with them? We can therefore say that there is no academic orientation. At a time when we have 4 million children in basic instruction, some 70,000 to 75,000 in higher education, professional training has but 30,000. The rest fill the streets. There is therefore no balance, no harmony. This is not normal.

[Question] In our opinion, Mr Minister, the orientation and distribution of pupils among the different outlets demands a certain coordination with the other ministries involved.

[Answer] That is true. And there are now coordinating commissions between us and the offices of secretary of state for professional training and secondary and technical education. It is necessary to coordinate our efforts in order to plan school programs, needs for professional training and the requirements of general secondary or technical education.

[Question] The problem of methodology and the content of schoolbooks has existed for a long time. A large number of books do not reflect true conditions in Algeria. What do you think of this, Mr Minister?

[Answer] In the new methods that we have introduced, we consider the scientific aspect and the pedagogical aspect and we thereby facilitate the task of the teacher and the pupil. The books must be clear, precise and written in the national language, a language that is not foreign to the child. We have also done away with all that was superfluous, things that only burdened the program from the pedagogical standpoint. Concerning the subject of figuring, it is absurd that children should should continue to count in the traditional way using his fingers or sticks, without using his head.

We have therefore adopted a method that requires the child to use his mental faculties from the very first year of basic instruction. This method is useful for the development of his faculties and accustoms him to reflexion and deduction.

By giving a certain balance to the academic programs, we have given the scientific and expressive aspects their true value. For example, we have introduced a new pedagogical and scientific method in the study of history. The old programs have been done away with because they granted little importance to certain important points of our history. We have also given civic instruction a pedagogical aspect that will enable the child to better understand the attachment to the Arab-Muslim personality.

The same is true of national education in general. We tend to simplify the country's charters in order to give every child a true national education. When he takes up the study of the history of civilization and the experiences of others, he will do so with a true national personality taking the country's circumstances into account.

[Question] Since you speak of the Algerian personality, I believe that the fundamental school can consolidate one of its main component parts, to wit, the national language and the elimination of bilingualism.

[Answer] The problem with bilingualism is that when man invents, he does not invent with his language, and the man who does not invent with his language never does more than imitate.

That is one thing. Furthermore, with the application of basic instruction, we restore trust between the child and his national language and he can study sciences, mathematics, physics, chemistry, and so on, in his language.

Some have said in the past that these subjects could not be taught in Arabic. Today they all are and with a new method, just as with all other subjects. The apprenticeship of foreign languages is also accomplished with a new functional Algerian method.

A language is not learned out of a love for it, but for the benefit one can derive from it. By adding one or two foreign languages to the knowledge of each child, we balance education and prepare a new generation, a generation open to a strong personality, impregnanted with national values, capable of deriving the best from other civilizations and enriching them at the same time. That is the distant goal of basic education.

[Question] A final word?

[Answer] Basic instruction is for everyone because as I have already said, it alone can reflect all problems and all the contradictions which our young people experience. It alone makes it possible to make use of that true resource that is being lost in the streets. Consequently, everyone must make his own contribution. I should like to take advantage of this opportunity to tell parents that basic education is in the interest of their children. It assures them of nine years of school, raises the level of education and also makes it possible to acquire a strong national personality. For its success, we need the aid of all parents. They must trust the ministry, the government and the political leaders who have decided upon this policy, a wise policy capable of solving all their problems.

I would also like to thank teachers and training personnel who have made considerable efforts this year. Our education has now reached a stage where it can create a true education revolution alone, without any foreign aid.

ROMANIAN DELEGATION VISITS--A delegation from Romanian radio and television recently paid a working and friendly visit to Algeria during which it conducted a series of talks with national radio and television officials on cooperation between the two establishments. The two sides agreed to exchange radio and television programs between the two countries and to carry out research in the political, economic and cultural life in the two countries. The Romanian radio and television delegation was received by Algerian Minister of Information and Culture Boualem Bessaiah, in the presence of 'Abd al-Rahman Laghouat, the director general of Algerian Radio and Television. HISTORY OF PAST DECADE IN PEOPLE'S ASSEMBLY DISCUSSED

Cairo AL-AHRAM in Arabic 20 Aug 81 p 6

/Article by 'Abd-al-Jawad 'Ali: "What Does the First Study on the Achievements of the People's Assembly During 10 Rich Years Say?"/

/Text/ The first scientific study on the People's Assembly activity in the course of 10 years rich with activity and achievement reveals that fiscal policy had an effect on social policy, and that although the peace process cut off Arab aid, international aid nonetheless covered this aspect. A transformation in general ideological attitudes also occurred with the demand that the private sector take more extensive part in confronting the basic problems of society, that the policy of economic liberalization be pursued, and that the multi-party system be adopted. This was reflected in the view the government and the members of the People's Assembly had on social reality, as influenced by the housing problem in the first place, in a manner whose effects were consequently reflected on young people hoping to get married. The members of parliament hoped to put a stop to the migration of skilled labor abroad, due to the country's need for them to deal with the deterioration that had afflicted public utilities and was an inevitable consequence of the socialization of education -- which was a main cause of the scarcity of skilled manpower.

Three researchers, Dr 'Ali Laylah, Mrs Ulfat Husayn Agha and Mrs Najwa Husayn Khalil, carried out this study on three stages in the period 1970-1980.

The First Stage: from 1970 to 1973

The study stressed that this period was marked by numerous political changes which occurred among members of the ruling elite. The effect of this was to have repercussions on influential sociopolitical leaders with long-range objectives. This is made clear by the number of cabinets that came to power in this period. With the successive cabinet changes in this period, we find that the average life of cabinets filling the rudder of affairs came to about 8 months -- an extremely short period which is not of much use in carrying out social policies with long-range strategic goals. The basic goals whose slogans are raised by each ministry also vary, and this underlines the lack of continuity in the social policy that each cabinet commits itself to. That is reflected in the fact that the same problems appeared in all these cabinets' statements, but in a more complicated fashion the more we advanced in time.

As a result of all that, these cabinets generally constituted new beginnings which promised great hopes, but the achievements were generally scanty, in view of the time period [required] for social change.

The Effect of Money

In addition, this period was distinguished by an instability in ideological orientation. The effect of this was reflected on social policy; while the main goal of each cabinet used to be to bring about a socialist transformation, this evolved into different goals represented by the attainment of local development, economic liberalization, agricultural development basically to cope with industrial development, and comprehensive planning.

In addition to that, successive cabinets during this period concentrated on coping with the revenue deficit involved in the financing of basic development plan projects or their projects. The main reason, in this state, might have been the war and war preparations before 1973; because of its limited resources, the government relied on Arab aid to support certain development plan projects, and reliance was placed on foreign aid to support other projects in a subsequent stage.

The financial dimension had an extreme effect on Egyptian social policy. The peace process led to the cutoff of Arab aid from Egypt and therefore in some development projects reliance was placed on international aid. Consequently, the international dimension came to be imposed by events, and this generally had an effect on the social policy followed to develop and advance society; this policy focussed on resolving problems of education, housing, labor and insurance and rebuilding Egyptian man.

Among the discussions that went on in the People's Assembly on these problems, the study emphasized that the problem of education received 35 percent of the attention, housing 19 percent, and labor 16 percent, followed by insurance.

The study specified that the most important feature in this period was a modest shift in the nature of the ideological orientation which appeared ultimately to stress the importance of private projects and professionals and of inviting foreign and Arab capital to take part in coping with such basic problems as housing. Interest in luxury housing was conspicuous.

The approach to the problems that plagued the situation in Egypt was distinguished by superficiality in reviewing problems and a failure to try to review them scientifically in terms of their size and the possibility that they might grow and to adopt a suitable strategy to cope with them and define their causes and current and probable effects; the review of problems stopped at the level of subjective impressions which were not supported by scientific data. The emphasis on liberating Arab territories in their entirety and intensifying efforts for the military struggle was also clearly apparent.

The Second Stage: From 1974 to 1977

This period reflected specific features such as the establishment and implantation of the economic liberalization policy and the shift from the single party to the multi-political party system. This in turn created an effect on the vision the government and the members of the People's Assembly had of Egyptian social conditions with their ongoing social problems. We find that it represented a social policy whose features were distinct from the previous stage, especially since the government had gone through the military struggle and achieved victory in it during that stage, then ended up with the declaration of the peace initiative and the raising of social slogans to solve the problems of Egyptian society and bring about welfare.

In this period, the order of concern with social problems and issues changed. Whereas the attention had been more toward education as a social problem, the housing problem came to have priority and to be the most pressing problem, imposing itself on the discussion that went on in the assembly, of which it accounted for about 33 percent. It was also observed that awareness and attention to the limits and causes of the housing problem increased, in light of the serious social effects it possessed. Alongside this, there emerged attention to the collapse of housing and the deterioration of utilities, along with the relationship between landlord and tenant, the rights of tenants of dwellings that were about to collapse and the emergence of the problem of key money and advance rent payments. A tendency which arose from this problem also emerged: this was the declaration that the housing problem had become a problem threatening people's security, threatening public health, indeed threatening morality. The government's statement before the assembly in November 1976 stressed that key money and apartment prices rose the more the housing and building materials shortage became aggravated.

Opposition to Emigration

The labor question received 15 percent of the members' attention. The members' treatment of the problem was on a par with the solutions presented, since the problem had become understood during the first stage. The problem was described in terms of agricultural and skilled labor and its shortage and high wages, alongside government policy, which laid emphasis on encouraging the emigration of workers abroad and the continuous training of new technical staffs which would meet the deficit. However, the opposition attacked this policy and demanded that the emigration of technical workers abroad be limited since the country needed them.

The Third Stage: From 1978 to 1980

In this period, the country passed through a historic turning point toward the establishment of peace in the Middle East. This period witnessed the signing of the peace agreement between Egypt and Israel and slogans were raised on the promotion of peace, welfare and democracy. During this period, the National Democratic Party was also formed, under the chairmanship of President Anwar al-Sadat.

In this period the government programs concentrated on adherence to the principles of the 23 July and 15 May revolutions, on commitment to democratic socialism as an economic and political basis for the regime, on bringing about a sound balance between the interests of the individual and the interests of the group on the one hand and the material and spiritual needs of man on the other, and then on the call for adherence to the multi-party system as an expression of democracy and consultation and establishment of political activity founded on an objective opposition committed to social peace and national unity as a necessary element in the exercise of democratic rule.

As regards issues of concern, the housing problem headed the list of social issues. The government presented a true picture of the size of the problem, declaring that its policy would be based on encouraging the private and cooperative sectors and removing all restrictions on their activity so that they could bear the main burden in solving this problem, while providing construction materials through production and import. In this period the government did not emphasize common housing.

The subject of the private sector's role in solving the housing problem stirred numerous discussions and contradictory views. Some members doubted this sector's ability to play an effective role in eliminating the housing shortage, proceeding from the premise that the public sector, in spite of its ongoing contributions, had not solved the problem because the issue of housing was much too great and the private sector was only a group of individuals who had some savings and wanted to invest them to make a profit.

The Peace Stage

In another area, the problem of determining rents on real property built in haste during that period stood out. Views on this approach differed. There were people who saw fit to refuse to continue lowering the rental value of properties, proceeding from the premise that the notion of justice was to preserve the national wealth in the building sector, especially since the owners of buildings had neglected them after their rental value had ceased to represent an income worth preserving. The argument of people who were in favor of continuing to lower the rental value on properties was founded on the point that increasing rental values would constitute a burden on tenants at a time when prices were increasing not just for owners but also for everyone living on Egyptian territory.

The solutions proposed for solving the housing problem took the greatest share of the members' discussions, coming to 45 percent /of the total/ in comparison with /talk about/ the limits and causes of the problem, the social effects arising from it, and the obstacles in the way of an effective housing policy.

In this period the opposition (the Labor Party) recommended that the housing problem be solved by establishing simple housing models consisting of a single room and bathroom for a family starting out in life, then two rooms for a family whose size grew beyond that, /assuming that/ a single room would be better than tents or graves. All public sector companies would have to mobilize their efforts to provide one-or two-room low-cost and ordinary housing and not high-rise buildings that people with limited incomes could not live in.

The policy of deeding apartments also stirred up lengthy discussion because it was necessary to think about citizens who were not able to make down payments or subsequent payments on deeds. The materials for luxury housing were also to be imported from abroad and local building materials were not to be used /in it/. The rental on ordinary housing was to be reasonable and the government was to take over and mobilize all the public sector's government construction capabilities on its behalf.

Compulsory Education

In another area, the issue of education enjoyed the concern of the government and People's Assembly members during this period in its statements. The government stressed that it was trying to stem sources of illiteracy by enrolling all children of compulsory ages and linking education to production needs, the attainment of welfare and the opening of higher education for outstanding graduates of technical secondary schools and technical training institutes.

The conclusions of the analysis of People's Assembly activities during this period revealed an obvious change in the nature of ideological orientation from that which had prevailed in the first stage of the research, once the importance of building a socialist society as an extension of the period before 15 May 1971 had become obvious and the need for economic liberalization and the role of the private sector in solving many social problems such as the problem of housing had become prominent, along with a clear orientation toward the stage of peace, the takeoff toward establishment of welfare, and the takeoff toward confrontating crushing social problems in a decisive manner that did not contradict the comprehensive policy the transition toward a peacetime economy required. The role of a strong objective opposition that could offer proof and evidence of the failure of certain government approaches to solving crushing social problems and would ultimately refuse to vote on the side of the government program because in its view it would not solve the masses' problems also became prominent.

PAPER OFFERS PREVIEW OF LATEST CABINET SHUFFLE

/Article: "A Limited Cabinet Shuffle Is To Be Announced before Monday"/

/Text/ A change was to have been made in some cabinet posts and positions of governorates on a limited scale, at the end of this month, after conclusion of the sessions of the general national conference of the National Party.

It was then decided that the limited change would be made before the convening of the party's conference next Monday so that the party conference could meet and the people to whom the new positions were assigned could take part in it.

It is expected that the shift will be declared soon, before the conference convenes.

Cabinet Posts to the Two People's Assembly Vice Chairmen

So far it seems probable that cabinet posts will be assigned to Muhammad Rashwan and Muhammad 'Abd-al-Hamid Radwan, the two vice chairmen of the People's Assembly.

That was decided on grounds that they should engage in executive responsibilities now that they have acquired political and legislative expertise in parliament, especially in the factfinding committees that most thoroughly pursued their activity concerning numerous general problems that the People's Assembly was to submit to the factfinding committees under the chairmanship of both.

A New Vice Chairman of the People's Assembly

In commitment to the foregoing thought, which is that party staffs should be trained in various types of responsibility, it was decided that a current cabinet member should be assigned parliamentary responsibility in the People's Assembly, and the party leaders recommended him for the position of vice chairman of the People's Assembly. This nomination will be presented to the parliamentary board of the National Democratic Party, as will the nomination of the second vice chairman of the People's Assembly, who will represent the workers and peasants.

AL-SADAT DISCUSSES RECENT POLITICAL DEVELOPMENTS

Cairo MAY in Arabic No 31, 28 Sep 81 pp 3,5

/Report on interview of Anwar al-Sadat by Ibrahim Sa'dah: "Public Opinion Inquires and al-Sadat Responds"; date and place not specified/

/Text/ The subject of Arab newspapers that have no concern but to make a mountain out of a molehill, as people say, is a very strange one! There is no Arab newspaper that has not devoted its pages to publishing its fantasies, which it calls news, concerning the comprehensive cabinet reshuffle it alleges President Anwar al-Sadat intends to declare in a few days.

Many months ago Arab newspapers were following up on this fantasy and prominently displaying their expectations of it every day, as if it was a real fact!

How many reasons have these papers advanced to justify the new cabinet reshuffle! Some people stressed that President al-Sadat was not happy with the current cabinet, because it did not realize its goals, and others asserted that the goal in the change was to replace the cabinet with another one headed by a strong man who could govern the country by iron and fire, lest any one raise his voice and say "no!"

The Arab newspapers are living under the illusion that Egypt is in a state of being threatened with a blow up at any moment. Nothing these papers publish goes beyond some lies revolving about a single narrow focus; they talk about attempts to overthrow the regime, sometimes by force, sometimes by peace, sometimes by bombs that explode, by which thousands of people fall as victims, sometimes by bombs whose identity and location are discovered a few seconds before they explode, and by acts of repression and terror that never stop or end.

Egyptians read these papers and wonder where that Egypt they write about, and whose events they talk about, is to be found. The Egyptian reader imagines that he is the last to know what is going on in his country. He does not hear about a single coup attempt except from what he reads in these newspapers. He does not hear about the explosion of a single bomb in the area of Cairo he lives in, as the newspapers specify, and whose victim he has been. The Egyptian papers do not mention a word about the bombs it was possible to defuse and keep from exploding a few seconds before they were timed to go off!

The Arab newspapers have not contented themselves with what they have written on the new cabinet. They have asserted that President al-Sadat will order the dissolution and reconstitution of the People's Assembly and the Consultative Assembly! Not just that -- indeed, these papers have ventured to predict what the names of the members of the new cabinet will be. What is funny is that these newspapers differ among themselves, their news conflicts, and their expectations are remote from one another. One paper published the statement that Nabawi Isma'il is to be the new prime minister, and another paper, issued on the same day, came out and asserted that President Anwar al-Sadat would form a cabinet and would assign the premiership to Mansur Hasan and that Nabawi Isma'il would go out of it! Then a third paper eliminated Nabawi Isma'il and Mansur Hasan from the new cabinet and anticipated that the former would assume the chairmanship of the People's Assembly while the latter would be given the position of second vice president! A fourth paper, more generous than those three, ventured to stress that President al-Sadat would relinquish the chairmanship of the National Party to Mansur Hasan!

The only thing that has preoccupied Arab papers in recent days concerns what they call the struggle for power in Egypt. They have asserted that the new cabinet formation would eliminate everyone who had participated in this alleged struggle!

The Egyptian newspapers, for their part, published information about the cabinet reshuffle but were specific and said that it, that is, the modification, would be extremely limited; then they were clearer and stressed that it would involve only three ministers!

The Arab newspapers seized at this explanation, which had turned their expectations on their heads, and said that President al-Sadat would assign the cabinet to Mansur Hasan on grounds that he was the closest of all to the president's heart and mind, specifically in the period that has most recently passed!

Then the very limited ministerial change was announced.

It brought in the three new ministers -- Muhammad Rashwan, Mukhtar Hani and Muhammad 'Abd-al-Hamid Radwan. One minister left, Mansur Hasan; he was nominated for the position of vice chairman of the People's Assembly!

All the expectations of the Arab newspapers were dashed.

Rather than being embarrassed about their news, which had turned out not to be true, or their expectations, which were not realized, we were surprised to see the newspapers exploiting Mansur Hasan's situation and his departure from the cabinet in the oddest and worst manner.

These papers unanimously declared that Mansur Hasan had recently been transformed from the person closest to the heart and mind of President al-Sadat to the most intense critic and opponent of his recent policies! Mansur Hasan, whom they had previously asserted would head the next Egyptian cabinet, has now in their view become an opponent and protestor, because of President al-Sadat's excessive confidence in him, -- a man rejecting the latest measures to which the people agreed by an overwhelming majority!

The young official who was close to the head of state in the past few years and enjoyed his complete affection, enthusiasm and guidance, has now, by their pens, been transformed in their papers into another person whom Mansur Hasan himself does not recognize!

Once again, they have given their horses free rein.

They have published the statement that the "isolation" of Mansur Hasan took place because of his opposition to the policy of repressing and striking out at the opposition. They really did! And after the discovery of his firm bonds with the leaders of the Moslem Brothers!

The wierdest thing they had to say about Mansur Hasan was published in the newspaper AL-SAFIR, issued in Lebanon with the money of the wretched people of Libya. It said that the reason for the "isolation" may be sought in the good relations that he had with a correspondent with the French newspaper LE MONDE and an American television correspondent, who were recently thrown out of Egypt!

Another paper wrote that Mansur Hasan's banishment came as a result of his dealing lightly, as minister of information, with journalists who were opposed to the regime and criticized the policy of the Egyptian government at home and abroad! The same paper went on to say that Mansur Hasan has been rebuked for advocating liberalism and not being sufficiently decisive in the Ministry of Information or the Ministry of Culture!

Mansur Hasan's departure from the cabinet has been the talk of Egyptian public opinion. It is true that public opinion did not attribute the departure of the young minister from the cabinet to the reasons bruited about by hostile Arab papers; however, which is also true, public opinion did not know the reason behind Mansur Hasan's departure from the cabinet.

I brought Egyptian public opinion's queries before President Anwar al-Sadat.

I asked:

"People are wondering, Mr. President, about the reason for Mansur Hasan's departure from the cabinet; in other words, was the sole purpose of the latest ministerial change to expel Mansur Hasan from the cabinet?"

President al-Sadat replied,

"The fact is that I heard this question the first time going about on the tongues of my children at home. My children read the news in the papers like any ordinary citizen. They are not very interested in politics, and I am very happy about that. I have not wanted anyone in my home to be active in politics. Preoccupation with politics, as I have learned, is a very oppressive and difficult process. Fortunately, my children are not interested in politics and none of them have thought of being involved with it.

"When the cabinet change was published in the papers, the children came and asked me the same question you are asking now. Mansur Hasan was the only person who had left the cabinet. Can you imagine that the goal in that change was to remove Mansur!

"My children's interest in this subject, in spite of their lack of interest in political matters, as I have said, might be attributable to their personal acquaintance with Mansur Hasan. He is related to my family by marriage and our relations are not those of close collaborators -- they are family relations at the same time."

I told the president,

"Public opinion has not commented on the cabinet change and has not paid attention to the shifts of governors. All it is concerned with is to know the reason for Mansur Hasan's departure from the cabinet! That is a question that has been repeated by people who are preoccupied with politics and by people who are not, at the same time."

President al-Sadat replied,

"Perhaps the reason for that interest may in general be attributed to the great amount written about this ministerial change before it was announced. People wrote and made predictions about it at length, giving public opinion the impression that the change would be comprehensive and fundamental. When the change was declared, public opinion was surprised to find that it was extremely limited and minor. It was previously published in MAY that the change would be very limited, but some people continued to imagine that the change would involve a large number of ministries and ministers."

I asked the president,

"What is the reason for this very limited change?"

The president replied,

"I do not embark on any decision or action unless I have purpose behind it. The change that occurred was very limited, but in it one can observe an emphasis on the People's Assembly and the National Democratic Party. There are three deputies in the People's Assembly who shone brilliantly under the cupola, and I chose them to work in the cabinet. These were Muhammad Rashwan, Mukhtar Hani and Muhammad Radwan. Rashwan and Hani have become ministers of state for People's Assembly and Consultative Assembly affairs, and Radwan is minister of culture.

"This shows that I want to train leaders by changing positions. A person who is trained in the People's Assembly will move to the cabinet. A person who is in the cabinet will go back to the party or the People's Assembly. And so on.

"Through this system, I am rearing the staffs we need. Naturally I do that only with the personnel that function actively and of whom we can say 'they have the political touch.' By those I mean people who have chosen political activity themselves and were not coerced into it.

"Such 'staffs' must shift from the cabinet to the party and the assembly. This is an integrated interconnected activity. This is the prime objective in the latest change. The second objective is to devote interest to and concentrate on the activity of the party and the activity of the People's Assembly."

I asked President al-Sadat:

"What is Mansur Hasan's position on this process, Mr President?"

The president replied,

"I am anxious to have public opinion understand that I do not surprise people with things they might not agree to. For example, if I choose someone for a certain position, I summon this person and announce this choice to him. If he agrees, then he takes the position, and if he refuses I look for someone else. Everyone who has dealt with me knows this about me. It has not happened that anyone has been surprised by having news of his appointment published in the papers before I broached this appointment to him first.

"The Sunday before last I was in 'Abidin Palace to receive the credentials of a number of new ambassadors to Cairo. Mansur Hasan was with me. I told him, "I will make a minor change in the cabinet. The emphasis in the coming stage will be on the party and the People's Assembly. For this reason you will leave the cabinet and work as a vice chairman of the People's Assembly, because the two vice chairmen will enter the cabinet.

"This discussion between me and Mansur Hasan did not take more that what I just told you. This is what I always do with people who are in the position of a son toward me, like Mansur. When I talk to him about some subject I do not weigh every word I say to him. But when I talk with someone else with whom I do not have the relationship of a father to a son, I greatly weigh what I say to him, paying attention to his natural human reactions.

"Here I go back to the problem I am suffering from concerning the understanding and practice of democracy in our country. What really distresses me is that 99 percent of people active in politics nowadays fail to grasp the obvious principles for understanding and practicing democracy. What is amazing is that the Egyptian people, 70 percent of whom are said to be illiterate, can be considered among the smartest people in the world. These people have not misunderstood me once. There is not a decision I have taken that held the world in perplexity that the Egyptian people did not immediately understand and properly analyze, at a time when the people around me failed to understand it and collapsed, one after the other.

"The important thing is that my children came to me and asked me if the purpose in the cabinet change was to remove Mansur Hasan from the cabinet. The same question is being repeated by the man in the street everywhere. As I said, I do not weigh every word and every act while I am dealing with someone whom I consider just like one of my children -- and Mansur is one of them. Mansur Hassan came to meet me last Thursday here at the Barrages, and we found it necessary to discuss this subject which is being repeatedly discussed by public opinion in Egypt.

"Mansur told me, 'You previously broached this subject to me at 'Abidin Palace, and I did not object. I will work in any position you choose for me. I feel that my place is for you to decide as I am a son of yours, and the relationship between us is not just one of work but is also one between father and son. However, I tell you truthfully that I was hurt a little in front of people. The whole country has been talking about the cabinet change that removed me alone from the cabinet, as if the change the whole country had been talking about for a long time was announced only to remove me alone.'

"I told Mansur, 'By God, you have the right, Mansur my son. This talk I have heard in the exact same words from my children before you came here. You are completely right about that, but my excuse is that I do not weigh everything with my children or people who are very close to me. Pherhaps this is the reason some people consider that I am very hard with people who are close to me.' This is a fact. With my children, and people who are close to me, I deal without weighing things carefully. I have become completely tired of these calculations in my work and my contacts."

President al-Sadat continued to talk, saying,

"I go back to the exercise of the policy of democracy in Egypt, and say that his practice has become corrupted to the point where it is necessary to draw attention to it and work to change it. The simplest obvious points about political activity that are recognized everywhere in the civilized world are not being honored in our country. They must be carefully set down and we must issue a law making respect for them mandatory.

"I complain bitterly about the touchiness that some people are suffering from. These certain people place their dignity above their own skin and deal with life and engage in politics by their own personal standards. This plainly means a lack of political maturity.

"Then came the old political parties, which strove to implant these wrongful standards which emphasize the lack of political maturity we are complaining about.

"I personally suffered from this situation for the first time when I was a member of the Revolutionary Command Council. After the 23 July 1952 revolution, all the members of the Revolutionary Command Council entered the cabinet except one, and that was me. Everyone became a minister and assumed a cabinet position except me. I went for 13 months bearing the rank of Lt Col Muhammad Anwar al-Sadat and receiving the salary of a lieutenant colonel. I did not protest and did not feel that I had been dealt with disdainfully.

"In September 1954, Jamal 'Abd-al-Nasir decided to form a cabinet and told me, 'You have to enter the cabinet with us -- it's not reasonable, Anwar, for you alone to stay out of it!" I told him, "You know, Jamal, I am not concerned with this subject. My standards are different, as you know."

"The prevailing standard at that time was that a member of the Revolutionary Command Council who did not go into the cabinet was considered less important than one who did. This standard often provoked the anger of a number of Revolutionary Command Council members who had not entered the cabinet at the outset. They faced problems in their homes and among their friends which ended only when they later did enter the cabinet.

"I alone remained outside the cabinet until September 1954, when Jamal 'Abd-al-Nasir insisted that I go into the cabinet in which all members of the Revolutionary Command Council had gone before me.

"In 1956 the Revolutionary Command Council was terminated, after Jamal 'Abd-al-Nasir was elected president. My agreement with Jamal was that I would remove myself from the cabinet as soon as the Revolutionary Command Council was terminated, and Jamal was elected the first president of Egypt.

"On 23 July 1956, we celebrated Revolution Day at the Officers' Club and Jamal gave us the medal of the Nile, the highest decoration in Egypt, which is given to heads of state; thus ended the Revolutionary Command Council. Jamal 'Abd-al-Nasir assumed the presidency. Jamal began to draw up his new cabinet, and did not include me in it, which is what I has asked of him. If we go back to the issue of AKHBAR AL-YAWM in which the news of the formation of the new cabinet was published, we will find on the headlines "'Three people have left.' I was the first of these three.

"'Three people have come in.' The names of the new ministers were given.

"This headline was published in a really provocative manner. Some people imagined that the persons who had been left out in the reshuffle were the subject of disapproval, for example, or were incompetent, or these people volunteered other reasons. This is the erroneous behavior I talked to you about."

I told the president,

"People did not know that it was you who asked 'Abd-al-Nasir not to include you in the reshuffle. Some people thought that you were surprised by your departure and consequently these people expected what they felt like expecting."

President al-Sadat said:

"The important thing is that I personally am not concerned and I do pay heed to what is said and bandied about. I had previously agreed to that arrangement with Jamal. Throughout my life, I have believed in a truth which is that the position never causes the person who occupies it to grow in size. I am just Anwa al-Sadat. No position will elevate me, and keeping me from a position will not diminish me.

"In the period I spent outside the cabinet after the revolution took place, I was talking with Jamal and told him, 'I consider myself a minister, a prime minister, because you yourself are a minister and prime minister, we are all part of the Revolutionary Command Council, and each of us represents the others. When you are elected president I will feel as if I am president just like you.'

"That was always my conviction, and these were my standards as far as positions went.

"Unfortunately, I have not encountered anyone who shared this conviction and these standards with me to this day, except for one person, Dr Mustafa Khalil. I swear that Mustafa Khalil went into the cabinet, then left it, and was not affected, embarrassed or shaken. He has an inner confidence in his abilities and that is greater than anything else. When he left the cabinet, his inner sense did not change at all. He continued to have confidence in his abilities and in himself. It is not the position that made him great or small."

I asked President al-Sadat:

"What did you tell Mr Mansur Hasan, Mr President, when he told you that he felt hurt at leaving the cabinet in the latest changes?"

The president replied,

"I admit that I actually did hurt Mansur. Of course I did not do so on purpose. I did not for a moment imagine that Mansur would not appreciate what I had arranged for him. When he came to meet me last Thursday I assured him of this and repeated to him that the emphasis would be on the party and the People's Assembly in the coming stage. When I nominated him as vice chairman of the People's Assembly, that was not to diminish his stature or hurt him, as some people imagined -- it was to get him to help me in what I wanted to concentrate on from now on out.

"I told Mansur 'I had supposed that in regard to you I had the right of a father who chooses for his son what he considers is suitable for him and sees to be in his interests. You say that you feel that you have been hurt. I agree with you on that now, and my excuse is that my standards differ greatly from those of other people.'

"This reminds me of what happened in 1957 when they called us to establish the National Assembly, and we all went to Burj al-'Arab to discuss the selection of candidates. We had the right to object, which was natural, considering that we had to provide insurance for the revolution in its early years. I remember that we were laughing about the reports that intelligence sent us on people who were nominated for membership in the assembly. For example, they wrote a report on one person saying 'He is very well-educated but does not know how to read and write.' In Borj al-'Arab, Jamal 'Abd-al-Nasir told me, 'Be prepared, Anwar -- I have chosen you for the chairmanship of the assembly.' I did not object. Jamal chose me for that job in the belief that I was qualified for it. We all complement one another everywhere, but the real goal is for us all to cooperate and each work in the position the president sees fit to assign to him.

"We returned to Cairo.

"The inauguration of the People's Assembly was to take place in 2 days' time.

'Abd-al-Nasir was very anxious to know the details behind the details, and he demanded that we go to the National Assembly so that he could see what would happen on inauguration day, on the spot.

"He summoned us to his house in Manshiyat al-Bakri and told us, 'It is true that the Revolutionary Command Council has been terminated and that the people have chosen me to be president. Egypt is now to be governed by an ordinary constitutional system of government, but that does not prevent us from meeting together or prevent me from familiarizing myself with each of your opinions.

"Jamal then continued his conversation by saying,

"'You have come together today to prepare for the inauguration of the National Assembly tomorrow. In my opinion, we can agree that the person directly in the Revolutionary Command Council after me is the one who will chair the National Assembly, and I therefore consider that this position should go to 'Abd-al-Latif Bughdadi.'

"Bughdadi was the person directly after Jamal; he had precedence over Zakariya Muhyi-al-Din and had considerable precedence over 'Abd-al-Hakim 'Amir.

"After Jamal had expressed his opinion, he looked at me and asked me, 'What is your opinion, Anwar?' If I had exhibited the same touchiness that other people do, I would have been angry. Jamal had previously chosen me for this job, and suddenly he decided to give it to someone else. There must have been a consideration that Jamal found to be in the public interest and consequently I had no objection at all to his view. I told him, 'If it is in the general interest, I am in favor of it, Jamal.'

"As I had agreed, so did everyone.

"'Abd-al-Nasir then shifted to another matter bearing on the choice of two vice chairmen for the National Assembly. Jamal chose the late Fu'ad Jalal as the first vice chairman and asked us to choose the second vice chairman along with him. It was obvious that the old politicians who had not been corrupted, had not been included under the isolation decree and had won assembly elections had formed a bloc to win the seat of the vice-chairman of the assembly. It was Jamal 'Abd-al-Nasir's opinion that we should confront this bloc, that the second vice chairman should be one of us and that we should not leave that position to some old politician who might not be compatible with us.

"The vice chairman's position is very important. When the chairman of the assembly is absent for any reason, the vice chairman takes his place, engages in his functions and acts as National Assembly chairman. The prime minister, all the ministers and all the people's representatives sit before him.

"Jamal 'Abd-al-Nasir added that he had offered the position of assembly vice chairman to Dr Nur-al-Din Tarraf. Dr Tarraf was a star at that time, having been a National Party deputy in parliament before the revolution. However, he declined the position.

"He also offered it to Fathi Radwan, who also refused it. This refusal may be attributed to the fact that the two of them considered that this position was a reduction in their status. These are the same old worn out standards that I am suffering from and from whose touchy points I hope we can all save ourselves.

"Jamal 'Abd-al-Nasir ended by saying, 'In my opinion, fellows, the issue is very serious and we have to face it. Therefore I consider that we should choose one of our number to be a vice chairman of the National Assembly. I recommend so-and-so, who is a member of the Revolutionary Command Council and still is alive.'

"We were in agreement with Jamal's view.

"The meeting ended and Jamal and Bughdadi agreed to meet in his office and go together to the National Assembly to do a 'rehearsal' of what was to happen the next day in its inaugural session.

"We left Jamal's house and the member we had chosen for the position of vice chairman of the assembly got into the car with me. As soon as the car started I was surprised to hear this colleague tell me, 'Oh what bad luck, Anwar!' I looked at him in amazement, and he continued talking, saying, 'I cannot agree to be vice chairman of the National Assembly. People will interpret it the wrong way.'

"I told him, 'Why don't you complain to 'Abd-al-Nasir?' He did not answer. However, he did ask me to intervene quickly and get him out of this predicament, especially since the inaugural session was to be the next day.

"I promised him that I would look for a solution.

"As soon as I got home I called Jamal 'Abd-al-Nasir on the telephone. I was told that he was sleeping. I asked for 'Abd-al-Hakim 'Amir and told him what our colleague had told me and asked him to act quickly, as soon as Jamal woke up from his nap.

"I went into my office in the apartment where I was living in the al-Rawdah section and started to read something. Then at dusk the telephone rang and Jamal was on the line, asking me to meet him in his office, where he was sitting with Bughdadi.

"I left my house and went to 'Abd-al-Nasir's office.

"It was a short distance away and I was in 'Abd-al-Nasir's office in a few minutes. 'Abd-al-Latif Bughdadi was with him. I asked Jamal,

"'Did you see the rehearsal, Jamal?'

"He answered, 'No, actually not yet, Anwar, there is an important matter I would like to talk to you about.'

"'Well, Jamal?'

"He said, 'For heaven's sake, Anwar, our colleague so-and-so has refused to take the position of vice chairman of the People's Assembly.'

"I know. I was the one who informed 'Abd-al-Hakim of this fact so that he would pass it on to you.'

"Bughdadi was sitting there, in great agitation. Some people had told him that the persons who had refused to accept the vice chairmanship of the assembly had done so because they refused to work under him. For this reason distress and agitation were apparent on his face and he did not join in the conversation with us at the outset.

"I told Jamal,

"'Offer the position to someone else.'

"'I raised the matter again with Nur-al-Din Tarraf and Fathi Radwan, and they still refused.'

"What do you intend to do, Jamal?"

"'My view is that you yourself should agree to be an assembly vice chairman, Anwar. You are not a member of the cabinet, but you are a member of the National Assembly and you represent one of the 60 closed districts whose representatives we have chosen. I consider that you must agree to be a vice chairman of the assembly.'

"Once again what had happened at 'Abd-al-Nasir's house that day was repeated. The first time, he offered me chairmanship of the National Assembly, then changed his mind, hoping to set forth a gradition where the position of the chairman of the assembly would be given to the second man in the Revolutionary Command Council, and I agreed without the least hesitation or touchiness. The second time, Jamal thought it would be in the general interest for me to work as vice chairman of the same assembly for which he had previously nominated me as chairman, and I did not object, or feel that I was hurt or that my dignity had been slighted.

"Jamal quickly looked over at Bughdadi, who was sitting in front of him, and asked him,

"'Didn't I tell you, 'Abd-al-Latif, that Anwar's calculations are different from those of other people?'

"It was clear that 'Abd-al-Nasir had recommended my name to 'Abd-al-Latif before he got in touch with me by telephone. 'Abd-al-Latif said that Tarraf had refused, Fathi Radwan had refused, and so-and-so had refused, so was it reasonable that Anwar should accept? However, Jamal assured him that Anwar viewed things in another, different way, and was the most self-effacing person he knew in terms of positions and seats.

"He often declined executive jobs because he believed that the position of minister at that time was no more than a general directorship for employee relations!

"The meeting did not take more than a few minutes. We left the office for the National Assembly to see the 'rehearsal' of what was going to happen at the first inaugural session the next day.

"At that session, the measures for nominating the chairman and two vice chairmen of the assembly were put in movement. The representatives chose Bughadi as chairman and Fu'ad Jalal and me as the two vice chairmen.

"My work began most actively and with absorption.

"I felt no touchiness about accepting the position of vice chairman of the People's Assembly, though I am one of the nine who made the 23 July Revolution; the reason for that, as I said, was that I did not connect my own worth to the position I occupied or the chair I was sitting in. And what is wrong with being vice chairman of the National Assembly? The vice chairman stands in for the chairman when he is absent. I had agreed to be a National Assembly member for a district; what is the difference between being an assembly member and the vice chairman of that assembly? I remained vice chairman of the National Assembly until Egypt and Syria were united; then the assembly was dissolved and reconstituted. Then I ran as a candidate for assembly chairman, and the representatives chose me. I was then chosen chairman of the new National Assembly in 1964; it did not complete its term, because of the war."

I told President al-Sadat,

"I believe that few people who are engaged in political activity look at this matter the way you do. Perhaps this is the reason why some people have not put a favorable interpretation on Mansur Hasan's departure from the cabinet and his nomination as a vice chairman of the People's Assembly."

The president said,

"This is the misfortune that I am suffering from. I have tried a great deal, with the people who worked with me, to persuade them that there should be no touchiness about jobs. Positions do not create political staffs, and chairs do not increase the importance of the people who sit on them. It is wrong for a person to link his worth and his weight to the position he occupies or to the chair he sits on. I have told this to everyone who worked, and works, with me, with the aim of removing the people who have been steeped in this erroneous conduct, which spread and took root many years ago.

"Most unfortunately, some people continue to imagine that a minister of state stands at a lower rank than a minister with portfolio. The ministers are very concerned about these formalities. I remember that I sent for one of them to offer him an appointment as minister, and was surprised when he protested and told me you appointed so-and-so to the position of deputy prime minister but I am not less than him, I worked as a minister previously!'

"My answer was to remove him from the cabinet.

"I also remember that I was once compelled to hold the first session of a new Council of Ministers in the town of East al-Qantarah. I chose this place specifically so that the cabinet members could see the extent of the destruction and devastation in this town as a result of the war. I told the ministers, 'These are the ruins of the battles we fought in the past. We must get rid of them and rebuild and reconstruct instead of destroying and devastating. This is the goal in forming the cabinet. I wanted to assure you of this here, in this place, having learnt that some of you met in one of your homes and discussed at length the difference between ministers with portfolio and ministers of state and between ministers and deputy ministers, which is something I totally reject.

"I related my experience with positions and how we were one of the nine who made the revolution but that in spite of that I did not feel the least touchiness or wounded pride in accepting the position of vice chairman of the People's Assembly for many years!

"I told them that I was in need of assistants who were concerned with the essence, not with appearances. Everyone sitting down with me at this table, from the prime minister to the deputy prime ministers, ministers with portfolio, ministers of state and deputy ministers, I consider on the same executive and leadership level. When we take the votes of cabinet members on a given matter, there is no difference between the vote of the prime minister and the vote of a deputy minister."

I told President al-Sadat:

"Some people do not easily agree to be assigned positions that are below the ones they previously occupied. These people's thinking is that a person should be promoted to a higher position, not demoted to a lower one."

The president replied,

"Exactly. This is the erroneous behavior I wish would vanish from our minds and hearts. In countries with a deep-rooted democracy, this kind of erroneous notion does not exist at all. Sometimes a prime minister resigns in one of those countries because he has a political or party commitment, but he finds no embarrassment in accepting the position of minister in a cabinet formed for the purpose of coping with an important national political position. There are prime ministers at the highest level who have nonetheless agreed to work as ministers without portfolio in subsequent cabinets, indeed have agreed to subordinate in these cabinets to people whom they had supervised and who had been directors of their offices!

"In these cases, a former prime minister should not be assigned a major cabinet post such as minister of the interior or minister of finance; rather, he should be honored by having a ministry of state assigned to him. The meaning of a minister of state is that he is not committed to a given ministry but is engaged in everything and speaks his opinions on every subject.

"These notions that are recognized in all civilized democratic countries are unacceptable to this day in our own. A minister of state is nothing! A minister must have a ministry, or must be a deputy prime minister if possible -- or a prime minister if given the chance!"

I asked the president,

"By what, Mr President, do you explain the spread of these notions among intellectuals and politicians in particular?"

President al-Sadat replied,

"My only explanation is that our politicians suffer from a vacuum. Some people say that young people are in a vacuum. I say that the politicians' vacuum is much more pronounced than that of the young people. Why? Because the most basic rules of the exercise of democracy among politicians in mature societies do not exist among us here. As I said, positions do not make sagacious politicians. Capable politicians are ones who make something out of their positions.

"The same thing is to be said about the failure of people who call themselves the opposition here in exercising democracy.

"Earlier, I related that I stopped off in Britain during my latest trip to the United States of America. In London I met with Michael Foot and Callaghan. Michael Foot is the new Labor Party leader and Callaghan is a former prime minister and a man of enormous political stature. Of course deep inside himself he has a great deal against Mrs Thatcher, the current prime minister. He came to meet me and asked me 'What is my government's position toward you? In my opinion, my country's position probably consists of these four points -- one, two, three, four. What do you think?'

"I told him, 'The four points you mentioned are exactly what we are thinking about, but there is a fifth point and a sixth point to fully round out the picture.

"Michael Foot, the opposition leader, came and asked the same question as Callaghan, and completely agreed with me that Mrs Thatcher's cabinet's position toward us was sound.

"Neither of them came to meet me to speak against the British government in my presence. I didn't hear a single word from former Prime Minister Callaghan against the current prime minister, Mrs Thatcher, in spite of the great differences between them.

"I find the same thing in the United States of America.

"We previously followed the harsh publicity campaigns between Carter and his adversary Reagan during the latest election campaign. Each of them said things about the other that one's intelligence could not grasp. As soon as the elections were over and Reagan won, everything that stood between the two men came to an end, to the point where I went to meet Carter in my latest visit to America and did not hear a single word from him against Reagan. Rather, to the contrary, he told me 'If you want anything that you see fit to tell me, I am fully prepared to go to Reagan at the White House and tell it to him.'

"When Carter made a visit to China at the beginning of this month, he made statements in Peking, but he committed himself to the line and policies which President Reagan had previously declared. He did not hurt Reagan, he did not defame him, he did not oppose his policies.

"This is the true exercise of opposition in politically civilized countries, not the sterile, improper exercise that some people here who call themselves the opposition have pursued.

"We can cast a glance at the style of conduct in Israel, for example. When Israel struck at the Iraqi nuclear reactor, that was a reckless act that Egypt attacked in the most violent possible manner. When they asked Begin about his decision to strike at the reactor, he said that he had previously informed the leader of the opposition about this action, and the opposition leader, Perez, actually did stand up and confirm that Begin had informed him of the operation of striking at the reactor before it was carried out. Perez added that he contacted Begin and declared his rejection of the operation.

"This happened many months before the strike against the Iraqi reactor. In spite of that, Perez did not say a word to anyone on that subject; they considered it a national secret which absolutely could not be divulged. Perez did not think about exploiting the situation in order to defame Begin in front of the whole world in the election campaign, which he lost.

"The question now is, Can I do here in Egypt as is done in Israel and trust any of the people who call themselves the opposition, tell him a national secret and demand that he keep it secret?

"No, no I can't!

"It is certain that this national secret will have begun to go about on every tongue in an hour and that the international news agencies will have passed it on to all areas of the world!

For this reason I absolutely do not trust those people who provoke quarrels with democracy and call themselves the opposition!

"The story of Mansur Hasan has given me a chance to let off a little steam and talk about what I am suffering from and hope to rid myself of."

OUTLINES OF ISLAMIC PROPAGATION PLAN REVEALED BY MA'ADIKHA

Tehran TEHRAN TIMES in English 1 Nov 81 p 1

[Text] TEHRAN, (Pars) – After sessions with Islamic propagating institutions and after devoting almost 500 hours on studies on methods of propagation, " I have finally prepared a plan for establishing a coordinated propagation system and a strategy for activities of revolutionary and governmental organs," Hojjatoleslam Maadikhah, the Minister of Islamic Gudiance said yesterday.

He added that the plan would face no legal difficulties because preliminary executive measures had been taken in regard to the plan.

Maadikhah said that it was impossible to limit the Islamic and Revolutionary propaganda within a governmental and official framework. He added that in the new plan, propagation was not solely left to one organ or ministry.

The Islamic Guidance Minister stated that he would disclose details of this new plan after its approval by the Majlis. "But stated in broad outline I can say that there will be a central authority for determining general policies on propagation and this body will supervise their execution." However the minister said, the state's policies on propagation will be directed by the leader and executive authorities will manage their own responsibilities.

"A supreme Propagation Council comprising of the ministers of Islamic Guidance and Foreign Affairs, together with 5 more members who are to be chosen by the leader, and or the leadership council, will also be formed which shall supervise ways of expending the States ' propagation budget," Maadikah said.

"It has been proposed ", continued Maadikhah "that the total amount of the propagation budget be centralized in one organ, which will furnish the propagating institutions with their required budgets through the Supreme Propagation Council, after their propagation programs are approved. Thus through consolidating the efforts taken by various organs redundancies, waste of effort and finances will be avoided," he said explaining the need for the new Council.

Hojjatoleslam Maadikhah also added that with regard to the significance of propagation and the need felt for coordination and supervision, the Supreme Council of Propagation and Coordinating Council of Propagation were already active with 6 members, all of whom had been approved by the Imam. "

Asked of the number of organs that would be included in the plan, Maadikhah said that all organs and institutions that used the State's general budget for propagation such as the Ministry of Islamic Guidance, the Cultural Departments of the Foreign Ministry, Construction Crusade, IRGC and the Islamic Propagation Organization would be covered by the plan and that these organs were obliged to cooperate with the council according to the new plan while the cooperation of other political and para-political organs rely on their own discretion, though it would also be compulsory for them to be guided in certain circumstances.

He was then asked to explain the manners in which the Voice and Vision of the Islamic Republic could cooperate in the plan while it was an independent organization and run by its own Supervisory Council.

The Islamic Guidance Minister said in reply that "the main principles of the Voice and Vision of the Islamic Republic relies on keeping to the genuine path of politico-ideological principles of the Revolution."

"But as I said it is only a general concept while the Supreme Council of Propagations is endowed through law with specific means to see that this principle is observed," he said . The Supervisory Council will continue as before but at the same time co , the same time cooperation can also be achieved he added. The Majlis has the authority to oblige all propagating organs and institution to cooperate according to the manner forseen in the plan," he also said.

When asked how much time he thought was needed for the plan to be ultimately approved, the Islamic Guidance Minister, replied that with a view to the efforts taken by Majlis deputies for coordinating the state's propagations, he expected the plan to be approved when the next year's propagating budget is finally passed.

ECONOMIC SCIENTIFIC TALKS OPEN WITH BULGARIA

JN091441 Baghdad INA in Arabic 1225 GMT 9 Nov 81

[Excerpts] Baghdad, 9 Nov (INA)--Iraqi-Bulgarian talks on economic, technical and scientific cooperation began here today.

The Iraqi side to the talks is headed by Taha Yasin Ramadan, Revolution Command Council [RCC] member and first deputy prime minister, while the Bulgarian side is headed by Todor Bozhinov, first deputy chairman of the Bulgarian Council of Ministers.

The Iraqi delegation comprises Hasan 'Ali, RCC member and minister of industry; 'Amir Mahdi, minister of agriculture and agrarian reform and head of the Iraqi delegation on the Iraqi-Bulgarian Joint Committee, and experts.

The Bulgarian delegation comprises Khristo Iliev Khristov, minister of foreign trade and head of the Bulgarian delegation on the Iraqi-Bulgarian Joint Committee; Alexander Petkov, chairman of the Executive Committee of the National and Industrial Union Central Council and minister of agriculture [title as received]; and experts.

At the beginning of the talks, Taha Yasin Ramadan welcomed the Bulgarian delegation and praised the progress achieved in the Iraqi-Bulgarian relations thanks to the leadership of President Saddam Husayn and chairman of the State Council Todor Zhivkov.

RCC member and Deputy Premier Ramadan called on the technical committees to formulate new and developed formulas for joint cooperation. He stressed that Iraq, while waging a battle against the racist Persians for the second year, continues to increase its strength, firmness and development in all spheres, whether in the military and development spheres or in the foreign relations.

Ramadan praised the Bulgarian people's positive stand on the Iraqi-Iranian conflict which commensurates with the magnitude of the event and confirms the strong relations between the two friendly countries.

In a reply speech, Bozhinov reiterated Bulgaria's support for Iraq's endeavors to solve the Iraqi-Iranian conflict through peaceful means and its stand against the Camp David policy and world Zionism. He said: We are pleased at Iraq's stability, development and progress despite the war circumstances. This clearly shows the wisdom of its leadership. He expressed his confidence that the current meetings will attain fruitful results in the interest of the two friendly peoples.

Afterward, the meetings of the 13th session of the Iraqi-Bulgarian Joint Committee for Scientific, Technical and Economic Cooperation began. The Iraqi side to the meetings was headed by 'Amir Mahdi Salih, minister of agriculture and agrarian reform, and the Bulgarian side by Khristo Iliev Khristov, minister of foreign trade.

The two sides discussed the trade plan between Iraq and Bulgaria for the year 1982 and the projects which have so far been implemented in the fields of agriculture, irrigation, scientific and technical cooperation. They also discussed the problems that faced the implementation process. The following six committees have stemmed from the meetings: committee for trade, finance, planning and industry; committee for constructions; committee for technical and scientific cooperation; committee for agriculture and irrigation; committee for transport and tourism and committee for secretaryship. The committees will draw up the joint plans for cooperation between Iraq and Bulgaria in 1982.

PAPER VIEWS AGREEMENTS WITH TURKEY

JN271513 (Clandestine) Voice of Iraqi Kurdistan in Arabic 1600 GMT 26 Oct 81

[Text] Dear listeners, the paper SAWT AL-AKRAD, organ of the Central Committee of the Democratic Kurdish Party in Syria, has published the following important article:

A disgraceful collusion has been perpetrated against the Kurdish Liberation Movement. Reports say that secret agreements have been reached between the dictatorial Iraqi and Turkish regimes allowing the forces of each regime to penetrate as far as 20 kilometers inside the territories of the other to pursue the militant Kurds. These agreements were reached following several visits to Turkey by the Iraqi regime's foreign minister, during which he held talks with the fascist generals and discussed joint cooperation between the regimes to face the burgeoning Kurdish Liberation Movement.

The Kurdish Nationalist Movement is accustomed to such steps and, therefore, is not surprised at these new agreements which are resurrecting the buried articles of the Baghdad Pact. The two regimes have frequently disagreed on numerous issues, yet they agree on one joint objective: to strike at the liberation movements in the region, particularly the Kurdish Nationalist Movement.

These regimes are linked together by several common factors, such as.

1. Their racist nature and their criminal and bloody history of maltreatment of the Kurdish people, who are being subjected to continued massacres and annihilation such as those of [words indistinct] and Qal'at Dizah, resulting in thousands of martyrs.

2. The escalating Kurdish Nationalist Movement in Iraq and Turkey at the side of the struggle of the progressive movements of the Iraqi and Turkish peoples, which is scaring the two racist regimes.

3. The fact that the regimes are under the umbrellas of U.S. imperialism, which is supporting them and cooperating with them in order to eliminate the various nationalist liberation movements which constitute an important tributary of the world revolution against imperialism, Zionism and reaction.

This brings to mind U.S. imperialism's role in the plotting against the Nationalist Kurdish Movement in Iraq during the signing of the treacherous 6 March agreement between the defunct shah and Saddam Husayn.

These joint plots against the Kurdish Nationalist Movement and the liberation movement of the region's peoples are natural results of the course taken by the dictatorial racist regimes backed and encouraged by U.S. imperialism.

In return, the various peoples of the region, including the Kurdish people, are requested to unite their struggle and strengthen their solidarity with the world powers of liberation, progress and socialism, particularly the Soviet Union, against the joint enemy, which is imperialism, Zionism and other racist reactionary regimes.

LIBERATION FRONT RECEIVES SUPPORT MESSAGES--Arab student organizations in Yugoslavia and the Public Health Trade Union in Djibouti have hailed the emergence of the Arab Front for the Liberation of Ahvaz. In a message to the front, the Arab student organizations have declared their support for the front in its armed struggle against the racist Persians to liberate the usurped lands. The message stresses that the creation of the front is a decisive response to the Persian domination that stands against Saddam's soldiers, who are defending the eastern flank of the Arab homeland to establish legitimate Arab rights. In a similar message, the Public Health Trade Union in Djibouti has stressed that the charter of the Arab Front for the Liberation of Ahvaz will liberate the Arab people of Ahvaz from the persecution of the racist Persians. The trade union has wished the front success in its struggle. [Text] [GF261414 Baghdad Domestic Service in Arabic 1130 GMT 26 Oct 81]

ARABS ABLE TO FACE ISRAELIS--Amman--The Jordanian weekly newspaper AKHBAR AL-USBU' has affirmed that Iraq's war on the eastern flank of the Arab homeland has proved that the Arabs are capable of facing the Zionist enemy in a protracted war. In its latest edition, the paper said that Iraqi forces enjoy combat efficiency superior to that of the Iranian forces. It said that the Iraqi forces had seized two strategic positions in the Shush area during the past days, crushing the Iranian aggressors. The paper adds that the Iraqi Army enjoys military superiority and high spirits and is the master of initiatives in the war against Iran. REPEAL ON PRESS LAW DEFERRED--In its session yesterday, the National Assembly deferred a decision on the report of the Committee for Educational, Cultural and Guidance Affairs. The report calls for repealing Article 35-BIS of the Press and Publications Law. Twenty-nine deputies voted in support of the committee's report, while 24 abstained. It was decided to vote on the report in another session without further discussion. During yesterday's session, the government asked for a 2-week postponement of the issue so the article can be debated. Shaykh Sabah al-Ahmad, deputy prime minister, foreign minister and acting information minister, said that Article 35-BIS was initiated so that the Kuwaiti press would not be exploited and that the article is not opposed to the freedom of speech. FORMER PRESIDENT ANSWERS REAGAN ON LEBANESE CRISIS

[Unattributed report: "Criticizing Reagan's Statement, Sham'un Says: 'What Must Be Remedied Is Lebanese Crisis; Problem Lies in Presence of Foreign Occupation'"]

[Text] [Former] President Camille Sham'un yesterday drew the attention of U.S. President Ronald Reagan to the fact that "the crisis which must be remedied is the Lebanese crisis and not the crisis of the south." He emphasized that the problem lies in "the presence of foreign occupation." He urged the government to present at the forthcoming summit conference "clear-cut demands for the evacuation of the armed foreigners, be they Syrian forces or others."

Commenting on U.S. President Ronald Reagan's statement on the Middle East situation, Sham'un said: "It is my conviction that President Reagan's statement on the Middle East issue and the dangers surrounding the region is so exaggerated that I, who am aware of what is happening in the Middle East, do not share his view on the existence of this imminent danger. In any case, I hope that nothing will happen that will expose peace to danger. The danger could arise as a result of the existing dispute between Egypt and Sudan on the one side and Libya on the other.

"As for the section of the statement on this part of the Middle East--Lebanon--I fear that President Reagan's geographical knowledge may be restricted to South Lebanon and does not extend to all Lebanese territory. The crisis which must be tackled is the Lebanese crisis and not the crisis of South Lebanon, where a cease-fire prevails and which does not constitute any danger as long as the two sides maintain the cease-fire.

"Our problem is the Lebanese crisis and the presence of foreign occupation of Lebanese territories. It is this crisis which must be dealt with. Therefore, Mr Reagan must see things as we see them if he really wishes to remedy the Lebanese crisis.

"Meanwhile, as it is preparing for the Fez [Arab summit] conference, the Lebanese Government must not deal with the issue of the south as an alternative to dealing with the Lebanese crisis. The government must present a bold view and clear-cut demands for the evacuation of the armed foreigners, be they Syrian forces or others, from the Lebanese territories so that Lebanon will revert to being what it was and should be--a sovereign independent state on the same level as the rest of the Arab states which are to participate in the conference, especially since the president of the Lebanese Republic will be opening the conference. Lebanon's sovereignty must be complete."

MADY INTERVIEW ON LEBANESE, ARAB LOBBIES

NC301030 Beirut MONDAY MORNING in English 26 Oct-1 Nov 81 pp 18-22

[Article by Lydia Georgi]

[Text] Alfred Mady, the representative of the rightist "Lebanese forces" in North America, last week denied reports of cooperation between the Israeli and rightist Lebanese lobbies in Washington, describing them as "rumos put out by the Arab lobby there."

In an interview with MONDAY MORNING during a brief visit to Beirut, Mady said: "I think we're finished with this business (of alleged connections between Israel and the rightst Lebanese), even here in Lebanon. I don't think we have any direct contacts with the Zionist groups. These were rumors put out by the Arab lobby there (in Washington). The only way they could think of to fight the Lebanese lobby were these rumors, claiming that any victory we achieve in the U.S. was achieved by the Zionist movements. That is absolutely false. Every one of our successes was achieved by Lebanese and American-Lebanese efforts."

He added: "Because the Zionists fight the Syrians and we fight the Syrians, the two lobbies may sometimes appear to be taking similar positions, but that is mere coincidence."

Mady, who is also the executive director of the rightist Lebanese Information and Research Center in Washington (an office started and financed by the Lebanese forces), described his group's relationc with other Arab and Arab-American organizations in the U.S. as "conflicting."

"The Arab-Lebanese conflicts that you see in Lebanon are reflected in the U.S.," he said. "We don't have any relations with the Arabs there, but we fight a lot indirectly--not because we don't like them, but because their position is hostile to the Lebanese cause. While we try to inform the people there about what is going on in Lebanon exactly, they do the opposite. While our main cause is the Lebanese cause, theirs is the Palestinian cause--or so they claim, at least, although they may not mean it. We start from different premises."

Where Lebanon was concerned, the Arab and Arab-American groups in the U.S. "are usually very late in adopting positions when major developments occur," Mady said.

"They wait and see how a certain position might affect their interests with this or that Arab country," he explained. "When Zahlah was shelled, for instance, and when the troubles broke out in Tripoli, they hesitated. They were afraid of what the Syrians would do. They usually avoid specific issues and concentrate on general principles, because...who are the Arabs, after all? Should the 'Arab lobby' work for the Saudis or the Libyans? For Egypt or Syria or Iraq? They have a problem when it comes to specific issues. We don't. We know our position and do not hesitate to make it known."

In fact, Mady said, there was no such thing as an Arab lobby in the U.S.

"Take the National Association of Arab-Americans (NAAA), which claims to be an Arab lobby. The trouble with these people is that they are not really interested in lobbying. Most of them are doing what they do because they have financial interests in the Arab world. This group is only trying to make money out of the Arabs, and I think the Arab embassies are becoming more and more aware of this."

Arab divisions and lack of commitment among the Arab-American groups in the U.S. are two of the reasons for the Arab lobby's failure in Washington, according to Mady.

The third reason, as he sees it, is that "90 percent of the two million Americans of Middle Eastern descent are Lebanese-Americans. The so-called NAAA claims to represent part of the Lebanese-American community, but the fact is that it does not, and it is because the majority of the Arab-American votes come from the Lebanese-Americans that we are successful and the NAAA is not.

"This fact was explained to an Arab leader, an Arab prince, on the hill (in Congress). He remarked that the Arabs were spending a great deal of money and getting nothing in return in terms of support for Arab issues. He was told: 'In the U.S., most of the voters of Middle Eastern origin are Lebanese, and since your position in Lebanon is against the Lebanese, those voters are not backing you. Unless you have the votes, no amount of money that you spend can produce anything.'"

The majority of the predominant Lebanese-American community in the United States was staying clear of all specific Arab issues, including the hot issue of the AWACS sale to Saudi Arabia, Mady told me.

"The Arabs," he said, "cannot expect help from the Lebanese abroad as long as they are helping kill the Lebanese in Lebanon. Unless they adopt clear positions in favor of Lebanon, they can expect nothing from the American Lebanese. We're willing to help the Arabs abroad if they're willing to help us in Lebanon, if they adopt clear positions on our problem in Lebanon. Until then, the Lebanese will continue to take no position on Arab issues."

Mady suggested that it might not be long before the Arab and rightist Lebanese lobbies in Washington began to cooperate.

"I think the NAAA and the Arab embassies are beginning to come around to our point of view," he said, "our point of view being that the Middle Eastern and Lebanese crisis can be separated a bit, in order to settle the Lebanese conflict first and then see what we can do about the Middle Eastern conflict. They are all coming around to this position now, and I think we may in the future have a kind of relationship with them in which we agree on certain topics and issues."

Asked if his group and the Lebanese Embassy in Washington saw eye to eye on the major issues, Mady said there was no conflict between him and the embassy--simply because the embassy usually adopted no position at all.

"The problem is not in the embassy itself. Some of the people staffing it are capable of doing the right thing. The problem is with the Lebanese system as a whole. It's outdated. It's not aggressive. Lebanon's foreign policy is shy. The foreign minister (Fuad Butrus), for whom I have a lot of respect, is a very aggressive person, but below the level of the foreign minister himself, total shyness is the policy.

"Privately, we agree with the embassy on some things and disagree on others, but we never clash because the embassy never declares a position publicly."

In contrast, he said, the Lebanese forces have a clear "foreign policy," and that policy "is aimed basically at trying to get the foreign people out of our country so that we can have a good democracy with equal rights for everyone, to enable us to rebuild our country later.

"This is what we are trying to sell the people and government of the U.S."

The "selling" is being done by the Lebanese Information and Research Center in Washington--an office staffed by eight people--in cooperation with an unspecified number of Lebanese-American "social organizations" which were already in existence when the Lebanese forces opened their Washington office in July 1978.

"Shaykh Bashir (al-Jumayyil, commander of the Lebanese forces) and myself decided to start opening offices when we made our first trip to the U.S. toward the end of 1977," Mady said. "We made that decision because we had discovered the real potential of the Lebanese people, and because we had learned that if we wanted anything done to extricate our cause from the hands of the various powers in the region, we had to do it ourselves, since our government was not really capable of presenting our case as it should be presented."

The Lebanese Forces Office, which is registered with the U.S. Government as a foreign agent, has been cooperating with various Lebanese-American organizations, including the American-Lebanese League (ALL), to present the Lebanese case as it sees it to Congress, the State Department, the Pentagon, the White House, different lobbying groups, the churches, the unions, the universities and the media.

"One of our goals," Mady said, "is to educate the public, especially our own people in America--almost two million American Lebanese who must be given the right information about their country of origin."

Mady said that the Lebanese forces were now, "for the first time in history," making use of the tremendous potential of the Lebanese emigrants in the U.S.

"Lebanon has for 45 years been trying to abuse our emigrants," he said. "The Lebanese Government, the Lebanese leaders, the Lebanese people are all responsible for this. All they wanted from the emigrants was money. As for us, we don't want their money; we don't want them to come to Lebanon and build things here--not yet, anyway. What we want from them is their time. They can be a powerful worldwide lobbying group, and they can help save Lebanon."

As an example of Lebanon's past dealings with its emigrants, Mady drew attention to the World Lebanese Cultural Union (WLCU), an organization which claims to represent Lebanese emigrants around the world.

"This organization was first conceived by Pierre al-Jumayyil (leader of the rightist Phalangist Party)," Mady said. "After a while, he thought it would be a good idea to hand it over to the government, so he did. As a result, it is now a useless organization."

The WLCU, which is attached to the Lebanese Foreign Ministry, is still operating. It held its annual conference in Canada last week.

Mady conceded that the Lebanese-American community was not a monolith with identical views, capable of moving as one united force.

Inter-Lebanese differences in Lebanon, he said, were reflected in the Lebanese-American community to a certain extent, but those differences were much more muted in America--thanks in part to "the way we have handled these matters."

Bashir al-Jumayyil's visit to the U.S. earlier this year, Mady added, did more than gain the Lebanese forces additional understanding from the U.S. Government and media; it breathed new life into the Lebanese-American community, increasing its motivation to work for Lebanon.

The same was true of the subsequent visit to the U.S. by Maronite patriarch Antonius Butrus Khuraysh, "who put in a new spirit among all the Maronites there, especially those who were hesitant, who were not clear about the Lebanese cause. After the patriarch's visit, these are all coming back to work for the Lebanese cause."

To keep all levels of the American Government and people informed about Lebanon, Mady said, his office and the organizations that cooperate with it undertake the following activities:

--They publish LEBANON NEWS, a monthly four-page bulletin which may soon begin to be published on a fortnightly basis.

--They have started a news phone line, making it possible for anyone interested in the latest news from Lebanon to get it by dialing a number on the phone.

--They have started "operation roots," encouraging Lebanese-Americans and Americans interested in Lebanon to come to Lebanon for brief summer visits.

--They are issuing occasional background papers, usually every 2 or 3 months, each concentrating on a specific subject and distributed to "key people in the U.S."

--They undertake personal-contact campaigns.

The Lebanese forces, which also have offices in France, Italy, West Germany and Switzerland, were planning to step up their efforts in the Anglo-Saxon countries by opening an office in England and four new offices in the U.S. "over the next few years," Mady said.

He believes that the Reagan administration's attitude towards Lebanon is a great improvement over the attitude of the Carter administration--primarily because Reagan knows that Lebanon is important in three of his top-priority concerns.

"President Reagan's first concern is to stop Soviet penetration of the Middle East, and if Lebanon is lost to the Soviet Union or a Soviet proxy, a direct threat will be posed to the Gulf.

"His second concern is economic, and the free world has over the past 7 years discovered that Lebanon is the only country they can use as their base of operations in the Middle East, and that the Lebanese people's brains and talents are important to them in these operations.

"His third concern is to contain international terrorism, and we all know that international terrorists are being trained in Lebanon.

"So on all three counts, the U.S. has a strong motivation to settle the Lebanese problem."

This motivation, Mady said, was behind the dispatch of President Reagan's special envoy, Philip Habib, to the area and the American push for peace in Lebanon.

"We hope," he said, "that this political process will succeed in bringing peace to Lebanon and prompting the withdrawal of the Syrians from Lebanon so that we can have free presidential elections in 1982.

"So far, the process is continuing. Reagan has told his cabinet, and Haig has told his people, 'Go solve the Lebanese problem.' They are now trying all kinds of possible solutions.

"If this process does not succeed, I think the U.S. will have to think of a different position."

He added: "Don't forget that the Reagan administration does not really have a policy on this part of the world yet, beyond its policies on Egypt, Sudan and Libya. For the rest, American policy is being formulated on the ground. A final policy, a clear policy, will emerge between now and the new year."

MOVES ON INTERNAL SECURITY FRONT REPORTED

PM090929 Beirut AS-SAFIR in Arabic 3 Nov 81 p 4

[Unattributed report: "Deterrent Forces Begin Implementing Security Measures in Beirut and Suburb; Demonstrations Banned and Arms and Licenses Confiscated; Contacts for Completing Evacuation of Barracks; Sabbagh: 'This Accomplishment Is Expression of Unified Stand to Control Security and Resolve Living Problems"]

[Excerpts] Early this morning the Arab Deterrent Forces began to implement the security measures announced by the Coordination Committee and the Higher Security Committee to control the security situation in Beirut and the southern suburb.

The deterrent forces set up several roadblocks in various areas in al-Mazra'ah, Tallat al-Khayyat and al-Awza'i, on the airport road and the UNESCO-Cola Road and in al-Rawshah and the southern suburb in addition to the fixed barriers in the various areas.

The deterrent forces also operated patrols in the internal areas and quarters. The patrols have seen to it that all armed manifestations are banned and that the heavy weapons are withdrawn from party barracks inside the capital. They also confiscated a large number of individual light arms, both licensed and unlicensed, from civilian cars, detained those who possessed these arms, took statements from them and rendered the licenses they carried null and void. They also arrested a number of these persons for investigation and closed some party centers.

At the Political Council

At 1000 some members of the secretariat of the Security Council of the National Movement--Dr Samir Sabbah, Hikmat al-'Id, Mahmud 'Abd al-Khaliq and Abu al-Izz--and two representatives of the popular and national forces in the secretariat--Ma'an Bashshur and Bashir al-Harbali--met with journalists at the Central Political Council headquarters.

During the meeting Sabbagh discussed the new measures. He said: The National Movement began to feel some time ago that the security situation in the national areas was deteriorating for political and personal reasons. As a result of the political developments, the deterrent forces abandoned their security role on the grounds that their presence and deployment were for military purposes and that they were supposed to have been quickly replaced by internal security forces to carry out the required security task. However, some government machineries wanted security indiscipline to continue to prevail in the national areas so that this would have an adverse effect on the people's relationship with the National Movement.

He added: This security gap made us sense the negative effects it was having on our political plans to confront the schemes of the "Lebanese Front" and Israel. We therefore decided to take an interest in the situation and to adopt measures to activate the forces which are supposed to maintain security.

Security Tour

Afterward, the journalists accompanied the members of the Security Council Secretariat to the party barracks and the barriers of the deterrent forces which were implementing the decision to ban armed manifestations.

It was confirmed during the tour that the barracks of the National Syrian Social Party in al-Rawshah and the Socialist Progressive Party in al-Manarah Corniche were devoid of any armed manifestation and that only some men in civilian clothes remained there. They have also been stripped of fortification and sand barricades.

As for the "Arab Cavaliers Forces" camp, which belongs to the Arab Democratic Party in the area of the military beach, the men there were removing the sand barricades from the main entrance but vehicles and forces were still in the camp. The situation was the same in the barracks of the Arab socialist union--the Nasirite Organization--in 'Ayn al-Muraysah, which the members of the secretariat and journalists did not enter. The men who were guarding the barracks said that "it has been decided to do away with the current main center of the union and to turn the barracks into a main center and that the barracks has been cleared of arms.

It is worth mentioning in this respect that contacts are continuing to eliminate all the obstacles impeding the removal of armed manifestations from all the barracks.

In 'Ayn al-Muraysah as far as the Zuqaq al-Balat area (the patriarchate) it was observed that the position of the independent Nasirites Movement--al-Murabaitun--has been stripped of all armed manifestations and men and has been closed down completely. The same applied to the barracks of the "Movement of the Supporters of the Revolution" in al-Basta.

The Southern Suburb

In the southern suburb deterrent forces patrols and men manning the barriers were actively implementing the new measures. Armed manifestations have disappeared from the streets and from outside the party centers and the barracks of (Rawdat al-Shahidayn and al-Raduf) which belong to Amal Movement.

TIES WITH GREECE STRONG, DESPITE SURFACE DIFFERENCES

London AL-MAJALLAH in Arabic No 82 5-11 Sep 81 pp 27-28

[Article by (Jirar Kasturyadis), AL-MAJALLAH's correspondent in Athens: "Strange Relations Between Libya and Greece"]

[Text] During the last few years Libya has developed close relations with Greece, its neighbor to the north. Libyan ties with Greece, which have become vary strong and far-advanced, have caused observers in Athens to inquire as to the reason for Col Qadhdhafi's interest in this small county, whose population is no more than 10 million, and his support for the "Libyan lobby" in Athens, which is a very influential financial and political troup of people who have far-ranging political ambitions. AL-MAJALLAH has chosen to open the dossier of Greek-Libyan relations, and it is a dossier which contains provocative and important information which occasionally goes beyond the scope of the two countries involved.

From the very first moment a person gets the impression that Greek-Libyan relations are somewhat strange. Usually relations between the two countries have been excellent, although they were not always as cordial. There have been many developments, both positive and negative, in relations between the two countries, but they have never reached the stage requiring severing the last remaining basic link which has always kept the two countries together. In other words, they have been the type of relations that one could expect between members of a family rather than relations between two countries which are governed by completely different tuypes of political systems. Libya's system is that of the "Libyan Jamahiriyah," whereas Kostandinos Karamanlis's Greek republic is a member both of NATO and of the EEC. Nevertheless, is we look closely at these two countries we will see that Greek-Libyan relations possess a logic of their own and are based on the two countries' need for each other for various reasons.

As proof of this one can cite a typical incident, which occurred not long ago and which can shed some light on the situation which exists between the two countries. Last 22 February a Libyan pilot defected with his Mig-23 airplane and flew to Greece. He landed on the island of Crete, which is directly across from the Libyan city of Benghazi on the shore of the Mediterranean, and he asked for political asylum.

This incident constituted an embarrassment for the Greek authorities, particularly because many Libyan air force pilots were in Greece and were being trained to fly Mirage planes (which both the Greek and Libyan air forces have). Furthermore, many Libyan naval cadets were studying in the Greek Naval Academy, and hundreds of [Libyan] students were receiving their education in Greek universities.

Libya immediately demanded the return of the plan along with its pilot. At the same time, the NATO countries insisted on being allowed to examine the Mig plane since it was believed that this plane was a brand-new Soviet model.

Greece came to be in a very embarrassing position, because it was torn between its allegiance to NATO and its close friendship with Libya. At first Greece tried to avoid revealing the identity of the airplane. However, as soon as the news became known, Libya was permitted to recover the plane but the pilot was handed over to a representative of the UN's high commissioner for refugee affairs in Athens. The Greek authorities refused to return the pilot to Libya because it was certain that he would be executed there. Finally he was sent to the U.S. after being given political asylum. The Libyans got angry and immediately stopped their shipments of oil to Greece. A few days thereafter a Libyan destroyer blocked the path of a Greek fishing vessel and brought it to the port of Benghazi. This chain of events, according to all normal international standards, would certainly serve to endanger relations between the two countries. However, this did not happen. The Libyan officers peacefully continued to receive their training in Greece.

Furthermore, one week later oil began to be shipped to Greece again, and the Greek fishing vessel was released after Mr Ahmad Shahati, who is in charge of foreign affairs in the Libyan government and thus in charge of the "people's bureaus" (Libyan embassies) abroad, visited Athens where he stated in a press conference that bilateral relations between the two countries were "excellent."

Mr. Shahati then became a regular visitor to Athens and was the chief guest at the conference in Athens which was held by the Council for International Solidarity with the Arab Nations. The main topic dealt with by the council was the Palestine question.

The "Libyan Lobby"

The Libyan pilot's escape to Greece, and other similar previous incidents when armed Libyan vessels seized Greek vessels, and later on released them, conclusively demonstrate the close special relationship which exists between Athens and Tripoli. They also provide proof of the degree of influence which the "Libyan lobby" has in Greece.

Greek-Libyan ties are far older than the 1 September Revolution which was mounted by Col Mu'ammar al-Qadhdhafi. In fact they are rooted deep in history. Nevertheless, these relations soon became a great deal stronger and firmer due to the Vardinogiannis brothers. They are members of one of the large land-owning families on the island of Crete--families which also own an oil refinery (which refines Libyan crude oil), a shipping company, and many other companies.

The "Libyan lobby" in Greece, therefore, is represented by a Mr Pavlos Vardinogiannis. He is one of three brothers, is a member of the Greek parliament, and is a personal friend of Col Qadhdhafi. He was also chosen as president of the Arab-Greek Friendship Association (which does not enjoy the esteem of all of the Arab groups in Athens). Furthermore, he is known for his great amibtion to become a minister in the next Greek government.

At the same time, Pavlos Vardinogiannis is a close friend of the Greek foreign minister, Kostandinos Mitsotakis, who represents Crete in the present government. Together the two men formed the Independent Greek Party, which is one of the groups belonging to the country's ruling New Democracy majority. Having such friends, Libya was able to establish firm relations with Greece. Greece has benefited from this relationship since it imports from Libya about 10 percent of its annual petroleum needs--about 2 million tons. Most of these Libyan crude oil shipments are transported via Greek transport vessels. Furthermore, Greek companies, especially construction and development companies, have been awarded hundreds of millions of dollars worth of contracts [by Libya], including contracts involving military installations.

Strategic Reasons for the Open-Door Policy

It is believed that there are strategic reasons for Libya conducting an open-door policy with regard to Greece and the other countries of the Mediterranean. The best friends which Libya has in Greece are from the island of Crete where Libya has been engaging in investments on a broad scale. Thus by means of establishing firm relations with Greece and Crete, which is the location of the largest American base in the Mediterranean, Libya is endeavoring to obtain a "guarantee" that this base will not be used against it. This is particularly important for Libya because it is very afraid that it will be attacked by the U.S. In particular Col Qadhdhafi appears to be convinced that someday Egypt and the U.S. will mount a joint attack on his country. The Libyan-U.S. aerial confrontation over the Gulf of Sidra, and developments which accompanied it, have shown that there is justification for the Libyan leader's fears. This aerial confrontation having taken place, it seems clear that Greek-Libyan relations will acquire even greater importance.

Greece--a country which closely follows events in the Middle East--for its part, has made it clear to the Libyan authorities that it will not allow its territory to be used as a base for attack against Libya or against any part of the Middle East, nor will it allow the U.S. Rapid Deployment Forces to be stationed there. In the long run Libyan also has the objective of "freeing the Mediterranean basin of all imperialist bases" (NATO bases). This is a policy which Libya forcefully and actively pursued with Malta until Malta closed down its British naval base there. In addition to this, Libya is continuing to give successful support to forces in Greece which are opposed to the NATO alliance. This policy is also supported by the Soviet Union which maintains close relations with Libya. The third well-founded reason for Tripoli consolidating its ties with Greece is the fact that Libya is geographically isolated. With the exception of Chad, Libya regards all of its neighbors suspiciously. In addition to this, Libya would like to keep at least one extra window open through which it could look out on the Mediterranean basin.

Libyan Radio Station

Libya is also endeavoring to set up, either on the island of Crete or in the Greek part of Cyprus, a radio station which beams its broadcasts to the Middle East. This would replace the station which they used to have which was shut down by Malta after Malta's conflict with Libya concerning oil-drilling rights. But so far Libya has not gotten permission to set up such a radio station. Liyba's activities in Greece have caused resentment on the part of some of the other Arab countries, particularly Iraq. Reports have mentioned that Libya, at one stage, asked Greece to supply Iran with American military equipment and spare parts when the Gulf war began, but that Greece rejected this request.

Iraq, in turn, has mounted diplomatic efforts to consolidate its relations with Cyprus and with Greece. It has increased the number of its diplomatic personnel in both of these countries, has organized a number of exhibits [there], and has asked the Greeks to participate in its development plans in order to entice them away from Qadhdhafi--their "sole friend." Although the pro-Libyans in Greece either have sensitive positions in the government or occupy positions which are close to the government and to influential circles, the Iraqis right now are almost openly actively supporting the opposition Greek Socialist Party which is led by Dr Andreas Papandreou. He is the probable winner in the coming elections which will be held in Greece next November.

SIGNIFICANCE OF SIDRA INCIDENT EXPLORED

Paris AL-MUSTAQBAL in Arabic No 236, 29 Aug 81 pp 30-31

[Article by Riyadh Najib al-Rayyis: "An Attempt to Resist Drawing Historical Parallels"]

[Text] Who among us talks about Sarajevo? Who among us has ever visited Bosnia? Is there anyone who talks about the Austrian archduke who was assassinated by that militant anarchist who lit the fire which began World War I? Perhaps nobody ever mentions this.

But there might be those among us who talk about the Suez War and Jamal 'Abd al-Nasir, and who talk about the swell of Arab vigor which transformed defeat into victory. A quarter of a century has gone by since the Suez War took place, but memories of it are still fresh in our minds.

In 1914 Sarajevo was one of the provinces of Bosnia which was part of the Austro-Hungarian Empire. The capital of this empire was Vienna, and at that time it included Hungary, the capital of which is Budapest. This empire was the home of the Blue Danube, the music of Strauss, and dreamlike waltz melodies.

In 1956 Suez was a province in Egypt. It was the name of a small village on the bank of the canal which was the lifeline for Europe and for its remaining colonies throughout Africa and Asia. Jamal 'Abd al-Nasir was the beginning of the Arabs' dreams of liberation from imperialism and of achieving some degree of unity and dignity. At that time the music of the tune "By God, destiny is my weapon" filled the ears of the Arabs with delight.

In 1914 the velvety world of Europe collapsed due to the one bullet which was shot in Sarajevo, and the doors were opened to the holocaust of World War I which nobody now either remembers or wants to talk about.

In 1956 the colonial world of Europe collapsed and this end up, for the Arabs, the doors to the tide of liberation and independence which the Western countries today would like to close once again. One must resist drawing historical parallels in order that the Libyan-American confrontation over the Gulf of Sidra last week not confuse us concerning what is possible and what is impossible. It is possible that the Gulf of Sidra incident could be another Suez War, but it is impossible that this incident could be another Sarajevo.

Until 1914 very few people had ever heard of Bosnia, Sarajevo, or even the archduke of Austria. In 1981 few people in the world had heard of the Gulf of Sidra in Libya or had heard of the colonel [as published], although they had heard of Col Mu'ammar al-Qadhdhafi, one of the world's big mouths and the object of concern on the part of world leaders, and they had also heard of President Ronald Reagan, who in the past was a movie actor in Grade B films and who is presently the President of the U.S. Since it is necessary for us to resist the temptation to draw historical parallels, we should not attach a great deal of importance to what Col Qadhdhafi said after the two Libyan planes were shot down last week, which was: "I will defend the Gulf of Sidra even if this leads to a third world war."

It is true that the colonel did say this, but it is not true that the colonel wants a third world war. Nobody wants a third world war.

Therefore, the American and Western onslaught must be controlled so that it does not bring back the scenario of the beginning of World War I and the Suez War.

The aroma of "another Suez War" has already begun to reach the noses of both European and American circles.

During the first few days of the Suez War, Britain, France, and along with them all of the other colonial powers, procalimed that the war was being waged in order to guarantee the security of a waterway which, if closed, would threaten the whole industrial world with danger. But what these countries wanted was the head of the man who ruled the banks of the Suez Canal. Imperialist Europe told the world that Jamal 'Abd al-Nasir wanted to build an expansionist empire at the expense of Europe's interests and for the benefit of the USSR and the communist world.

Today Washington is striking up the same tune. The U.S. is saying that the Gulf of Sidra is an international body of water and that the man who rules over this gulf wants to build an expansionist Soviet empire which threatens U.S. interests. The fact is that the U.S. only wants to have his head when it describes him as being "the most dangerous man in the world."

'Abd al-Nasir was not Hitler, as Anthony Eden, the British prime minister, described him at that time, nor is Qadhdhafi the 'Abd al-Nasir of today. 'Adb al-Nasir ruled a nation of 40 million people in a land possessing infinite significance in terms of civilization, history, and the Arab world. He appeared under historical circumstances characterized by given factors which are lacking today. Qadhdhafi, though, rules a vast and rich country, with a population of no more than 3 million, under historical circumstances which are different from the cirsumstances of 'Abd al-Nasir in his time. However, the accusation being made is the same one, and it is feared that the result will turn out to be the same.

Perhaps Col Qadhdhafi's basic trait is that he dares to say things which any other leader today would be afraid to say openly. In his frankness there is a great deal of spontaneity and Bedouin temperament which Reagan and his administration in Washington do not find their liking.

But to what degree is it possible to resist drawing historical parallels? Only to a certain degree. Otherwise, why is the U.S. engaging in all of this talk about laws of the seas and territorial water boundaries in order to provide a smoke screen for its obvious action of military provocation against a nation which is small, no matter how much it tries to expand beyond its borders by means its ideas, money, and weapons? Why was the U.S. engaging in military maneuvers in disputed waters if it wanted to avoid a clash with Libya rather than attempt to bring about this clash? It is true that the author of the Green Book has few friends either in the Arab world or in the rest of the world. It is also true that his greatest "crime" in the eyes of the West is that he has given aid to all of the lost causes in the world--from the IRA to Idi Amin. But it should be said in the colonel's behalf that the "lost" causes, which he has supported, have always been the causes of helpless nations rebelling against their colonial masters and striving toward the attainment of a better life. Perhaps such nations have not achieved any of this, but the colonel has helped them achieve some of the standing of glory which fate has not generously bestowed upon them.

It is also true that the U.S., by be means of its military confrontation with Libya, is utilizing all of the risks involved in this confrontation to flex its muscles in its confrontation with the Soviet Union. This is because another of the colonel's "crimes" has been that he has bought an arsenal of advanced Soviet weapons in order to provide his country with the strength and long arm needed for him to protect his interests. As far as the U.S. is concerned, this is something which is forbidden. It was forbidden in the days of 'Abd al-Nasir, and it is forbidden in the days of Qadhdhafi. What has Qadhdhafi lost as a result of his two planes being shot down? Nothing. [What has he gained?] Perhaps the support of all Arabs--including all those who love him and all those who hate him. He has mobilized all of the Arab hatred for the U.S. and the Western world. For the time being he has shown the invalidity of any justification which says that the danger of the Soviet Union is the danger which threatens the Arabs and Muslims from all sides. He has shown that the real danger is the danger coming from the U.S. and Israel, and that it is the U.S. which is always on the attack. People have already forgotten the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan and events in Poland, and they no longer remember Hungary and Czechoslovakia.

What has Reagan gained? Nothing. He has gained nothing as far as the Arabs, Europeans, or even Western nations are concerned. Whoever did not like Qadhdhafi before now has started to like him, and whoever hesitated to accept Reagan's leadership of the Western camp is now more sceptical than ever. What has he gained? Has he shown that the U.S. is capable of backing up its words with its muscles? What does this mean?

It means that we have a confrontation of giants with small nations--a confrontation which could lead to what happened after Sarajevo. Let us deal somewhat with this historical parallel in an attempt on our part to put the latest actions on the part of the Libyans in a proper perspective.

During the aerial clash between the U.S. and Libya, Col Qadhdhafi was in Aden where he was signing a treaty of friendship and cooperation with both Ethiopia and South Yemen. The common denominator among Aden, Tripoli, and Addis Ababa is that their regimes maintain close relations with the Soviet Union and that the three countries sense that they are somewhat isolated in the midst of the open territories and bodies of water which surround them. South Yemen's relations with the nations of the Arabian Peninsula are relations which are at best cautious, if not hostile. Ethiopia's relations with the nations in the Horn of Africa are relations which are characterized by tension and military confrontations. Libya's relations with the nations of North Africa are cool relations, if not mostly bad relations. The relations of all three nations with the Arab world, Africa, and Asia are relations which are, for the most part, unhealthy. But the thing which links these nations to each other is the fact that they all have direct ties with Moscow. Furthermore, they control three sensitive strategic locations which are of utmost importance as far as the policy of the Soviet Union is concerned. Also, the three nations constitute a real line of confrontation for the policy of the U.S. and the Western nations as far as fundamental geographical conflicts are concerned. Reagan, with his policy of flexing his military muscles, has managed to achieve things for Libya which Libya might have found difficult to achieve otherwise. As a result, Libya has obtained complete Arab support for its policy of confrontation with the U.S., and has managed to convince all sceptics that the U.S. only wants to keep the Arabs in an inferior position and wants to open up, for its allies in South Yemen and Ethiopia, Arab doors that had been previously slammed in their faces.

Therefore the most important condemnation issued concerning the action of shooting down the two Libyan planes was the statement made by the secretary-general of the Gulf Cooperation Council [GCC], 'Abdallah Bisharah. He said: "We consider the action engaged in by the U.S. to be a political attack which is strongly condemned by the GCC. It was a provocative trap set up by the U.S. for Libya to fall into, and it was an action like those of the pirates of the Middle Ages on the high seas." The GCC embraces the six nations of the Gulf, including Saudi Arabia and the Sultanate of Oman, both of which maintain no diplomatic or friendly relations with Libya.

Qadhdhafi also succeeded in persuading Shaykh Zayid ibn Sultan Al Nuhayyan, president of the UAE, during his visit with him last week, to have the UAE represent Libya's interests in the U.S. This represents the strongest endorsement so far, by a Gulf nation, of Libya's position.

Qadhdhafi also discussed two other important points with Shaykh Zayid:

1. The resumption of UAE economic and financial aid, and increasing such aid, to South Yemen.

2. The urgent necessity [for the UAE] to quickly establish diplomatic relations with the Soviet Union if the UAE wants to keep the GCC from having to pursue a policy of complete allegiance to, and alignment with, one particular bloc of nations.

During his short visit to Kuwait, Col Qadhdhafi also brought up the subject of Kuwaiti economic and financial aid to Aden and the political positions taken by the GCC.

The reason for the Libyan leader bringing up the subject of economic aid to South Yemen--in view of the fact that Kuwait and the UAE are the only two nations which provide aid to South Yemen--was his fear that the future policy of the GCC would be to halt this aid and that both the UAE and Kuwait would consequently be forced to go along with this policy.

Qadhdhafi also had another reason for bringing up the subject of establishing diplomatic relations with Moscow. The reason was that the knew Shaykh Zayid's opinion concerning this subject, which he had previously stated in an interview with AL-MUSTAQBAL, and he knew the opinion of Kuwait, which has already had relations with Moscow for 10 years and which supported his initiative. He was also afraid that the other four nations in the GCC would prevent the possibility of establishing these relations with Moscow unless the establishment of such relations was accomplished quickly enough so that later on it would be difficult to undo such an action. So that we should not once again be inclined to draw historical parallels, [we should know that] Reagan has already succeeded in achieving for Qadhdhafi, in Libya's Gulf of Sidra, what Anthony Eden succeeded in achieving for 'Abd al-Nasir at Egypt's Suez Canal. The crisis is still in its initial stage, and although people might have forgotten Sarajevo they still talk about the woes of World War I. And although they might have forgotten Anthony Eden, they still talk about Jamal 'Abd al-Nasir and the glories of the Suez War--with all of their assets and liabilities. These people are often seeing this historical parallel in their dreams, and they are afraid of it!

DAILY ON CONDITIONS FOR ACCEPTING PEACE

JN060634 Damascus Domestic Service in Arabic 0430 GMT 6 Nov 81

[Report from the press review]

[Text] In a commentary entitled "Those Searching for Peace," Tishrin says: Any peace plan in the region that does not achieve justice cannot achieve peace, only ignominious capitulation. Any peace that does not place the Palestinian people's rights at the top of priorities and does not reflect our Palestinian Arab people's desire to return to their land and establish an independent state on their national soil is no more than a big plot against this people and all our Arab people.

Syria's enemies have carried out a large-scale campaign against it, accusing it of being opposed to world peace and peace in the region in particular. If those enemies portray capitulation as peace, Syria is proud to oppose such a peace and will work to prevent its establishment with all available means.

However, the enemies of Syria and the Arab nation know full well that Syria is seeking to establish a real and just peace, one which differs essentially and completely from the alleged peace they are talking about and want to implement in the region by force and coercion.

Tishrin adds: We in Syria, as President Hafiz al-Asad stated, are advocates of peace and will remain so. Indeed, we shall defend peace. However, we reject capitulation because our dignity, honor and pan-Arab identity reject such capitulation. Thus, any plan that does not safeguard dignity, honor and identity will be rejected by Syria and the Arab people represented by Syria. As is known, Syria will remain the steadfast rock on which all liquidatory solutions will flounder. At the same time, it will continue to work to establish peace and to exert efforts to strengthen itself since no peace can be achieved without Arab strength.

REFORM OF BANKING SYSTEM ENVISAGED

[Text] TUNISIA'S next Five Year Development Plan (1982–1986) is expected to liberalise the country's rigid financial legislation significantly. These reforms could, in turn, encourage the expansion of the Tunisian banking system and revitalise the stock market.

At present, the Banque Centrale de Tunisie (BCT) imposes a strict control over the ten deposit and two investment banks, two development finance companies and the national savings fund. This excessive centralisation has the negative effect of limiting the initiative of bank managers, who often have a better working knowledge of local conditions and needs than bureaucrats in the BCT's office in Tunis.

Tunisian businessmen frequently complain of the delays and red tape involved in procuring credit facilities from banks. Over-centralisation has even worse effects in rural areas, where the 45 mutual credit banks are severely handicapped by existing laws. A freer hand to provide loans to farmers would boost agricultural productivity, as it would facilitate the introduction of modern machinery.

All medium- and short-term credit over Tunisian dinars 50,000 ($100,000) must first be approved by the central bank. Tunisian banking sources told 8 Days that they expected local banks to be granted greater leeway for their operations, with less interference by the BCT, in the near future.

A serious obstacle to successful business dealings is the fact that local banks are not allowed directly to carry out foreign currency dealings. The BCT also imposes restrictions on the choice of overseas correspondents. What is more, Tunisian banks tend to be undercapitalised.

The offshore banking sector, established in 1976, has been in the doldrums. Only four banks — Citibank, Bank of America, the Abu Dhabi National Bank and the Paris-based Union Tunisienne des Banques (UTB) — opened up Offshore Banking Units (OBUs), and the high hopes placed on this sector have largely come to nothing. For instance, Citibank has downgraded its unit to a representative office. One problem for the OBUs is the tight margins available to Tunisia on the eurodollar market — now only ⅜ per cent above Libor.

Zaine Bach-Hamba of UTB told 8 Days: 'The OBUs must envisage their presence in Tunisia in the long term. It is certain that if they came believing it would be easy to spin quick and large profits, they are bound to be disappointed.' Asked why a Tunisian bank had opened up an OBU in the country, Bach-Hamba commented: 'We see our role as helping to structure the market. Of course, we aren't in the market to make a killing, and we are satisfied with dealings which the other OBUs might consider too modest to handle.'

Reform of the banking system will, it is hoped, encourage Arab states to set up joint investment banks with Tunisia. So far, such ventures have been launched with France and Qatar, Kuwait, Saudi Arabia and, most recently, Algeria. These banks will play a pivotal role in financing large investment schemes during the 1982–1986 plan.

A stock exchange was created in February 1969 to organise and manage a stock market, but activity has been severely restricted, with a limited number of shares — 21m — available for trading. It is estimated, moreover, that only 500,000 shares are actually subject to transactions, as the state controls, either directly or indirectly, about 80 per cent of all shares, and institutional investors some 15 per cent. These two rarely deal through public operations in the stock market, preferring more discreet agreements.

With such a limited stock portfolio available, it is no wonder that Tunisian and foreign investors are unenthusiastic about playing the Tunis stock market. The value of transactions in 1980 was only TD20.8m ($41m). In fact, two-thirds of Tunisian enterprises have fewer than 20 stockholders; and only one Tunisian in 400 owns stock.

8 Days has learnt that a confidential study to reform the stock market has been carried out. One of the suggestions is that the state divest itself of shares worth about TD50m ($100m). While creating a wider stock trading base, this measure would not entail a return of certain companies to the private sector, as the state would retain majority control.

The proceeds from the sale of this stock would enable the state either to diversify its holdings into other corporations or launch new ones. Another recommendation involves the establishment of a special agency, along the lines of the Moroccan government's Société Nationale d'Investissement au Maroc, to manage the state's equity holdings.

To entice domestic investors as well as foreign ones, it will be necessary to improve the working of the stock market. In particular, a more attractive dividend policy and more extensive and regular financial data are necessary. Moreover, shares will have to be denominated in smaller units, if the more modest Tunisian investor is to be attracted to the stock market.

EDITOR GIVES REASONS FOR EMERGENCY PARLIAMENTARY MEETING

[Article: "The Meaning behind the Emergency Meeting of Parliament"]

[Text] Emergency meetings of parliament generally take place in decisive historic stages, with the aim of reviewing issues of utmost importance.

The emergency meeting which parliament will hold next Saturday to listen to President Anwar al-Sadat's statement is the fifth emergency meeting to be held by the president's invitation since the issuance of the permanent constitution in 1971.

The first emergency meeting parliament held in response to the president's invitation was on 15 August 1972 to discuss the Law on the Protection of National Unity and the Law on the Protection of the Public Wealth.

The second meeting was held on 16 October 1973, in the wake of the great October victory.

The third emergency meeting was held on 6 October 1974 in honor of the leaders and members of the armed forces.

In the fourth emergency meeting, which took place on 2 October 1978, the president described the results of the Camp David talks and presented the peace agreements and the Egyptian-Israeli treaty.

PEOPLE'S ASSEMBLY CHIEF DISCUSSES MOTIVES, NATURE OF LATEST STEPS

Cairo AL-AKHBAR in Arabic 12 Sep 81 pp 3, 15

/Article by 'Abd-al-Fattah al-Dib: "Conversation of the Hour with the Chairman of the People's Assembly: al-Sadat Has Refused To Use His Right To Declare a State of Emergency"/

/Text/ The location of this conversation has been changed, and its date has been postponed:

It was to have taken place in his office in the People's Assembly, but was held in a number of places -- on a mat in the garden of his home in his village; in his car, as it was traveling from his village to the Center of Tamiyah on the day of the referendum; in the garden of the town mayor, in the home of one of his Christian friends in Tamiyah, in the presence of the overseer of the church; and in a room almost bare of furniture in his home in the village.

As for the date, this conversation was to have taken place after the conclusion of the successful People's Assembly session, which enacted much successful legislation, but it did not occur till yesterday.

It was the events that imposed themselves on the discussion and posed the questions and answers.

The discussion that took place was totally different from the conversation that had started, but it was an important one covering an important occasion.

The conversation with Dr Sufi Abu Talib, chairman of the People's Assembly, came after the people had said their say, which has become binding on all organizations and agencies.

I asked the Chairman of the People's Assembly:

"The president used the powers given him in Article 74 of the constitution. Is there anything in his conduct which is prejudicial to the course of democracy?" Dr Sufi Abu Talib replied, "I would like to say, first, that the president has accustomed us to refusing to take essential, critical measures until getting a clear view and giving deep thought, deriving inspiration from the people's need for such decisions. His decisions always emerge as an expression of the pulse and feeling of the masses, and therefore he receives nearly complete support from all citizens."

"It has been revealed that the events of al-Zawiyah al-Hamra' were not an individual episode but were a scheme aimed at ruining the structure of the national unity which has been an example of peaceful coexistence, indeed of fraternity, among Moslems and Christians in Egypt through the various ages of history. It is no secret to us all that the only way to shake the stability of Egypt is to fragment the domestic front, especially the national unity. Here, the goals of the people who wish Egypt ill abroad coincide with the goals of unjust groups domestically - people who are seeking a political role for themselves or aspire to realize a personal desire or to settle accounts, and have perpetrated the incidents and kindled the flames of factional strife."

Protection of Unity

The chairman of the People's Assembly fell silent a moment, then went on:

"Since the head of the state, who is the president, is responsible, under the constitution, in accordance with the stipulations of Article 73 of the constitution, vigilantly to uphold the sovereignty of the people, respect for the constitution, and the sovereignty of the law, to protect national unity and socialist achievements, and to observe the separation of powers in order to guarantee that they play their part in national action:

"It is therefore incumbent upon the president to exercise his constitutional powers in putting limits to the factional strife which has come close to weakening national unity.

"The president had two choices as stipulated by the constitution. The first is, in his capacity as head of the executive power, to use his powers as stipulated in Article 148 of the constitution, which give him the right to declare a state of emergency. He must present this declaration to the People's Assembly. This choice gives the president the right to adopt all exceptional measures in a specific period during the state of emergency, without having his decisions and the measures he adopts subject to oversight. This choice will bring us back to the situation we suffered from grievously before 1971, when people were arrested and their relatives did not know where they had gone or when they would be released, and when property was sequestered, indeed expropriated, without limits.

"The second choice is to use the powers stipulated in Article 74 of the constitution by taking rapid measures to face dangers and present the situation to the public in a public referendum. Since democracy and freedom are among the most prominent characteristics of the May revolution, the president preferred to use the powers set forth in Article 74, in his confidence that he had the people's support for the adoption of such measures. The referendum underlined this notion."

The People's Assembly chairman raised a question himself, asking:

"Some people might wonder -- and some lawyers who belong to the Society of Democratic Lawyers for the Defense of Human Rights actually did ask me, at their meeting with me last Wednesday - if there is anything in the exercise of powers stipulated in Article 74 that infringes on the pursuit of democracy. Some of them repeated an expression which they attributed to some opposition forces in Egypt, to the effect that that is a retrogression from the principles of democracy that the May revolution has adopted. I told them that Article 74 was taken from Article 16 of the French constitution and that President DeGaulle used them during the events in Algeria; how could President DeGaulle pursue a non-democratic course? Was there anything in his use of the powers stipulated in Article 16 that struck at democracy in France? The answer all of them gave was that there was absolutely nothing in that that struck at democracy, but rather that it corrected the exercise of democracy, because the balance between the freedom of the individual on the one hand and the safety of the country on the other had been disrupted.

"I followed up on that by saying that we were faced with a grave danger, a situation which demanded balance between the freedom of certain individuals and the safety of the country and protection from the danger that threatened national unity. Any wise person would prefer the safety of the country to the freedom of a few individuals."

To Confront the Danger

Once again he raised a question himself, saying,

"They also asked me, what is the difference between the measures that are taken in applying a state of emergency and the ones taken to confront the sudden danger in a situation?

"I replied that the essential difference between the two methods is the fact that the rapid measures taken to confront the danger are a temporary thing which can be renewed and end when the state of danger ends; the only element that has a say on this matter is the people, who express their opinion through the referendum. It is not permissible to resort to it again unless -- God forbid -- this danger reappears. For this reason it is an exceptional measure for confronting a danger that threatens national unity or the safety of the country, and the democratic process continues to proceed along its natural course.

"Out of the president's desire that the measures he takes not go beyond the limits of correcting the exercise of democracy, he issued a republican decree, Decree 154 for 1981, permitting the presentation of grievances against measures taken in accordance with Article 74 of the constitution.

"It is well known that the measures taken in accordance with Article 74 of the constitution, whatever their essence might be, whatever their nature might be, are sovereign acts which are not subject to surveillance by the People's Assembly, are not subject to surveillance by the judiciary, and may not be contested. Permitting the presentation of grievances on decrees of this kind gives citizens a sure guarantee that their freedom will not be infringed and that their property will not be violated. This guarantee consists of three grades: the first [is to present grievances] to the socialist prosecutor, the second is to present them to the court of values, and the third is to present them to the appeals court of values."

The Course of Democracy

"If we accept the fact that imminent danger requires the adoption of rapid measures and that the president has clearly declared his intention not to infringe the course of democracy, some people wonder why the presentation of grievances doesn't take place before ordinary judiciary bodies -- the administrative judiciary in the case of government employees or the ordinary judiciary in the case of others."

Dr Sufi Abu Talib replied by saying:

"These people state that the measures taken to confront the danger are not ordinary ones, in view of the circumstances of the case in which they were issured. The ordinary judiciary, be it the general judiciary or the Council of State, will evaluate the situation and discuss the measure if it involves ordinary circumstances. If the situation is as the investigation describes it, political in character in the first instance, that will require that the investigation also be political, and the verdict on the grievance will show the significance of the political facts of the situation. It is no secret that there is a difference between political investigations, administrative investigations and criminal investigations; similarly, there are political accountability, administrative accountability and criminal accountability.

"It is the motives which actually inspired the commission of the act and the circumstances in which it occurred that determine the difference among them. If many acts are subjected to ordinary criteria, the investigator may not be able to ascertain the real motives or dimensions of the effects which have resulted from the act committed.

"For example:

"There might be a newspaper article which shows nothing out of the ordinary in the opinion of an ordinary person or an ordinary investigator. However, in the opinion of an investigator who is politically sophisticated, it might reveal extremely harmful effects in forming public opinion, spreading about dissension, or inciting groups against one another.

The Party Opposition

"It was logical that as long as the investigation had a political character, accountability should be political in character. The bodies the law has assigned to investigate and determine accountability regarding this sort of act are the socialist prosecutor and the court of values. This court has a number of public personalities in addition to judges from the appeals and reversal courts, who are in the majority, and their role, according to their specializations, is to determine whether it is possible to make the charges on a political, social or economic basis, in the light of the values and circumstances of society, regarding the acts being investigated or being held to account."

"A question: some opposition leaders say that President al-Sadat has eliminated the party opposition and eliminated the democratic party system through these measures."

Dr Sufi Abu Talib replied by saying,

"According to the lists that have been published on the people to be detained and the papers whose circulation has been suspended, the general criterion is to detain people who took part directly or indirectly in the factional strife, when serious proof of such participation has been established. These people have been covered by the measures that were taken. People whose participation has not been proved have not been covered by these measures. The measures cover some people who belong to the opposition and some rejectionists who have not been granted the character of opposition. They also cover people who do not belong to the opposition or the rejectionists. No consideration is given to political coloration in the case of the people to whom the measures have been applied. This notion is reaffirmed by the fact that some prominent opposition leaders have not been covered by these measures.

"Here we must for democracy's sake reach agreement on the meaning of opposition and the role of the opposition."

Dr Sufi Abu Talib concentrated on this point, saying:

"We must reach understanding on the meaning of a parliamentary democracy based on a pluralism of parties. Parliamentary party democracy is based on a majority which is in charge of governing and a minority which is in the opposition. The nature of affairs leads the two to exchange their places in government, according to the results produced by the elections. Therefore opposition is an inseparable part of the regime. Therefore the majority in England is called the government of her majesty the queen, and the opposition is called the opposition of her majesty the queen.

"Political opposition in Egypt, and the circumstances in which it has arisen, have caused some people to suffer confusion on the difference between resistance and opposition and the difference between criticism and vindictiveness! Resistance means hostility to the existing system as stipulated in the constitution and law and the adoption of all means for destroying it, even through violence. Therefore all countries consider resistance to the system to be a crime punishable by law.

"Opposition does not seek to destroy the house under whose roof it lives. It tries to disclose errors which distort its proper functioning or recommend the best means for arriving at the goals of society. In both cases it adheres to the democratic method, that is, expressing its opinions through legitimate channels, which do not include the resort to violence.

"The notions have become confused among us, because we have [experienced democracy] for just 30 years and there is a whole generation that has lived through the circumstances of the 30 years that have occurred in Egypt [illegible] economically, socially, politically and even culturally.

The Political Map

"The current political map shows that there are people who were living before the July 1952 revolution and had a prominent role in it, there are people who managed to reconcile themselves to the current regime, and there are people who have retained the ideas, the methods and the customs they held before 1952, want to bring society back to the pre-1952 regime, and do not think there is a chance they can exploit to reach this goal.

"The second group are people who have been given the label of 'power centers', people who have reconciled themselves to the current regime and people who are retaining their old ideas and seize every opportunity to strike out at the current regime in order to return to the authoritarian pre-1971 regime.

"The third group is people who reject the July and May Revolutions and refer to the current regime as [the product of] a coup and not a revolution. They justify their notion on grounds that the optimum means for reforming society [illegible] quoted from communist thinking which they [illegible].

They Want To Emulate Khomeyni

"The fourth group rejects the July and May Revolutions. The Moslems in this group describe society as remote from Islam. Islam in their view is the values and systems that prevailed in the first Moslem century, specifically in the era of the upright caliphs. Regimes different from that they describe as non-Islamic -- indeed, they go all the way and describe society as heathen. The societies of renunciation, penance and holy war killed Shaykh al-Dhahabi and do not hesitate to exploit dissension. They refuse to interact with the existing society, in order to evade passing problems, and will return us to the olden times. They want society to emulate that of Khomeyni.

"They have not drawn enlightenment from what is going on in Iran.

"As for the Copts in this group, they raise a naive question: now that 14 centuries of coexistence between Moslems and Christians have elapsed, and Islam has molded all Egypt's population into a single crucible of civilization, which Christians and Jews helped build alongside the Moslems, which is based on tolerance, equality of rights and obligations, and respect for all divine religions, after 14 centuries they raise the question: to whom does the land of Egypt belong?

"They ignore the fact that it belongs to all Egyptians, whatever the religion to which they belong might be. They have turned the church away from its role, since the church is based on the statement of Jesus, on whom be peace: Render unto Caesar what is Caesar's and render unto God what is God's -- meaning that the role of the church is restricted to spiritual and moral guidance and that the church does not enter into the political, social and economic organization of the state. The tragedies that befell Europe in the Middle Ages had as one of their main reasons interference by the church in the activities of the state, in violation of the dictates of the true teachings of Christ.

"The ambitious [illegible] that gave the Christian leaders in Egypt wanted to link the church to the political affairs of the state and thus played an abundant part in fuelling and kindling factional strife. They want the factionalism that is present in Lebanon, and have not drawn enlightenment from what is going on in Iran.

"These abovementioned groups fall within the category of resistance and are as remote as they can be from opposition. All the referenda which have taken place in Egypt since the May Revolution, and the basic values stipulated in the constitution and the laws, are opposed to guidance by the ideas that these groups are calling for in the context of Islamic law and to the grievous error to which the minority party or opposition succumbs when it allows any of these elements from these groups to infiltrate its ranks, hiding behind freedom of opinion and democracy to spread and propagate their ideas.

Frankly and Boldly

"The basis, according to these referendums and the laws, is that the fundamental values on which the July and May Revolutions were founded in the context of Arab Islamic traditions are the intellectual source of our legislation and the conduct of the members of society. Anyone violating them violates what the overwhelming majority of society has endorsed.

"It is to be noted that some opposition newspapers give scope to people who would destroy the July and May Revolutions or hide behind religion in order to destroy the values we have endorsed. It is the duty of the opposition not to allow any of these ideas or anyone who propagates them to fall under their protection."

"Question: does democracy allow rules to be set on people's behavior and opinions in order to keep the views of these abovementioned groups from influencing society?"

Dr Sufi Abu Talib replied,

"We must face the actual state of affairs frankly and boldly. It is very easy to shift from a democratic regime to an authoritarian one, and it is very difficult to shift properly from an authoritarian regime to a democratic one, and this is our situation. Without going back over the lessons of history, we can content ourselves with what we observe now in the world and the effects that have been created by sudden shifts from an authoritarian regime to a democratic one. Before us we have /the examples of/ Spain and Portugal. This is what the president once defined as a leap into the unknown. We are passing through a transitional stage through which we hope to support political, social and economic stability. The European countries and the countries of North America bore sufferings which lasted almost 2 centuries, from the time of the French revolution, the English revolution and the American revolution, until they attained the social, political and economic stability they are blessed with now. There is no room for comparison with the scope of democratic practice in these countries, although we have had to be guided by the experiences they have gone through and the results they have reached. Once these countries had been blessed by this stability, no restrictions were placed on freedom of expression or the political views that politicians were propagating. We find a royalist party in republican France just as we find a republican party in monarchical England and find communist parties in capitalist countries, as is the case in America, France and Britain.

"As for the situation here, as a result of the circumstances we have gone through, since the life span of democracy here, in European terms, is less than 60 years, and in many periods we suffered from a suspension of the exercise of democracy, we have contented ourselves in this stage with a group of rules regarding the exercise of democracy which the constitution has stipulated and the law has stipulated, foremost among them that the principles of Islamic law, social peace and national unity will not be violated and the socialist achievements and the principles of democratic socialism will not be infringed.

"No one who wishes to engage in party activity or political activity must violate these principles or values. The rejectionists from the four abovementioned groups are undoubtedly propagating ideas and values which are contrary to these principles. Democracy will not be harmed by the imposition of these rules as long as they are in agreement with the circumstances of society. Here is West Germany, which there is no doubt lies in the roster, indeed at the top of the list of, democratic countries, setting forth rules on the exercise of political and party activity so that it can keep society from reverting to Nazi ideas or falling prey to Communist thinking."

Declaration by the President to the Egyptian People

For a fairly long period, in numerous stages, some destructive groups have tried to create factional strife among the members of the homeland and have worked earnestly to eliminate its national unity, exploiting certain misleading slogans and illegitimate moral and material means to obstruct the people's progress along the road to development, prosperity and democracy in order to attain their ends.

The government has confronted all this by ordinary measures at times, by advice at other times, and by guidance and orientation at times. Recently, in particular, grave events have taken place which have faced the national unity, social peace and safety of the domestic front with grave danger.

However, this devious group has continued in its course, has disdained all values and laws, has deviated from the straight path, and has pursued the course of violence, terror, bloodshed, and threats against the peaceful. Some people have also exploited these events and have determined to escalate them, and this has made it necessary to adopt rapid, immediate measures to confront this danger which has threatened national unity and the peace of the nation, proceeding from our constitutional responsibility that is derived from the provisions of Article 73 of the constitution.

In carrying out the powers granted to us by virtue of Article 74 of the constitution, which stipulates that, if a danger occurs which threatens national unity or the safety of the nation or obstructs the government institutions' performance of their constitutional role, the president may adopt rapid measures to cope with this danger, present a declaration to the people and hold a referendum on the measures he has taken within 60 days of taking them:

We have decreed:

First:

1. The exploitation of religion to attain political or party ends is prohibited and the use of exploitation of places of worship for this purpose or to infringe national unity, social peace or the safety of the nation is prohibited: there is no politics in religion, and there is no religion in politics.

2. The detention of certain persons, where there is serious evidence that they have perpetrated, taken part in, approved or exploited in any form whatever the events which have threatened national unity, social peace or the safety of the nation.

3. Retention of the property of certain bodies, organizations, groups and societies which have engaged in activity or acts which have threatened national unity, social peace or the safety of the nation.

(Decree of the President 495 for 1981.)

4. The dissolution of some notorious societies, in accordance with the provisions of Law 32 for 1964 regarding special societies and organizations which engage in activities which threaten national unity, social peace or the safety of the nation.

5. Elimination of permits granted for the issuance of certain newspapers and publications and retention of their property and locations.

6. The transfer of certain faculty members of universities or higher institutes, where there is serious evidence that they have engaged in activities which have a deleterious effect in forming public opinion or raising the young people or have threatened national unity, social peace or the safety of the nation, to positions specified by the minister of state for education and scientific research or the minister concerned with the affairs of al-Azhar, according to the case, by agreement with the competent ministers.

7. The transfer of certain journalists and other people working in nationwide press organizations and certain people working in the Radio and Television Federation, where there is serious evidence that they have engaged in activities that have a deleterious effect in forming public opinion or threatened national unity, social peace or the safety of the nation, to the Information Department or other government bodies to be stipulated by the prime minister.

8. Abrogation of the Decree of the President 2782 for 1971 appointing His Holiness Shannudah the Pope of Alexandria and Patriarich of the Missionary Province of St Mark and formation of a committee of five bishops to perform the papal mission.

(Decree of the President 491 for 1981.)

Second:

The constitutional institutions must, each within its field of competence, adopt the necessary measures in this regard.

Third:

In application of the provisions of Article 74 of the constitution, I am presenting this declaration to the people in order that they may vote by referendum on the measures that have been adopted which it contains.

Fourth:

The referendum on the measures that have been taken which this declaration contains will take place on Thursday 10 September 1981.

PUBLIC PROSECUTOR DEVOTES SELF FULL TIME TO RELIGIOUS DISTURBANCES

Cairo MAY in Arabic 7 Sep 81 p 7

/Article by 'Isam Hashish: "The Socialist Public Prosecutor Is Devoting Himself Full Time to Investigating the Instigators of Factional Strife"/

/Text/ It has been decided that all non-urgent investigations the agency of the socialist public prosecutor is engaged in will be suspended and that it will engage in the study of papers on people charged with the events of factional strife full time.

MAY has learned that the investigations will start in the next few days. Yesterday the ninth floor of the Ministry of Justice building on Lazughli /Street/ was vacated and assigned to the agency of the socialist public prosecutor, who will occupy the eighth floor. It has learned that the socialist public prosecutor has requested that the agency be reinforced by a further number of members of judiciary bodies in order to conduct the investigations rapidly. The Supreme Council of Judiciary Authorities will review the socialist prosecutor's request for reinforcement of the agency at its next meeting. Last week, the council gave its agreement to the appointment of eight public prosecutor's office heads to work in the socialist public prosecutor's agency, and the public prosecutor will start his investigation as soon as reports on the accusations regarding each of the persons accused of stirring up factional strife arrive, in the next few days.

SOCIALIST PROSECUTOR RECEIVES INCRIMINATING TAPE RECORDINGS

[Article by 'Isam Hashish: "State Security Prosecutors Office Sends Socialist Prosecutor Tape Transcripts"]

[Text] Counsellor 'Abd-al-Qadir Ahmad 'Ali, the socialist public prosecutor, has decided to start investigating the people detained during the events of factional strife next Saturday. The investigation will take place in the headquarters of the socialist prosecutor's agency.

Thirty assistant socialist prosecutors have been delegated to conduct the investigations in order to complete them and carry them out quickly. A new floor over the headquarters of the socialist prosecutor's agency has also been set aside for the investigations.

Yesterday the socialist prosecutor received a report from the Office of State Security Investigation requesting an investigation into the persons detained. Accompanying the report were items of evidence, documents and recordings bearing on all the accused, revealing the role of each in the recent events and the factional strife. Today and tomorrow the tape recordings bearing the threads of the conspiracy will be played back.

Counsellor Yusuf Deraz, chairman of the technical office of the socialist prosecutor, said that there were specific charges against each of the detained persons.

SOCIALIST PROSECUTOR DISCUSSES INVESTIGATION STRATEGY

Cairo AL-SIYASI in Arabic 13 Sep 81 p 3

[Article by Muhammad al-Sharbini: "The Socialist Public Prosecutor to AL-SIYASI: Political Investigation Means Discussing the Detainees' Views with Them"]

[Text] The socialist public prosecutor's agency will start the investigations into the detained persons, who are 1,536 in number, in the next few days.

Counsellor 'Abd-al-Qadir Ahmad 'Ali, the socialist public prosecutor, stated "These investigations are political, not criminal or judiciary, in nature. They entail a discussion with detainees about their political views and notions and a full file on their political careers."

He said, "Some of the persons whose names have been announced in accordance with the lists will be investigated, and they have been arrested pending investigation by the Office of the State Security Prosecutor. The other detainees will be investigated politically by the agency of the socialist public prosecutor and a complete paper or political dossier is now being prepared on each detained person."

AL-SIYASI asked the socialist public prosecutor about the nature of the political investigation and the difference between that and a criminal investigation.

Counsellor 'Abd-al-Qadir Ahmad 'Ali replied,

"In political investigations, a discussion is held with detainees on all the political views they held since they began to be active in politics; that is, they are a complete evaluation of the person' entire political career. This is taking place for the first time in Egypt, by virtue of the Procedures Law, and is being carried out by the agency of the socialist public prosecutor.

"Criminal investigations are investigations into the judiciary charges levelled against the accused. They are conducted by the Office of the State Security Prosecutor and are judiciary investigations that follow the Law on Judiciary Procedures. To put it in greater detail fashion, that means that the accused has perpetrated a crime considered as a crime by the Law on Punishments, which puts his liberty and property at risk and entails a penalty ranging from a fine to imprisonment or even execution."

AL-SIYASI asked "What are the detainees' guarantees in political investigations?"

The public prosecutor said, "Anyone has the right to be accompanied by one or more lawyers to defend him and he also has the right to protest against the investigation that was made on him. The committee will then listen to the statements of the person lodging the protest, after which the committee will endorse the decrees it decides to issue in its memoranda."

AL-SIYASI asked, "Does this mean that there is a difference between the detention and arrest of a given person?"

The socialist public prosecutor replied,

"Detention is a political measure and arrest is a criminal measure. Detained persons are put in one place, arrested persons in another place."

AL-SIYASI asked, "What about political interrogation?"

The socialist prosecutor, Counsellor 'Abd-al-Qadir Ahmad 'Ali, replied,

"That is called for when a person prejudices his commitments to society and does not honor society's basic values.

"The Law on the Protection of Values from Impropriety shows their dimensions and the acts whose commission makes up this interrogation."

AL-SIYASI asked, "What measures does society adopt through the Law on the Protection of Values from Impropriety against persons who do not honor the values of society and prejudice their commitments toward it in the political sense?"

The socialist public prosecutor replied, "There are a number of measures, most conspicuously:

"Deprivation of candidacy or appointment to the chairmanships of public companies, authorities, general federations,clubs and press organizations.

"Deprivation of administration of our membership in the establishment of political parties.

"Deprivation of the occupation of positions that have an effect on the formation of public opinion."

NATURE, PROCESS OF POLITICAL INVESTIGATION EXPLORED

Cairo AL-AKHBAR in Arabic 7 Sep 81 p 4

/Article by Nadiyah al-'Asqalani: "Members of the Judiciary Proceed With Political Investigations"/

/Text/ What are political investigations? Do they differ from investigations before the office of the public prosecutor, or do they have a special character and specific procedures which differ from measures of investigation before the office of the public prosecutor and the courts? Do political defendants enjoy the same guarantees that ordinary defendants enjoy?

These questions were the focus of a conversation with members of the judiciary and the chairman of the Higher Court of Values, who occupies the position of vice chairman of the court of cessation.

Ahmad Shaybah al-Hamad, chairman of the Higher Court of Values, said "Political investigations concern crimes that infringe on national unity and the government system. The socialist public prosecutor is in charge of political investigations in his capacity as a representative of society. During investigation and trial, the suspect has all the guarantees included in the Criminal Procedures Law, in the sense that a lawyer may attend the investigation and trial with the defendants.

If there is sufficient proof of the existence of bases for the crime as stipulated in the Law on the Protection of Values from Impropriety, the Law on the Protection of National Unity, and Law 34 for 1971 bearing on the organization of sequestration guaranteeing the safety of the people, he will be handed over to the Court of Values for trial.

"The Court of Values is committed to taking the trial measures stipulated in the Criminal Procedures Law. The Law on Civil Litigation and the decrees issued by the Court of Values may be contested before the Higher Court of Values.

"The Higher Court of Values is in charge of listening to witnesses in cases and performs different forms of contestation, if any contestation of the procedures of the investigation exists.

"The higher court is concerned with temporarily suspending the execution of verdicts issued by the preliminary court, until judgment is made on the contestation presented to it.

"It is also concerned with reviewing contestations which the socialist public prosecutor presents to it. In this case, the court can amend the verdict in favor of the person who has been sentenced. The law requires that a lawyer be in attendance with the person being handed over to trial."

Political Crimes

In the realm of discussing the nature of political crime, he said, "The Law on National Unity, in its first article, stipulates that the protection of national unity is the duty of every citizen and that all institutions of the government and mass organizations must strive to support and maintain it.

"In application of the provisions of this law, national unity means unity based on respect for the system of government and basic values as defined by the constitution. It is an alliance of the forces of the people, equal opportunity, equality of rights and obligations among citizens and freedom of opinion and belief in a manner which does not infringe the freedoms of others or the basic values of society.

"Article Six states that anyone who incites some group in the alliance or group of people, calumnies it, or stirs up dissent among groups by one of the means of publicity stipulated in the Law on Punishments, Article 171, will be punished by imprisonment, if this incitement has had the effect of harming national unity."

Tendentious Rumors

"Article Five of the Law on National Unity stipulates that anyone deliberately broadcasting false or tendentious rumors or statements with the purpose of harming national unity among the forces or groups of the people will be punished by imprisonment and a fine of 50 to 200 pounds."

The chairman of the Higher Court of Values added, "The sovereignty of the law dictates that priority be given to events in the national struggle and the struggle for liberation and that preference be given to the comprehensive national interest over the special interests of all forces, groups or social classes."

Members of the Judiciary Take Charge of the Political Investigation

Raja' al-Arabi, attorney for the Higher Office of the State Security Public Prosecutor, said, "My conception of political investigation is that it is not criminal and not administrative, is related to political activity and political life, and does not constitute a criminal or administrative felony. An activity can be political but at the same time constitute a criminal or administrative felony. Political investigation is assumed by members of the judiciary, and political crimes are defined in the Law on the Protection of Values from Impropriety (95 for 1980) and the Law 33 for 1978 on Social Peace regarding the protection of the domestic front and social peace.

"In regard to the Law on Parties, anyone committing the following acts is subject to political questioning:

"Appealing for the rejection of divine laws.

"Inciting youths and young people to deviate through alienation from religious values and loyalty to the nation.

"Spreading or broadcasting false news or provocative propaganda if that took place abroad, if that has had the effect of harming the national interest of the country.

"Acts which the following laws brand as crimes:

"The Law on the Protection of the Domestic Front.

"The president's decree on assembly.

"Law 40 for 1977 on the organization of political parties.

"Law 33 for 1978 on the Protection of the Domestic Front."

A member of the judiciary, in response to the various aspects of comparison between political and ordinary crimes, said:

"Political crimes are acts which when perpetrated are not crimes according to the Law on Punishments but are crimes in the Law on National Unity and the Law on the Protection of Values from Impropriety.

"The Law on Punishments treats acts as crimes where there is categorical proof, and doubt is interpreted in favor of the accused.

"Political crimes entail serious proof, circumstantial evidence and doubts. The punishments for political crimes differ from those for other ones. Political crimes might reveal other crimes which are punishable by the Law on Punishments, in which cases the political investigation is handed over to the office of the public prosecutor for investigation into the criminal aspect."

NEWSPAPER DIVULGES DETAILS OF RASHAD 'UTHMAN ARREST

Cairo AKHBAR AL-YAWM in Arabic 5 Sep 81 p 14

/Article by Muhammad Shakir: "AKHBAR AL-YAWM, Minute by Minute with the Committees sequestering Rashad 'Uthman's Funds"/

/Text/ What were the circumstances of the decree by Counsellor 'Abd-al-Qadir Ahmad 'Ali, the socialist public prosecutor, preventing Rashad 'Uthman, member of the People's Assembly, from disposing of his funds and his property?

How did the committees act? How were they able, in 6 hours, to complete the procedures for sequestering his property?

AKHBAR AL-YAWM is presenting the full story on the measures which were taken to carry out the socialist public prosecutor's decree.

The measures began with a telephone conversation made by Muhammad Nabawi Isma'il, deputy prime minister and minister of the interior, to Maj Gen Fawzi Mu'adh, director of security, Alexandria, and Maj Gen Mahmud Marzuq, informing both that Counsellor 'Abd-al-Qadir Ahmad 'Ali, the socialist public prosecutor, had issued a decree sequestering the funds of Rashad 'Uthman, that he had decided to form a judiciary committee from the office of the socialist public prosecutor, under the chairmanship of the judiciary counsellor, to supervise execution of the measures of the sequestration decree, and that he demanded that the members of the police cooperate with him in carrying out his mission.

There was more than one reason for seeking the aid of the members of the police in supervising the operation:

First, it was observed, during the examination of the lumber warehouses the People's Assembly member owns in West Alexandria, when the office of the public prosecutor was conducting an investigation into the case of Mahir 'Uthman's sister, that he had recourse to large numbers of guards armed with weapons inside and outside the lumber warehouses. This required security in ensuring the operation against any irresponsible conduct on the part of any of his helpers.

The second reason, which was the most important one, was that during the investigations which Counsellor 'Abd-al-Qadir Ahmad 'Ali, the socialist public prosecutor, supervised, the People's Assembly member Rashad listed his place of residence as an address in al-Zamalik and, when the situation required that he be summoned during the investigation period to make some statements, it was apparent that this address was not correct but that it was the address of a building that was being demolished. The situation required that the socialist public prosecutor demand that the official agencies inform him of the address he resided in. The agencies in fact replied that he resided in a villa in Garden City, Cairo, and not in al-Zamalik.

What Happened Tuesday Night

Last Tuesday night, at 1900 hours, a committee met in Alexandria made up of Counsellor 'Abd-al-Hamid al-Buhayri, head of the office of public prosecutor in the office of the socialist public prosecutor, Counsellor Hasan 'Abd-al-Hamid, Mahrus 'Abd-al-Sami', and their aides. In the possession of each was an envelope /sealed/ in red wax. They went to the Alexandria Security Department building on Isma'il Muhanna Street and met there with Maj Gen Mu'adh, director of Alexandria security, and Maj Gen Faruq Sadiq, deputy director of security. A closed meeting that lasted a full hour was held, as a result of which it was decided to seek the assistance of the senior officers in the department, Brig Gen Halim Ghazi and Cols Muhammad 'Abd-al-Fattah and Muhammad al-Dassuqi. The situation was as follows:

Maj Gen Faruq Sadiq, deputy director of Alexandria security, asked Counsellor 'Abd-al-Hamid al-Buhayri, head of the office of public prosecutor in the office of the socialist public prosecutor, to finish geographically classifying the property of the People's Assembly member that appeared in the sequestration decree and to carry out the decree at the same time. Zero hour was 2200 hours in the evening. Accordingly, the classification was completed and the men in charge of each of the precincts in whose jurisdiction Rashad 'Uthman's properties were located were summoned to cope with all anticipated probabilities.

After a discussion took place on the plan of operation, Counsellor 'Abd-al-Hamid al-Buhayri decided to form the committees, each of which was to be headed by a man from the socialist public prosecutor's agency and to contain two intelligence officers, a regular army officer and a secret police force as members. The basic goal was to secure the operation.

I Am Waiting for You

What, however, happened in Rashad 'Uthman's office when the members of the board of the office of the socialist public prosecutor came upon him? Counsellor 'Abd-al-Hamid al-Buhayri came upon the People's Assembly member and found him sitting at his desk.

The member of the office of the socialist public prosecutor read the decree to him, based on the contents of the Laws on the Protection of the Domestic Front and the Guarantee of the Safety of the People.

Rashad 'Uthman answered by saying, "I have been waiting for you since yesterday." While sitting at his desk he turned to open the drawers of the desk, repeating quietly, "Here, take a look." At that point one of the policemen told the People's Assembly member that the sequestration decree meant that the member of the judiciary would embark on his responsibilities and that no one was to dictate to him how he was to carry out his work. Rashad 'Uthman stood up over the desk and left it to the agency of the socialist public prosecutor to start working. The socialistic public prosecutor's men turned to a small safe alongside his desk and asked him for the keys to it. He handed them over and the men from the judiciary opened it and made an inventory of its contents. It appeared that there were 3,000 pounds in it. They then turned after that to a large safe, and he told them "It is an electronic safe and I do not have the keys to it. The key is with the cashier and I do not know how it opens." The socialist public prosecutor's men immediately decided to put on red wax and ordered that his office be sequestered and its contents and documents noted down in a ledger in the presence of the People's Assembly member. At the same time, other committees engaged in their activity; a committee headed for his offices in Ahmad 'Urabi Street in the al-Bashbishi building, where he had bought two apartments that were to be the site of a new office he had intended to furnish; indeed, he had furnished one apartment, and had started decoration work in the other. He had bought the al-Naduri mansion in the Glym section and had bought another one in Mushdi. The residents were informed of the decree of the socialist public prosecutor, which was that all business was to go through them, and the tenants were so informed.

28 Items of Real Property in Alexandria

It appeared that Rashad 'Uthman owned 28 items of real property in Alexandria in the form of buildings and plots of land. It also appeared from the documents that he owned two companies, one for imports and commerce, the second for shipping and unloading. In the process of taking the inventory, the socialist public prosecutor's men recalled that there were cars, and it was decided that Brig Gen 'Adil al-Sawwah, Alexandria traffic director, would be informed of the license numbers of the cars he owned, which were three private cars, two buses and 13 trucks, and that he would be prohibited from dealing with them, lest he dispose of them.

With regard to the banks, the Credit Bank, Citibank and the Bank of Cairo were notified of the public prosecutor's decree in order to sequester his funds in the bank accounts. His properties are currently being tabulated. Other committees embarked on their responsibilities with respect to the lumber warehouses immediately, and all the lumber in them was sequestered.

Thanks to the Police from the Public Prosecutor

Maj Gen Fawzi Mu'adh, director of security, and Maj Gen Fa'ruq Sadiq, deputy director of security, received a letter from Counsellor 'Abd-al-Qadir Ahmad 'Ali, the socialist public prosecutor, thanking them for the exceptional efforts they had exerted in carrying out the decree by exemplary methods in record time. The committees are also continuing to work, and their work will be completed next Tuesday, preparatory to the issuance of a decree on the plan of action for managing these companies after the sequestration process is completed.

NEW BENEFITS FOR NEWSMEN--The Council of the Journalists' Union, under the chairmanship of Mr. Salah Jalal, has decided to amend the table of journalists' wages and raises, adjusting raises to 6 pounds per month for the first 4 years, 8 pounds for the following 4 years, 10 pounds for the following 3 years, 12 pounds for the next 3 years, 14 pounds for the next 2 years, and 16 pounds for the next 2 years, after which annual raises will be 18 pounds. The council agreed to raise the ratio of the expense allowance to 40 percent and to reorganize the conditions of journalists who were in service when the new bill was issued. The council reviewed the cases of journalists who had been detained and the contacts the union chief had made with senior officials to guarantee their legal rights. It was decided to appoint the lawyers Messrs Ahmad Shinan and Majdi Sharaf to attend the investigations and defend these journalists. It had been decided to continue contacts to provide health and social care for journalists who had been detained, and medicine has been sent to people who need it. The union has sent a letter to the socialist public prosecutor to carry out the Law on Punishments in order to enable its council members to attend the investigation into the journalists who have been detained. /Text/ /Cairo AL-AHRAM in Arabic 9 Sep 81 p 6/

HUMANE TREATMENT OF DETAINEES--An official source asserted to AL-SIYASI that all the persons who have been detained have received humane treatment which is entirely different from the treatment that arrested persons received before the corrective revolution. In addition, the desire of some detained persons for food and other personal requirements has been met. It has been decided to permit any of them to accompany their lawyers when summoned for investigation before the agency of the socialist public prosecutor. /Text/ /Cairo AL-SIYASI in Arabic 13 Sep 81 p 1/

HAYKAL REQUESTS EVIAN WATER--Muhammad Hasanayn Haykal has presented the office of the socialist public prosecutor with a request that he be permitted to purchase French Evian mineral water. This is the strangest request that the office has received from detainees so far. Haykal justified his request by the fact that he does not drink ordinary water, because it is harmful to his health, and that he has become accustomed to drinking Evian. /Text/ /Cairo AL-JUMHURIYAH in Arabic 17 Sep 81 p 1/

ROLE OF ORGANIZATIONS IN STIRRING UP STRIFE REVIEWED

Cairo MAY in Arabic 14 Sep 81 p 3

[Article: "How Did the Islamic Groups Exploit the Technique of Provocation during the Incidents of Dissension?"]

[Text] What is the line the leaders and personnel of the Islamic groups and the Moslem Brothers have pursued in stirring up the flames of factional strife?

What are the excesses committed by Moslem fanatics that have contributed to intensifying the situation?

On 24 June 1981 an Islamic conference was held in the Mosque of al-Rahman in al-Minya in which an Islamic group leader discussed the events of al-Zawiyah al-Hamra' in a provocative manner. In exchange, the head of the Group of Youths of Our Lord Muhammad asserted that some Islamic leaders had cooperated with the minister of the interior to the end of repressing the events in al-Sharabiyah.

On 28 June 1981 the imam of the Suez Mosque in Sawhaj talked provocatively about the events of al-Zawiyah al-Hamra'.

In the town of al-Mahmudiyah a religious symposium was held on 9 July 1981 attended by Moslem Brother personnel and leaders and Islamic societies, in which an instructor at al-Azhar University spoke against the government.

In Mit Ghamr a religious symposium was held on 11 July 1981, attended by Moslem Brother elements, in which the Brother Yusri Muhammad Mani alleged that the political leaders have resorted to terrifying the people through hunger in order to push the peace process through.

On the same date, 11 July 1981, Islamic groups held a symposium in the Mosque of Salah-al-Din in Cairo in which a leading member of the Moslem Brothers, Mustafa Mashhur, declared that the circumstances to which the call to Islam was now being exposed resembled [those during] the outburst of Islam and stressed that the Group of the Brothers was aimed at establishing world Islamic internationalism but no ambition to rule.

On the same date, a religious symposium was held in al-Fayyum in which Taha al-Sahhari, who leads an extremist religious group, demanded that people not deal with Christians and stressed that Moslems' apathy toward their religion had given the Christians an opportunity to commit aggression in the al-Zawiyah al-Hamra' area.

Two days before that, on 9 July 1981, Adam Salih, a proponent of the al-Salafiyah Movement, at a symposium in the al-Bashir Mosque in Cairo, attributed the events of al-Zawiyah al-Hamra' to Christian resentment and claimed that the National Unity Law had been set forth to protect Christians. al-Sa'id 'Ali, a proponent of the al-Salafiyah Movement, stressed in the Salah-al-Din Mosque in Port Said that Islamic rule by a ruler who prevented the application of God's law was a punishable act and when the ruler sat down with Jews and Christians that meant subservience to them.

On 16 July 1981 the Group of the Brothers held an Islamic conference in the al-Nur Mosque to celebrate the anniversary of the Badr raid, attended by elements from the Brothers and the Islamic groups. 'Umar al-Talmasani called upon young people to stay close together and stated that their conviction should be that death was preferable to a wretched life!

The following day, the Society of the Brothers held a celebration in al-Pasha Square in Cairo in which 'Umar al-Talmasani criticized both parties in the Lawyers' Federation crisis, reiterating that God wanted oppressors to oppress one another.

On 17 July 1981, the Islamic Group in al-Fayyum held a religious symposium in which Hilmi al-Jazzar, one of the leaders of the Islamic groups, demanded that the Moslems rally around the proselytizers!

In the town of Saqaltah in Sawhaj an Islamic group held a symposium on 16 July 1981 in which a leader of the group attributed apostasy to Jews and Christians and urged that they be fought if they did not pay the non-Moslem head tax.

Throughout the blessed month of Ramadan, people in charge of the Brothers' magazine AL-DA'WAH conducted a campaign to distribute medals and prayer schedules bearing the symbol of the group and its slogan at these symposia.

Friday Sermons in the Recent Period

Friday sermons also have involved deliberate provocations and attempts to attack the government and stir up dissension:

On 10 July 1981:

At the Salah-al-Din Mosque in al-Manyal, 'Abd-al-Rashid Saqr warned against the tide of proselytization and claimed that corruption and bribery had become widespread in al-Azhar.

In the al-Ikhshid Mosque, Muhammad Hadi claimed that the People's Assembly was procrastinating in applying Islamic law.

At the Mosque of the Upright Caliphs, Suleyman Rabi' attacked the fact that Egypt Air Company was continuing to sell liquor.

The imam of the Ibrahim Mosque in Alexandria discussed the al-Zawiyah al-Hamra' events in a provocative manner, and, following the prayer, the lawyer and Brother

'Abdallah Rashwan criticized current conditions.

In the al-Sa'udi Mosque in al-Mansurah, Muhammad al-Sharif discussed the al-Sharabiyah incidents in a provocative manner and claimed that the failure to remove immunity from Rashad 'Uthman, member of the People's Assembly, could be attributed to support for him from an official.

In some mosques in al-Minya, a statement was distributed that was issued by the Islamic groups claiming that Shaykh Sulayman Rabi', dean of the Faculty of Principles of Religion, chairman of the Society of Upright Caliphs in Heliopolis, and an element sympathizing with the Brothers, had issued a religious ruling prohibiting dealings with Christians.

Friday 17 July 1981:

The person giving the sermon at the Mosque of al-Nathir warned against dealing with Christians, claiming, that they have been accumulating weapons in order to strike out at Moslems through their wealth. The imam of the 'Ayn-al-Hayat Mosque in Cairo criticized the investigation that had been made into him under the authority of the Ministry of Religious Endowments by asking why people with black turbans hadn't been held to account or investigated.

In the al-Salam Mosque in al-Isma'iliyah, Muhammad 'Abdallah 'Uways urged that people not deal with Christians and that the Prayer of the Departed be held for what he described as the Moslem martyrs of al-Zawiyah al-Hamra' who had passed away as a result of the perfidy of the Crusaders.

In the Mosque of the Society of Islamic Law in Asyut, Najih Ibrahim, leader of the Islamic society in Asyut, demanded that people not deal with Christians.

Friday 24 July 1981

In the al-Nur Mosque in al-'Abbasiyah, Mitwalli Yusuf Shalabi criticized the position of the Ministries of Religious Endowments and Internal Affairs of preventing the shaykh of the Ibrahim Mosque in Alexandria from speaking in mosques.

In the Mosque of Islamic Youth, Muhammad Ahmad Badawi criticized the media and the programs they presented and demanded that they be reformed and that Islamic law be applied.

In the Salah-al-Din Mosque in al-Manyal, 'Abd-al-Rashid Saqr stressed that Jerusalem would never return to its owners through negotiation, urged officials to deal lightly with and pardon the shaykh of the Ibrahim Mosque in Alexandria, and called on the Moslems to stand beside him.

In the al-Tawhid Mosque in Im'babah, Kamil Muhammad 'Inan attacked birth control programs by claiming that they were in violation of Islam, criticized the profligate parties held by the Office of the President and demanded that the money spent at those parties be directed to the people.

In the Zawiyat 'Amr ibn-al-'As Mosque in Port Said, Muhammad 'Abd-al-Hamid al-Halluji stressed that the government is now one of apostasy and rejection of Islam, weakening the Moslems, and gave as proof of that the events of al-Zawiyah al-Hamra' and the blood of Moslems that was shed in them. In the Zawiyah 'Izzat Mosque in Faqus, Ibrahim al-'Izbi claimed that the Christians in Egypt were training in weapons at Wadi al-Natrun and the oases and that the government was helping them in this in order to destroy Islam.

The Behavior of Fanatic Christians

There has been irresponsible conduct on the part of fanatic Christians which has helped escalate the incidents, including:

Officials of the Coptic Archdiocese in the town of Isna have started to turn a building which was in trust on behalf of the archdiocese into a rest house to house nuns without permit, and this has provoked the condemnation of Moslems.

In the section of Isfun al-Mata'inah in the District of Isna, Christians have observed religious rituals in a building set aside for funeral observances, with the objective of turning it into a church without permit.

The performance of repairs and the erection of some installation in the Coptic Orthodox churches of Mar Jirjis and the Virgin in the village of Tukh, without permit.

The observance of religious rituals in the room of a Christian compatriot in the village of al-Kawail, Sawhaj, without permit.

The representative of the Coptic Orthodox archdiocese in al-Isma'iliyah was issued directives to some Christian religious figures to follow up on sermons delivered in mosques that involve attacks on Christians and to demand that officials take measures regarding them.

The observance of religious rituals in the Coptic Orthodox Society of Good Will in Mustarud, without permit.

The existence of a state of discontent among Christian doctors in the Itay al-Barud Public Hospital because of a complaint presented by a Moslem doctor against two Christian doctors accusing them of causing the death of a Moslem child in the course of an operation. The Office of the Public Prosecutor decided to release the two doctors and guarantee their positions.

A struggle over a plot of land in the Abu-al-Matamir area between a Moslem doctor and a Christian woman, as the result of the decision of the committee formed to investigate the dispute, which ruled that the plot of land comprised part of the doctor's property, especially since a church had been erected without permit on the plot of land, which belonged to the Patrierchate of Alexandria.

Officials in the Mar Jirjis church took over a plot of land adjacent to the church, preparing to carry out some expansions on it. The land that was violated is adjacent to a 6,500-meter area that the local council in Cairo had agreed to allocate for construction of a religious institute, and meetings were held with leaders of the people to calm the situation between Moslems and Christians in the area.

In Port Said, some Christian youths obtained contributions from residents who had retail shops, in accordance with receipts issued by the Society of the Renaissance of Coptic Youth. In the section of Nahiya in the District of Maghaghah, the Christians proceeded to sing religious hymns in the benevolent society during the call to evening prayer.

STUDENTS IN UNIVERSITIES PROTEST RELIGIOUS PRESSURE GROUPS

Cairo AL-AHRAM in Arabic 14 Sep 81 p 3

[Article: "Secrets of the True Role of the Islamic Societies in the Universities!"]

[Text] It is certain that no one is opposed to religion or freedom of worship.

It is certain that religion belongs to God but that the nation belongs to everyone, as President al-Sadat has said, directing his words to the university students: worship your lord as you wish but do not sell your will and say "heard and obeyed" to every object or society that exploits you; hearing and obeying belong to glorious almighty God.

The Islamic groups in the Egyptian universities have committed acts which have gone beyond the proper bounds.

The university records clearly show numerous incidents in Cairo University, for example, which reveal the extent of the extremism these groups have reached in a single academic year, the one that has just passed.

Last 19 March, these societies, in the Faculty of Education at al-Fayyum, obstructed a group of students taking part in competition for the most excellent student, while the bus carrying them entered the faculty courtyard, and attacked them with physical blows. Two days before that, these societies opposed a theatrical group at the Faculty of Agriculture in al-Fayyum, during the rehearsal for a play, broke into the hall, attacked members of the group and expelled the rest of the students. University regulations did not permit intervention by leaders of the Islamic groups in the university, but on last 4 March they gathered together in a demonstration inside the Faculty of Engineering, opposing the holding of monthly examinations and the recording of student attendance and absences.

In the Faculty of Commerce at Bani Suwayf, the leaders of these groups issued a command prohibiting male students from mixing with female students or standing together inside the university compound, holding up banners declaring "It is prohibited for male students to mix with female students" and declaring that they would give people who allowed themselves to be enticed into failing to honor this order a grace period of 1 week -- after which they actually did physically attack some students who were so bold as to talk with female students inside the university compound.

In the Faculty of Letters, the faculty student federation declared that it was going to show a movie, "al-Aqmar," in the faculty. The leaders of the Islamic societies raised a resistance and the dean of the faculty met with them to hear their view, which was that the movie contained scenes that they rejected, and informed them that he agreed to have one of them sit beside the projector during the showing of the movie and that they would delete the scenes he objected to. In spite of that, and in spite of their agreement, they gathered together and broke into the auditorium in which the movie was to be shown, carrying heavy clubs, whips and sharp instruments to punish the students who had been sitting in the faculty amphitheater awaiting the showing of the movie. This punishment resulted in injuries to students, including a wound on the arm of the federation head and a concussion for another student. In fact, extremist acts subsequently reached the point where showing of the movie "Rabi'ah al-'Adawiyah" was rejected in the Teachers College on the charge that there were some songs in it!

These groups did not even permit students, or even teaching assistants, to engage in athletic activity. Last 12 January Muhammad Ghunaym, a leader of these groups, blocked a female teaching assistant in the Faculty of Medicine who was about to practice on the tennis court in the company of her mother, and the incident resulted in her being chased away and being kept from practicing.

Even tours were suspended, after the incident of the trip to the al-Khayriyah Barrages last 18 December that had been arranged by the student committee at the University Village, when a group of members of Islamic societies opposed them, having discovered that some of the students had dared to sing and clap their hands during the trip, which ended at the police station in the al-Khayriyah Barrages! In addition, there were two incidents of attacks on a hostel which resulted in injury to two female students, Mirvat 'Abdallah and Sihr Mahmud of the Media Faculty.

It is strange that even cultural activity was banned under terrorism by these groups last 29 December, when the Faculty of Economics and Political Science decided to hold a book exhibit on its premises and, after the exhibit had been prepared, the Islamic groups protested on grounds that it contained books which were to be rejected. The dean of the faculty met with them and decided to form a committee, before the exhibit opened, which undertook to review and sort through the books exhibited and to remove the books they considered it appropriate to remove. However, they met and proceeded to smash up the exhibit completely and attack the students who had thought of going to visit it.

The story of the 3-day occupation of the University Village in itself reveals the extent of the extremist thinking and behavior of these groups, whose leaders prevented people working in the university village administration from going into their offices and appointed a group of students at the door to the village in their place and appointed one of the societies' students from the Faculty of Medicine, Mahmud al'Jawhari, as director of the University Village. The latter in fact did take over the office of the director of the village and appointed some students and other people who belonged to the society to positions of director of housing, the director of nutrition, and the director of legal affairs. They took over the operation of housing students in the Islamic groups and demanded that the university president's advisor for university village affairs and the expelled village director be dismissed. The occupation lasted 3 whole days and ended with the loss of all the documents and equipment belonging to the village administration, as well as with the acceptance by the university administration of their demands, in order to end the 72-hour occupation of the university villages.

During, before and after this occupation, the problem of the imposition of their control over the village was constantly at issue. Daily there were dozens of incidents of breaking into students' rooms to compel them to perform the dawn prayer or refuse to accept the food the village offered because it was made out of processed fat, which they complained had some pig fat in it, and they insisted on preparing the food without that fat!

What Does the Broad Base of University Students Say?

Although the universities were in holiday at the end of the academic year, numbers of students began to visit their faculties in anticipation of seeing new features of university activity which they had been prohibited from in previous years, as soon as the decrees to protect national unity were declared. What do these students say?

The student Tariq Sa'd 'Ali of the Faculty of Science, Chemistry Department, Cairo university, says, "We had been waiting for President al-Sadat's decree so that life in the university would resume as all university students had been waiting for it. The Islamic groups had been mixing religion with politics, making life in the university unstable, and the Islamic groups' insistence on getting the students to elect them took place without our knowing anything about the people who had nominated themselves for election. In spite of that, the Islamic groups have not offered us, as students, anything new. All they have offered us is politics and extremism. Therefore the president's decree came at the proper time!"

The student Muhammad Muhammad Abu-al-Futuh of the Faculty of Science, in the second year in Cairo University's Chemistry Department, says, "Through religious fanaticism within the university, religion itself is almost being lost. The Islamic groups' considering people who do not go to the mosque as atheists has been a bitter thing for us as Moslems. The Islamic groups' demand that when the call to prayer comes we must leave our lectures or work and perform the prayer -- it is not reasonable that we should abandon a doctor in a lecture to pray, although we could have joined the prayer. The discrimination in treatment between us and our brother Islamic group members was /like that between/ Moslems and atheists, even though the other party is Moslem. Political publications have proliferated and religious publications aimed at enlightenment have declined. The Islamic groups' expenditures on political publications have been greater than their expenditures on problems of students in the faculties and various activities. In fact, we have been waiting for President Anwar al-Sadat's decree so that we could lead a family life removed from fanaticism and extremism."

The student Muhammad Sa'd Muhammad, a student in the Faculty of Law in Cairo University, second year, says that he is more than in agreement with every decree President Muhammad Anwar al-Sadat has declared: "The Islamic groups within the university belittle the students. Their compelling the students to pray and leave lectures has shown a lack of understanding and has arisen out of fanaticism. The answer to that on the students' part has been to refuse even to go to the mosque. In general, had it not been for the president's decree, we might have reached the stage that Iran and other countries have reached. The president's decree is 100 percent correct." He added, "All the declarations which the Islamic groups made are lacking single item of proof and as long as there is no proof there is no dispute over the issue." The student said, "The president's decision to pardon wayward students is a merciful one for them all; he has given them a second chance. How can there be progress if we are to uplift Egypt's status and uplift our country in the context of religious and political extremism? The president's decree came at the right time."

The female student Nasrah Sayyid Muhammad, of the Faculty of Commerce at Cairo University, said that this was her first year in the university, that she had heard about what the Islamic groups were doing, that she had wanted to see what they were seeking through these acts of theirs, and that when she learned of what President al-Sadat had said she believed what had been said about the Islamic groups and life in the university, which had become abnormal. She agrees with the president's decree as long as unstable conditions exist within the university: "We have come to the university to learn, study, gain an education and create a spirit of warmth and mutual understanding among ourselves as students, but as far as politics goes there is no room for that inside the university. Fanaticism is something which harms us as Moslems and Christians. We want to pray, but there is no place for politics, violence and fanaticism among us as students."

Majidah 'Abd-al-'Alim in the Faculty of Letters at Cairo University, first year, said, "Yes to religion within the university, to the study of religion and to our love of religion, but no to politics and fanaticism within the university. The university is not a place for political issues or problems."

A student in the Faculty of Commerce at the University of Cairo, who refused to mention his name, said, "The matter is now in the hands of a just father, and we all know the extent of his love for Egypt and his feeling for the Egyptian people. At the beginning, the Islamic groups were concerned with religion alone, and had no fanaticism on the outside, but, with the passage of time, they began to involve themselves on many problems and points in which they have no right to interfere, and, through this interference, have established an unfavorable position for themselves among students. Even in the student elections they compelled students to give agreement to all members of the Islamic groups and did not give agreement to any other member outside the Islamic groups, saying that anyone outside the Islamic groups was an atheist. They were always reading the Koran every morning before lectures and talking to us as if we were infidels and not Moslems. The president's decree will make us Moslems and Christians living in a single house as brothers, each of us will have his religion and will worship God as he wishes, and thus it will make us feel secure in our academic and fraternal lives so that we can feel that the university is another home that we live in and not a place for strife and fanaticism. The president's decree restored university life to us once again after we had lost it over the years that have passed."

Another student, in the Faculty of Antiquities in Cairo University, said "The Moslems and Christians live under a single banner, which is the banner of Egypt, and the land is the land of Egypt. Islam and Christianity are two of God's religions, and each of us may worhip God. However, for either of them to act and place himself in a position remote from his brother with whom he lives on the same land is something society rejects, the conduct of all these people is in the interests of no one and if they are harmed, Egypt will be harmed. Through the decree the president has issued, we can live as we had lived before. It is not the time for fanaticism and dissension. It is the time for the future and for progress and time for solving the country's problems. We agree that there should be a mosque inside the university and that we should pray and worship God, but we do not want the mosque to become a place where we are cursed, when we used to receive religious guidance from it. The university is a place where the people of Egypt meet to study and spread the spirit of brotherhood among students so that we can benefit our country by our ideas and not harm Egypt with them. The president's decree has saved Egypt, Moslems and Christians alike, from a civil war that would have broken out because of fanaticism."

Muhammad Fu'ad, of the Faculty of Commerce, Cairo University, said "The decree will restore stability to the university and we all feel, as students, that we are in a sacred place where we study knowledge far removed from politics, concerning which no student knows anything. Everything that is said about politics within the university comes from the Islamic groups and it does not have a single source; it all consists of notions on the part of some vindictive, opportunistic groups, and none of the students in the Islamic groups can get anything by these methods unless there are some other people behind them who are feeding the young people with these methods and their naive ideas and principles in order to instill corruption, hatred and dissension among the people in Egypt's universitins to the abyss. The president's decree dissolving all the Islamic societies and groups has come at a time when Egypt needed it. Everyone hopes to worship God in the proper manner, but not to utter curses, lies and fanaticism. Finally, we say once again that we are Moslems and that religion is innocent of every tongue that utters what is not right, that we worship God as he wishes, and that we are all thinking about the problems of Egypt, but in a spirit free of fanaticism. Egypt is in the most intense need of us young people so that we can raise its name on high and with pride among the countries of the world. We are in agreement with the president's decree, with the utmost warmth and affection, so that the spirit of love may return to us and the spirit of hatred and vindictiveness may be removed from us."

ALEXANDRIA PROSECUTOR INVESTIGATES ISLAMIC GROUP ACTIVITIES

/Article: "Investigation into Members of Islamic Groups That Met and Distributed Pamphlets in Alexandria"/

/Text/ The Office of the East Alexandria Public Prosecutor has been conducting its investigation into the 21 persons and members of Islamic groups in the city that security officials seized, discovering in their possession publications and pamphlets attacking and ridiculing the regime, calling for the incitement of factional dissension in the country, and attacking the peace treaty, as well as the 33 persons who had assembled before the Mosque of the Commander Ibrahim at the al-Raml Station, attacking security officials when they prevented them from holding a meeting to condemn the regime.

Security officials arrested 21 persons who belonged to Islamic groups in Alexandria and discovered large amounts of publications and pamphlets in their homes calling for vilification of the regime, demanding that it be changed, condemning the peace treaty and normalization of relations with Israel, calling for the incitement of factional strife and spreading about false information on incidents of religious strife. Some of these publications were written by hand and the rest were printed. There were a number of detailed memoranda on the activity of every group, its formation, its commander, and the role of each proselytization and media committee, camp, group coordinating committee and publication and declaration printing committee in it, binding every member of the group to commit himself loyally and sincerely to the principles of the group, to detachment and to patience, as well as committees to prepare people giving sermons at public symposia and to send out delegations of people giving sermons inside and outside Alexandria.

Among the people arrested were Khalid al-Za'farani, owner of a bookshop; Sani Isma'il Sani, an engineer in a contracting firm; Ibrahim al-Za'farani; Ahmad Yahya Matar, a student in the final year of medical school; Usamah Sa'd-al-Din al-'Iraqi; al-'Iraqi Sa'd-al-Din al-'Iraqi; Ahmad Sa'd-al-Din al-'Iraqi; Ahmad 'Abd-al-Jawad 'Abd-al-Karim, a law student; Ayman al-Mughrabi, a pharmacy student; Mu'min Fadil Karim of the Faculty of Letters; Awwad Yusuf'Ali; and 'Umar 'Azzam, an engineering student.

The investigation was undertaken by 10 attorneys in the Office of the East Alexandria Public Prosecutor under the supervision of Counsellor Sami al-Bariri, attorney general with the East Alexandria public prosecutor's offices. They were charged with the possession of publications that embraced the propagation of resistance to and vilification of the basic principles on which the system of government was founded, preaching against the alliance of the forces of the people, provoking factional strife, and disseminating false declarations which had the effect of offending public security and inflicting harm on the public interest.

The Office of the Public Prosecutor also continued its investigation into 33 people who proceeded to gather in front of the Mosque of the Commander Ibrahim at the al-Raml Station and attacked security officials when they tried to prevent them from holding a meeting in the mosque to discuss seizing Shaykh al-Mahallawi, the imam of the mosque, and some political issues and events of factional strife. It raised the charge of gathering, resisting the authorities and affronting national unity against them. The Office of the Public Prosecutor ordered the 4-day imprisonment of all the people arrested during the investigation, and continued its investigation.

NEW LIGHT SHED ON ORGANIZATION LEADERS

Cairo AL-AHRAM in Arabic 7 Sep 81 p 3

/Article: "The Commanders of the Islamic Groups -- Who Are They and How Do They Think?"/

/Text/ Of them, President al-Sadat has said, "They are destroying young people's minds, and I am fearful for my children the students."

They are people who call themselves "commanders of the Islamic groups." Islam is as innocent of them as the fox was of the blood of Jacob's son.

Most unfortunately, they have tremendous power over the young people who have been influenced by them and who have been attracted to them in the name of religion. Their power even exceeds that of fathers and mothers.

Indeed, their interpretation of religion, in the view of their subjects, is more correct and valid than the interpretations of scholars, jurists and memorable men of the Islamic religion.

Of them, President al-Sadat has said, "The events prove the extent of the corrupting influence that these groups have exerted on young people's minds."

What do you know about the views of these Islamic groups? Who are they? What are they doing? How far has their activity inside and outside the universities gone?

Dr Hilmi al-Sayyid 'Abd-al-'Aziz al-Jazzar

He is 26 and is the general commander of the Islamic societies. He was born in Sirs al-Layyan, Governorate of al-Minufiyah, and is a doctor of distinction at the Umm al-Misriyin Hospital in the Governorate of al-Jizah.

Measures taken in regard to him:

The university disciplinary council decided to dismiss him for the academic year 1981-82 for participating in the disturbances in the university.

He was accused along with others in administrative case 1006 for 1981 of attacking the security personnel in the university in July 1981 and was released on bond of his place of residence.

Ra'fat Muhammad Hasan Darwish, Mining Engineering, Suez

He was born on 15 January 1959 in Fuwwah, Kafral-Shaykh.

A student in the Faculty of Petroleum and Mining Engineering in Suez, University of the Canal.

Commander of the Islamic group in the faculty.

He took part with other members of the Islamic group in Suez in the following movements:

Holding an Islamic conference in a mosque in Suez, in which he made statements that included an attack on the current regime. Gathering in the faculty courtyard and repeating opposition cries in an attempt to stop a party honoring professors and final year students.

Jamal Muhammad Bakhit Salim, Faculty of Education, Asyut

Born on 19 December 1959, Abnuo.

Student in the Faculty of Education, Asyut, and commander of the Islamic group there.

He has been very active in attacking students.

He has also used the Education Faculty microphone to give a religious talk and provoke students in the faculty. When the faculty dean warned him, he did not comply with his command, and insulted him in an undignified manner. A decree has already been issued by the faculty disciplinary council dismissing him for the academic year 1980-81.

He was charged in misdemeanor case 3535, Precinct One, Asyut, for striking out a student.

MEASURES FOR CRACKING DOWN ON RELIGIOUS GROUPS DISCUSSED

Cairo AKHBAR AL-YAWM in Arabic 5 Sep 81 p 1

[Article: "When Will It Be Proper Legally To Dissolve the 1,500 Religious Societies in Egypt?"]

[Text] There are 9,500 religious, cultural, scientific and social societies in Egypt, 1,500 of which are Islamic and Christian religious societies. There are conditions which must be met for establishing and announcing religious societies. These societies must play a basic part in the field of social care, and there must be an urgent need for their establishment. Holding these societies is a right guaranteed by the constitution to every Egyptian citizen, but with conditions. A society will be considered null and void if it violates public order and morality. The Department of Social Affairs has the right to dissolve the board of directors of a society in special cases; if it is proved that a society has violated the law, the ministry will send it a warning to cease its violations within 15 days. In the event it does not comply, its board of directors must be dissolved and a temporary board will be formed for a period of 1 year, which can be extended to 3 years.

The board of directors of a society will be dissolved if it is proved that it fails to achieve its objectives, has committed a grave violation of the law, or has violated public order and morality.

The conditions under which the Ministry of [Social] Affairs has the right to dissolve a society or its board of directors are:

If its inability to achieve the goals for which it was established is proved.

If it disburses its funds in a manner other than those specified in accordance with its goals.

If it fails to hold its general assembly 2 years in a row.

If it commits a serious violation of the law or violates public order and morality.

UNIONIST GROUPING PAMPHLETS SEIZED

/Article: "Seizure of Provocative Pamphlets in Grouping Party Headquarters"/

/Text/ The security agencies seized a large number of publications in the Grouping Party building inciting the masses and directing false rumors that have the effect of damaging the country's security. The printing and copying equipment used was also seized and confiscated.

The state security investigators presented Counsellor Raja' al-'Arabi, general attorney for the Officer of the Higher State Security Prosecutor, with a report stating that the Grouping Party had issued a number of successive publications the last 2 days containing an invitation to the masses to rebel against the government's decrees concerning the arrest of persons who have been busily stirring up dissension, stirring up the masses, and calling on them to stand up to the government to abrogate these decrees and release persons who had been arrested.

The public attorney 'Asim 'Abd-al-Hamid, head of the Office of the Public Prosecutor, has been delegated to investigate the Grouping Party's headquarters on al-Antikkhanah and 26 July Streets in Cairo and to seize publications, written materials, printing machinery and equipment, copying machines, and equipment used for printing and publishing.

The head of the Office of the Public Prosecutor accompanied a police force to the two headquarters of the two parties and a large number of pamphlets that had been readied for distribution were seized, as was a further quantity that was in the process of being printed along with written materials and statements inciting the masses to overthrow the regime.

/Text/ In party circles they say that the short honeymoon between the party of the left and the Islamic groups has ended. Is that true?

This honeymoon began some months ago, with veiled overtures that turned into overt ones at meetings and discussions of the party of the left, starting with an invitation to embark on a dialogue with the Islamic groups and going on to participation in independent theorizing about Islam and then to praise of the struggle of Shaykh Hasan al-Banna.

It was, in their view, a successful attempt to attract the Islamic left and bring it into the embrace of leftist currents.

Until the honeymoon ended.

In the past weeks, in the wake of the factional events, a covert struggle between the party of the left and the Islamic groups has become prominent.

In more than one statement, the Islamic groups have attacked Communist schemes in the region and have described marxists as enemies of Islam whose goal is to distort the picture of all Islamic groupings.

The party of the left severely criticized the latest statement issued by the Islamic groups on their position vis-a-vis the factional events committed in al-Zawiyah al-Hamra' and the Church of Good Will in Shubra. It described that as a fanatic, nonobjective statement which entailed immediate provocation.

In its response to the Islamic groups' statement, the Grouping Party declared that it differed with them on some issues, such as the position on the Zionist state, on grounds that its inhabitants were Jews, and defended the Soviet Union, the first country to recognize Israel.

Matters did not stop at the exchange of ideological accusations but went beyond that to indications of the role of both in feeding the currents of fanaticism.

We find the Grouping Party accompanying its response to the Islamic groups' statement with an incident attributed to the members of one of the Islamic groups in Hilwan, to the effect that a large number of these members, armed with heavy clubs, attacked and struck citizens, resulting in death and injury to some of them.

These are the details of the incident as declared by the party of the left, and we have no comment on them!

It remains for us to say that some people still doubt that the honeymoon between the left and the religious elements has ended and describe what is happening between them as a tentative maneuver!

/Article: "The So-Called Religious Committee of the Party of the Left: an Islamic Facade for an Atheistic Party"/

/Text/ In his latest speech, President Anwar al-Sadat referred to "the story behind the religious committee" which the party of the left, some of whose leaders were implicated in the incidents of factional dissension, has originated.

What is the story behind this committee?

What are its stands vis-a-vis issues and events in the Islamic world?

A number of party members who have taken upon themselves the task of convincing their party's leadership of the importance of establishing a wing for the Islamic left within party ranks have called for the establishment of a religious affairs secretariat within the party of the left. Foremost proponents of this idea have been Dr Muhammed Ahmad Khalafallah, Dr Hasan Hanafi and Shaykh Mustafa 'Asi.

The leadership of the left has spelled out the new committee's task as a number of goals that will serve the interests of the party in the first place. These are:

Innovating a religious facade for the party which will free it from the change that it is atheistic, communistic and hostile to divine religions.

Overcoming the problem of declining membership which the party is suffering from.

Creating bridges for cooperation with opposition currents that express their reservations over the subject of coordinating with the party of the left.

Although this committee has failed to perform its mission, it has continued to play a feeble, unsuccessful proselytizing role in transparent ways, twisting matters to ill effect, so that the religious picture of the party remains as it has been.

It is strange that this committee's religious philosophy is not far removed from the Soviet Communist Party's philosophy on Islamic issues and events. This is confirmed by the extreme interest by which the party received the statement of the 26th conference of the Soviet Communist Party's sections bearing on its position on Islam; the committee worked hard to study Brezhnev's statement on religious revolutions, giving as an example Iran, and the Soviets' readiness to support all other movements possessing a character of liberation and progress.

There then occurred the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan; Moslems were killed and revolutionaries were persecuted, but the leftwing party has declared its support for it and has risen up to defend the policy of colonialistic intervention.

The religious committee has refused to let religious occasions go by without celebrating and holding conferences, symposia and celebrations on the holidays of the birthday of the prophet and the hegira - celebrations which suddenly turn into political invective and the levelling of charges and rumors, so that as the celebration goes on it turns into an artistic free-for-all where the political songs of their singer, Shaykh Imam 'Isa, are greeted by the cries of young people who through the singing have forgotten the sacred nature of the religious occasion -- as well as cries of approval from young girls who are smoking!

When the factional events took place in al-Zawiyah al-Hamra' and Shubra, the party greeted this situation with provocative, hostile pamphlets that did not remedy the situation so much as inflame it. The religious philosophers of the party enlightened us with strange interpretations and explanations of what took place, sometimes saying that economic liberalization was the cause, sometimes saying that the government was deficient in playing its part. The party then urged the various opposition currents to hold a national unity conference to deal with the issue of strife, not just by boycotting the government but also by opposing it, on grounds that it was responsible for what had happened.

Shaykh Mustafa 'Asi, secretary of the committee and member of the central secretariat of the Grouping Party, whose name appeared in the list of people detained on the decrees of national unity, was removed from his position as the giver of sermons and exhortations in the al-Nasr Mosque in al-Mansura by the Ministry of Religious Endowments some months ago because he had strenuously engaged in stirring up strife and disturbance.

Is the party of the left still in need of this committee, now that its role has been laid bare?

SOVIET ROLE IN STIRRING UP STRIFE DETAILED

Cairo AL-AKHBAR in Arabic 15 Sep 81 pp 9, 12

/Article by 'Isam Hashish: "Egyptian Intelligence Uncovers Two Conspiracies To Strike out at National Unity and Stability in Egypt by Tape and Photographs"/

/Excerpt from text/ The case was an undercover conflict between Soviet and Egyptian intelligence. Each was operating in quiet and silence, in the conviction that the other knew nothing about its movements.

However, the outlines of this story will bring features of great amazement to the face of the first secretary of the Soviet Embassy in Cairo, one of the persons implicated in this case. Only through these outlines will one learn that Egyptian intelligence men have been watching his movements and behavior since 1975.

A Young Egyptian Reveals the Plot

The hero in this story is an Egyptian student who loved his country and traveled for its sake to seek an education in the Soviet Union and obtain a doctorate in sanitary engineering. There Soviet intelligence hunted him down and kept after him with threats and pressure. On one side of the scale they placed his acquisition of a doctorate after 4 years of research and study and on the other they placed his cooperation with them and his provision of aid in all the information they needed. He gave his agreement; he would obtain the doctorate and would be one of their men. However, the situation changed. After he turned into a testing ground for their experiments and they had gained trust in him, they left him to go to Cairo, and there another role, that of Egyptian intelligence, began. He stated everything and left the rest of the game to the Egyptian intelligence men; the first secretary of the Soviet Embassy is reading this now, for the first time, though he was one of the people arranging the events.

The name is Rizq Murqus Rizq, a Christian Egyptian citizen born in Alexandria in 1935. He worked as in instructor in the Sanitary Engineering Department of the Engineering Faculty at Alexandria University.

The events in the story go far back. The threads of the story began to be woven 10 years ago when Rizq Murzus waved his family goodbye with both hands on board a ship en route to the Soviet Union, finally about to realize the dream of his life and acquire a doctorate in sanitary engineering.

The Soviet Intelligence Game:

In Moscow, after 4 years of study and research, on 1 April 1975 specifically, the men of Soviet intelligence started their devious role of entangling the Egyptian student.

Yuri Alexeyev, assistant director of the institute in which the Egyptian student was studying, sat in his office with another person by his side. He summoned the student Rizq, who came in with his many papers on his thesis, which was nearing completion, in his hand. Introductions were made between Rizq Murqus, the Egyptian student, and Victor Demetrievitch, a journalist from PRAVDA. The assistant director asked Murqus to perform a service for him. He requested that he do a journalistic paper on the Middle East for his friend. The Egyptian student naively accepted and expressed his readiness to cooperate. Then some idle conversation took place. The journalist asked him about Palestinian guerrilla organizations, when they originated their number and the most popular organizations, on grounds that Rizq had studied the Palestine cause and the history of the Arab nation. The discussion extended to the Kurds, the Druzes, communist influence in Iraq and the plan to establish a Palestinian state on the /West/ Bank, all questions which could have been conventional but were raised for a specific goal.

The journalist was to discover Rizq's abilities, information and breadth of knowledge.

The Press Is a Cover for Espionage

The meeting ended and Rizq prepared the article and handed it over to the journalist. Days passed, and then the journalist got in touch with Rizq again. There was no intermediary to handle this meeting; it went on as if between two friends. The journalist said that he had obtained some money from his paper in exchange for publishing the article on the Middle East and he wanted to share it with his friend. Rizq adamantly refused. The journalist thanked him and asked him if he could follow up by turning to him for information he could help him with on Egypt and the Middle East. The Egyptian student agreed.

The meetings continued; there were eight of them between Victor Demetrievitch and Rizq Murqus; in Salonikia Park in Moscow, discussions took place between the two and started to revolve about a smaller area. Demetrievitch started to ask him about President al-Sadat, his orientation to the West and the extent to which the people were happy with this. Were there opposition groups? Rizq responded in general terms -- not knowing much, since he had been outside Egypt for years. However, doubts began to plague him. He tried to get out of the meetings, but the journalist pursued him and insisted. Doubts grew in the mind of Rizq, who was compelled to refuse adamantly to meet. On the other hand, he was occupied with his thesis and in preparing to defend it.

Postponement of the Thesis

The siege began from another angle. The date for defense of the thesis was postponed. His professors and supervisors started to ignore him. By August 1975 Murqus began to feel that the matter was deliberate. Then suddenly the journalist appeared again. This time he visited Rizq in his residence at 0700 hours in the morning and asked him "Why don't you want to meet me?" Rizq replied bluntly and boldly in the manner of one who has no expertise, "Because I feel that you belong to intelligence and are behind the postponement of my thesis."

The Threads of the Attempt Are Revealed

The maneuvers moved over to a new stage. The journalist frankly told him that he was a member of intelligence, that he only wanted world peace and the destruction of reactionary forces, and that socialists had to cooperate for the sake of this lofty goal.

Rizq thought, reached a decision in his own mind and agreed, but expressed his fears about Egyptian intelligence, which was well known for its strength and contacts, fearing that his situation would become known. The journalist reassured him that Soviet intelligence was also strong and that no power could touch him as long as he was under its protection.

Agreement at a Higher Level

The agreement started to circulate at a higher level. They now agreed on how contact would take place between them in Egypt or abroad, how they could acquire information, how they could confirm it, and the nature of the information desired. The meetings shifted from Salonkia Park to another area, with space and some walls. The journalist wanted to exert his power over Rizq. He gave him a feeling of being involved in secret activity without intermediaries. Afterward, their meetings took place in the 4th floor of the Budapest Hotel on Petrovsky Street, Room 442. The journalist started to test him. He asked for information about his Egyptian colleagues. Russian intelligence had had information on all of them in advance, but they were testing him and observing how serious he was. Rizq passed all the tests.

At this point Victor declared that Rizq's thesis would be defended at the end of October. It was defended, and he passed with distinction. The final stages of the tactics began: Rizq was to set off in a few days.

How Would the Contacts Take Place?

Agreement was reached on arrangements for having meetings between the two of them after Rizq reached Alexandria. The agreement stipulated the first Tuesday of each month as a meeting date, the telephone would ring at Rizq's home at 2000 hours. The provisions of the arrangement were:

"Good evening, I am your student Yusri -- do you have any objection to our meeting at such and such a time?" Rizq would reply "Not at all, there are no objections, you are welcome."

The next day Rizq would go to the Playboy Casino in San Stefano at 0950 hours. He was to wear a suit and have a white handkerchief folded in a triangle in his upper pocket and an Arabic magazine in his left pocket. These were just identification signs. Rizq would sit down and order something to drink.

Before 1010 hours an emissary of Soviet intelligence would come to him and the following conversation would take place between them:

"Your face is familiar to me. We met before this in Syria in 1968, in the Green Valley Restaurant."

"Heavens, no, I wasn't in Syria then, I was in Beirut."

At that point the introduction would end and the message would be given. If the emissary did not arrive by 1010 hours he would have to leave.

Rizq Reveals the Plot

Rizq returned to Alexandria on 30 November. The following day he was elsewhere, divulging all his information.

Three years elapsed, in which no contact with Rizq took place.

At this point an Egyptian intelligence official explained to AL-AKHBAR an important distinction between an active agent and a quiescent one. The former is one who is assigned missions and carries them out at once, while the latter is recruited, sent to the requisite places, and remains in an ordinary state until a subsequent time, no matter how long that may be, and is ready to receive information and orders and carry them out at once.

Rizq was of the latter type. Three years went by before they contacted him. They had recruited him and became confident of him, and then the time came to use him. One day when he was leaving the university he met two people who told him "We are friends of Victor's and want to complete the mission that started in Moscow."

The two were officers in Soviet intelligence. The first was Anatoly Bakunim, third secretary in the Soviet Embassy in Cairo, who had arrived in Cairo on 1 July /text ends at this point/.

ARTICLE ACCUSES NEW WAFD OF SECRET SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES

Cairo AL-AKHBAR in Arabic 15 Sep 81 p 9

/Article: "When the Dissolved Wafd Party Tried To Provoke Civil War in Egypt!"/

/Text/ This is not the first case the leaders of the dissolved Wafd Party have involved themselves in, nor is it the last. After their spirits became filled with vengeance and hatred, they kindled fire in all of society's values and infiltrated themselves by the basest of means in order to reach the masses, exploiting the masses' sufferings and kindling resentment, strife and revolution in their hearts also.

Their hopes of causing destruction brought them to the point of calling on people to bear arms, even at the risk of civil war. Fu'ad Siraj-al-Din felt no concern or anxiety for the security and safety of the people of Egypt, while bluntly preaching, in these words, "We will face severity with severity and will resist the club by the club and the knife by the knife, even if that leads to civil war." This is his statement, in his voice, on the recordings made of him after the Office of the Higher State Security Prosecutor gave its agreement /to this procedure/.

Gathering Opposition Forces

General Intelligence reports which followed up on the case confirm that it was not important whether Moslems, Christians or Communists joined them -- the important thing /to them/ was that all opposition forces join together and act in tentative harmony in order to carry out their goals of overthrowing the regime at any cost in the name of the people of Egypt, even if the people paid the price for this with their lives and the lives of their children.

The Soviet Union Sketches the Outlines of Dissent

The Soviet Union was sketching the outlines and strategies in the background, leaving it to those people to carry them out. The reports confirm this: the Soviet Union did not prepare its traditional role of raising the red flag before attacking; it knew that the Egyptian people who abused their religion. Rather, it started with a new approach, which would bring it to its ultimate goal of overthrowing the regime in Egypt, after it had become the obstacle to the infiltration of Soviet influence in the Middle East against which all attacks it had tried to launch were dashed. The approach this time was religion, factional strife, since that was the easiest way to cause blood to flow and turn Egypt into a boiling volcano which would quiet down, finding only here a foothold for itself on Egyptian territory.

A New Party of Opposition Forces

The reports state that after it dissolved itself, the Wafd Party began to have another idea, to establish a new party, and that became its biggest goal; this time, however, it would be a secret party to which Fu'ad Siraj-al-Din gave the name "The Party of Deliverance." Opposition forces started to gather under the new banner, preparing publications, mounting podiums, giving sermons and stirring up the masses. On top of all that, General Intelligence was standing watching what went on, out of concern for Egypt and the people of Egypt, until the moment arrived when the time came to end the conspiracy.

All the leaders who had stood behind the banner assumed a new role. They distanced themselves from leftism and communism, and no longer advocated them in their conversations. Most right-wing forces joined them, as a facade behind which they could hide their real orientations, and began operating in secret.

Publications in the People's And Consultative Assemblies

General Intelligence received permission from the public prosecutor's office to follow up on the movements of these vindictive persons. In the course of the followup, it became apparent that most of the meetings took place in the city of Alexandria and functioned in an unlawful manner, with the aim of getting the domestic front in movement. These persons prepared opposition publications to send to members of the People's Assembly and the Consultative Assembly, some in their handwriting, all with the aim of crystalizing and exploiting problems in order to attract new elements in the form of university youths, workers and intellectuals.

The planning by Fu'ad Siraj-al-Din and Dr Mahmud al-Qadi was for the new party to strive to form party member committees and establish a major printing and publishing house to facilitate the issuance of publications and pamphlets, with the understanding that the people providing cover for the house would be unknown and have no political history, in order to ward off suspicion.

Organization Campaigns abroad

The party had delegates who traveled abroad, such as Ibrahim Tal'at (Alexandria) who traveled to Syria, then France, attacking the regime and its officials in the course of conferences, radio interviews, and articles in newspapers and magazines, as well as other delegates who got in touch with foreign embassies and gave them opposition publications and pamphlets. When their movement started to assume broad dimensions, following the recent detention procedures, General Intelligence arrested some people who had not been detained after they had concentrated their activities on expanding the scope of the structure of the new party, the Party of Deliverance. Among these were the lawyer, Zaghlul 'Abd-al-Latif Bisherah, the lawyer, Fahmi al-Nahhas, and Ibrahim Sulayman 'Ashur.

Among the documents in the case were pamphlets, some of which were actually prepared and distributed, and tape recordings of conversations and meetings.

Tape Recordings of the Conspirators

This statement was in the words of Fu'ad Siraj-al-Din: "We will cause a civil war, facing severity with severity and opposing the club with the club and the knife with the knife.."

This was stated, in the voice of Fahmi al-Nahhas: "We will stand against Anwar al-Sadat with all our power in all areas, in full daylight. I have printed pamphlets and sold them to some imams in al-Azhar in Cairo and Alexandria and am intending to print every day."

The voice of Dr Mahmud al-Qadi said, before the meeting of the general assembly of the Engineer's Union, "All right, here we are, now printing a brochure of 30 or 40 pages, and we can distribute it to the engineers before the assembly meets." al-Qadi said, in a meeting with members of the dissolved Wafd Party, "Reviving the party and bringing it back again is the only weapon by which the authorities can be fought."

In this way, all those opponents who have made Fu'ad Siraj-al-Din's home in Alexandria a center for their meetings have combined vengeance with a desire to destroy the regime. They have damaged the appreciation for and understanding of democracy and opposition, and their selfishness has prompted them to try to reach the seats of government and regain the limelight at any price, even through civil war and involvement with foreign countries. However, General Intelligence acted at the right time to head off their activities, after having followed up on the conspiracies and dissensions for years until the time came to do away with them.

SOCIALIST LIBERAL PARTY SUPPORTS GOVERNMENT MEASURES

Cairo AL-SIYASI in Arabic 13 Sep 81 p 7

/Article by Muhammad Sa'd: "Mustafa Kamil Murad Asserts That Removal of Extremist Elements Is Essential for Supporting National Unity"/

/Text/ The Socialist Liberal Party has declared its support for the national unity decrees President al-Sadat announced to contain the factional incidents and clean up political activity.

The party asserted that the measures and decrees the political leadership has taken are in no way prejudicial to the course of democracy and do not entail any regression.

The secretariat general of the Liberal Party held two meetings last week to study President al-Sadat's statement and define the party's position regarding the decrees and other measures.

At the emergency meeting the secretariat general held last Sunday morning, the party command pointed out that the freedom which the May Revolution had implanted and democratic practices over the past 10 years can no longer be infringed and that the problems of democracy, no matter how great they may be, are not equal to the evil of going back for a day to the system of a single party and single thought that Egypt suffered from.

The Liberal Party supported President al-Sadat's declaration that there are no politics in religion and there is no religion in politics, because the commingling of religion and politics leads to contradictory results. It asserted that open opposition is the sound means for political action and encouraged the whole nation to join ranks and draw together in order to stand up to any violations, acts of impetuosity or unwise conduct.

At the second meeting the party held last Wednesday evening, the secretariat general discussed the report the party representatives were to present to the parliamentary committee assigned to study President al-Sadat's statement, as well as the study which the party's council of specific committees has prepared on the decrees and measures bearing on national unity.

In another area, three Liberal Party leaders took part in the activities of the parliamentary committee formed out of the People's and Consultative Assemblies to study the president's statement; these were Mustafa Kamil Murad and Riyad Mu'awwad of the Consultative Assembly committee and Ulfat Kamil of the People's Assembly committee.

The Liberal Party chairman pointed out that the removal of extremist elements of the right and the left is essential for supporting national unity and the course of democracy and increasing production and that the elimination of these elements from their places must also extend to include government agencies and the public sector, since there still are some elements occupying important positions that pose an insurmountable obstacle to the policy of economic liberalization and the development of the government system and the public sector in order to perform their mission in the context of the principles of the May Revolution.

Mustafa Kamil Murad added, "President al-Sadat, in his speech, resolved a political matter which has a high degree of importance, declaring that there are no politics in religion and there is no religion in politics. This is a great step which we fully support, because politics are an action and a practice, and anyone who wants to enter politics has the door to the parliamentary assemblies, local councils and political parties wide open before him."

COPTS OF NEAR EAST ISSUE STATEMENTS CONDEMNING GOVERNMENT ACTIONS

Beirut AL-'AMAL in Arabic 8 Sep 81 p 10

/Article: "Statement by the Coptic Bodies in the Near East: al-Sadat Is Requested To Abrogate All Laws Giving Egypt a Religious, Racist Coloration"/

/Text/ The Coptic boards in the Near East issued a statement yesterday requesting Egyptian President Anwar al-Sadat to abrogate all the old and new constitutional laws that give the Egyptian nation a religious, racist coloration stating that otherwise "there will be neither national unity nor social peace in Egypt; rather, the temple will be brought down on the people in it."

Here is the text of the statement:

The Coptic bodies in the Near East held a meeting in which they studied the case of the banishment of Pope Shannudah the Third, and made the following declaration:

1. The banishment of Pope Shannudah the Third, the pope of Alexandria and the patriarch of the missionary province of Saint Mark in Egypt, Ethiopia and the diaspora, aimed at turning him into a broken staff in order to satisfy the resentful Islamic man on the street and to terrorize the Coptic people in accordance with the principle "Strike at the shepherd and the flock will scatter," will increase the intensity of the conflagration in Egypt. al-Sadat does not know the strength of the relationship that binds the Coptic nation to his holiness on the throne of the prophet Saint Mark. In the past, the Christian emperor Marcianus tried to banish the national pope Discorus, appointing the puppet patriarch Protorius in his place in 457, but the Coptic people launched a national revolution in which there were hundreds of thousands of victims and the puppet patriarch was killed in order to extirpate all aspects of foreign domination.

2. The president of the republic of Egypt does not have the right to banish the pope of Alexandria, because the pope is elected by the Coptic people and is chosen by the vote of the holy organization; he is not a goverment appointed functionary.

3. Any Coptic bishop daring to violate the consensus of the nation will be banished by his people and his church.

al-Sadat, in the wake of the aggression of al-Zawiyah al-Hamra' and Shubra, has promised to devote himself assiduously to preparing decrees to restore national unity. We have waited for him to feel a responsible national awareness of the dangers of the distorted thinking by which he has treated the Coptic question and to venture on a bold practical solution to realize Coptic demands, foremost the abrogation of the constitutional stipulations that give the government a religious, racist coloration, pull out the roots of dissension, and put an end to the seeds of hatred, vengeance and historic mutual fear between the Coptic and Moslem peoples.

Unfortunately, he has devised a conspiracy to dilute the Coptic question and confuse it with all his political and personal quarrels with the right, the left, the Nasirists, some of the paramount sheiks of the Islamic groups which have flourished by his hand, and /most/ members of the /Society of Moslem/ Brothers, /but not all/ because the governor of Asyut and his likes have remained al-Sadat's brothers.

He spoke for 3 hours about the evils of some of his enemies the paramount sheiks, and finally, in a few minutes, declared the banishment of his holiness the pope, concluding "God cause us to triumph over the people of infidels."

The Law on National Unity was issued and the factional disputes took deeper roots in 1972, following the al-Khanikah aggression.

In 1980, in the wake of incidents in the universities, he devised a conspiracy to change the constitution and the stipulation that Islamic law is the main source of legislation; the bonds of national unity were severed and Egypt came to al-Zawiyah al-Hamra'.

Now, in the wake of the aggression of al-Zawiyah al-Hamra' and Shubra, al-Sadat has declared the banishment of his holiness Pope Shannudah the Third.

The statement accused al-Sadat of "breaking up the national unity that had been agreed on between the two elements of the nation of Egypt during the 1919 revolution, whose slogan was 'long live the crescent beside the cross.'"

The Coptic Demands

The great national suffering which the Coptic people are undergoing today now that the treasonous apostasy of their partner in the national unity has been laid bare is a historic lesson which will always be taken into consideration. Therefore if national unity is to be re-established, it will never be on the basis of verbal promises such as were made in 1919 but on practical guarantees which can preserve the religious, ethnic and civil rights of the Coptic nation. On these grounds, we demand that our intelligent Moslem brethren in Egypt take the initiative to realize the following legitimate Coptic demands:

1. Abrogating all old and new constitutional laws which impart a racist, religious coloration to the Egyptian state.

2. Recognizing the Coptic ethnic group, as the fraternal country of Iraq recognizes the Assyrian and Kurdish ethnic groups.

3. Agreeing to the formation of a Coptic political party.

4. Agreeing to the holding of public elections through lists or finite precincts.

5. Agreeing to the establishment of a Coptic university to be financed by public taxation, as is the case with al-Azhar University.

6. Restoring power to the national councils in full.

7. Eliminating censorship over Coptic publications and assigning a Coptic radio station, as is the case with the broadcasting of the Koran and the Voice of the Arabs.

8. Agreeing to the laws on personal states for Christians presented by the Christian groups in Egypt.

9. Returning property and endowments to Coptic churches, monasteries, schools and hospitals which were confiscated on behalf of the Ministry of Islamic Religious Endowments.

10. Announcing the real population of the Coptic people.

Unless these legitimate demands are met, there will never be national unity or social peace in Egypt; rather, the temple will be brought down on the people in it, in accordance with the Egyptian saying "spirit, there is no spirit after you."

Greetings to his holiness the great Pope Shannudah the Third.

PAPER GIVES LIST OF TEACHERS TRANSFERRED FOR PARTICIPATION IN STRIFE

Cairo AL-AHRAR in Arabic 14 Sep 81 p 3

/Article: "Faculty Members Transferred to Other Bodies"/

/Text/ Radio stations in the rejection states seized upon the fact that the names of university professors transferred to other bodies had not been published in the decrees protecting national unity, and some of them declared that the number of persons transferred exceeded 1,000. The rejection radio stations supported their claims by information the nationwide papers had by chance published last Wednesday, to the effect that the faculties were being reinforced by the appointment of 750 people with doctorates as new instructors in the universities and by the promotion of a large number of lecturers.

The rejection radio stations said that the goal of the new appointments and promotions was to fill the gap that the transfer of hundreds of university professors would leave.

AL-AHRAR is presenting the names of faculty members transferred to other bodies, who number 64, specifically. Their names were set down in an official list accompanying Decree of the President 490 for 1981, which AL-JARIDAH AL-RASMIYAH published in its Issue 36 of 3 September 1981. These are the names:

EDITORIAL CALLS FOR SEPARATION OF STATE FROM RELIGIOUS EXTREMISM

Cairo MAY in Arabic 31 Aug 81 p 7

/Editorial: "Religion and Politics"/

/Text/ Since the dawn of history, religion has been, and remains, a basic source of inspiration and legislation and a profound factor for influencing the formation of societies through the principles it implants, the values it establishes, the solutions it presents, the conduct it requires of people and societies, and the rewards and punishments it codifies in the world and the hereafter.

No one here or elsewhere in the world, even in the communist countries, which do not recognize religions, has the capacity to act in violation of this reality.

However, the mistake begins when the confusion arises between religion and politics, or between religion and the natural sciences, religion and the art of modern management, religion and space sciences, religion and technology, or other arts and sciences which entail mistakes and proper actions and differ from age to age and society to society, and whose laws and methods change with the changes in circumstances and conditions.

Moslem thinkers have not yet reached agreement whether Islam recommends any specific system of government. Indeed, the general principles which appear in Islam can embrace the different forms of regime which Arab and Islamic history have witnessed in their stages of progress and decline. This has not prevented the emergence of regimes in which rivers of blood have flowed in the name of Islam or on the pretext of defending it in the times of decline and dissension that the Arabs and the Moslems have gone through.

In other words, politics or the art of government is no longer a religious matter and never was such at any time. Rather, politics were and remained a field for the struggle of ideas, individual judgments and various practical applications in dealing with everyday current problems in the life of societies, deriving inspiration from the principles and legislation of religion without constituting religion in themselves.

This fine dividing line which is absent from the minds of many people is the cause of many manifestations of confusion and dissension to which we are exposed, and the extent to which they entail grievous consequences has been shown by current experience in Iran.

Some people believe that religion means the imposition by force of religious occasions and observances, which in their essence are the relationship between the individual and his lord, on all the members of society, whether they embrace them or not.

Some people believe that religion means returning society to circumstances and conditions which the movement of history has transcended, in which the elements of scientific, technological, and social change have created radical changes that cannot be ignored.

Some people believe that religion means a reversion to old forms of behavior, styles and values that dominated a society at a certain stage of its development.

Some people believe that religion means imposing their political conceptions, special convictions or views, which accept mistakes and proper actions in dealing with daily internal problems, the problems of the world, or relations with other countries, on other people through the mentality of provocation and disruption, the exploitation of religious feelings among naive people, the distressed and the downtrodden, or the exploitation of young people's feelings of frustration and despair regarding various factors of deficiencies here or there.

Finally, some people believe that religion means the renunciation of everyone who differs from them in opinions, rejects their narrow notions of religious fanaticism, or permits himself freedom to think, discuss and give and take.

It is all these plagues which have done what they have to the experiment of the Islamic revolution in Iran, turning Iran, thanks to what is called the "Hezbollah," into mutually combative Islamic groups and factions, each one claiming to speak in the name of Islam and each one accusing the other of deviation and sedition. The reason for that is obvious and simple: that is that people who use religion to reach power have lacked and still do lack political abilities, technical and administrative qualifications and specific ideas of what government must concern itself with. Religious jurisprudence is not all it takes to assume positions of leadership in governing modern societies. Political practices must be remote from speculation with religious feelings, and proficiency in the sciences of religion must be devoted to nurturing the religious spirit, not to forming religious parties.

The most dangerous thing to which the notion of mixing religion and politics might lead is for religious groups to be transformed into religious parties. When this door is opened wide, the demon will emerge from the bottle so that feelings of religious and factional fanaticism may wreak corruption on the earth.

This is what we must not permit.

ORIGINS OF FACTIONAL STRIFE PROBED

/Editorial by Rajab al-Banna: "Where Did the Dissension Come to Us from?"/

/Text/ People who know Egypt for its long history, and know its successive generations of people, realize for a certainty that the Egyptian personality is a whole which cannot be fragmented, because it is incapable of being fragmented. In all the eras of history, the Egyptian personality has been a single unit: you are an Egyptian, and that is all anyone needs to know after that, be you Moslem or Copt, be you pale or dark, be you descended from tribes of the Arabian Peninsula or from Central Asia: you are Egyptian, that is sufficient, and nothing else after that is important, because Egypt has not known discrimination among its people based on their origins, color or religion.

Egyptian tolerance is vast enough to accommodate all the secondary disputes that generally exist among brothers. This is the Egyptian genius. Where did the successive acts of dissension that we call "factional strife" come to us from? Why has it been appearing now, specifically, and not before now or later? Why is it appearing in this form and in this manner, although the Egyptian people have never known this style of violence, even in expressing their differences, no matter how intense they might be?

On the issue of religion, Egyptians see no difference between mosque and church. To them, they are both "houses of God," and to them they both have the same equal degree of holiness.

In belief, Moslems and Christians see one another as devout people who worship and turn toward God. Moslems are commanded by their lord to love Christians.

"You will find that those who are closest in affection to those who believe are the ones who say 'I am a Christian.'" This is a statement of God and whoever violates it deviates from his lord's command.

Christians are commanded to love everyone and everything and accommodate it with their love, even their enemies and those who revile them. Both, Moslems and Christians, dip from a single spring, which is inexhaustible -- the spring of love and tolerance.

On the issue of history, Moslems and Christians both feel that this is their country and that they have the full rights of citizens and have full obligations of citizens in it. They have both embarked on their nation's struggles, shoulder to shoulder. The enemy's bullets have never discriminated between Moslems and Christians. They have both lived with their brother in safekeeping, in a single home, half of whose inhabitants are Moslems and half of whose inhabitants are Copts, and neither of them have felt alienation or remoteness. The children play together on the same street and no one is concerned to know who is Moslem and who is Christian. In the schools, they sit down at the same bench.

In sorrow and in joy, you find them always together, in a single spirit, a single being.

European specialists in social studies are amazed that the customs and traditions governing Egyptian conduct and thinking are the same, and that there is no more difference between Moslems and Christians than that between the people from Upper and Lower Egypt, for example, or certain individual differences which confirm rather than deny the rule. The rule is that Egypt is a tremendous melting pot which has forged everyone into a single mold and made everyone into a single entity, giving everyone a single spirit. Everyone on the land of Egypt is Egyptian in flesh, blood, history and spirit. He is Egyptian before all else, and is Egyptian after all else. The greater the Moslem's understanding of his religion becomes, the more his love of his Coptic brother grows, and the more the Copt's understanding of his religion increases, the greater becomes his love of his brother Moslem.

This is Egypt. This is the Egyptian personality. Where did the dissension come to us from?

It is not in the Egyptian's nature to resort to contemptible conspiracies. Thus this dissension, and its sisters, is not Egyptian but is something that has come to us by chance, a strange thing that is not in harmony with being, history or nature.

Why choose a church as a location for a plot, and choose timing which coincides with President al-Sadat's visit to Washington? Dissension always appears through such timing, and Moslem and Christian victims who embrace one another die every time.

Why does it appear every time Egypt comes close to ridding itself of its problems and is on the verge of devoting itself with all its powers to construction and attaining the dream of welfare?

We realize, naturally, that we are living in a world of extreme complexity. We realize that we have enemies whose goal is to make the Egyptian social entity burst apart and to turn its cohesive unity into fragments. We also realize that the arts of destruction from within and the recruitment of agents has developed and become more attractive and glamorous with the use of money, psychological or ideological means, or all of them. This requires that we exhibit an unusual awareness and the ability to distinguish in the things said to us between what is meant for God's sake and what is meant for the sake of the devil.

While it is certain that this dissension and its antecedents do not represent a phenomenon that can be observed and before which one can pause at length, because they have become part of the features of the historic road we are traveling on, they nonetheless are not negligible; they are a sudden, strange occurrence. However, like the devil, who instilled evil in our lord Adam and made him go out of paradise, because we do not want to lose our paradise, in which we are living together, it is our duty to prosecute everyone who provokes the emotions of people toward dissension, fuels it, exploits it or tries to escalate it, so that we can seize in our hands the threads that link them to the people who are provoking them, and so that we can arrive at the "original motive force" behind this crime.

Egypt remains above dissension.

Egyptians remain stronger than any conspiracy.

Religion remains too pure and clean to be polluted by people who wish to turn it into a weapon of hatrad and vengenance, for it is in truth a weapon of love, life and progress.

WRITER CRITICIZES RELIGIOUS EXTREMISM

Cairo AL-AHRAM in Arabic 2 Sep 81 p 7

/Article by Tal'at Yunan: "Dotting the I's: Factionalism and Fanaticism Are Aggression against God and the Nation"/

/Text/ President Muhammad Anwar al-Sadat is returning to the people in a joint conference of the People's and Consultative Assemblies next Saturday, in a meeting with the masses. The hearts of 44 million Egyptians will be watching him closely as he with his historic courage and heroism leads one of his new triumphant, victorious battles against factionalism and fanaticism.

He is demonstrating his ability and wisdom as a leader and commander, and, first and last, as a man devoted to God and the nation, because Egypt, through its entire history, has believed in God but has not been fanatic about religion. It has had beliefs and not factionalism, it has had brothers and not enemies, it has had love and not hatred or loathing, it has had faith and not atheism.

In it, Moslems and Copts have lived for thousands of years, in mutual affection and embrace. The Moslems have had their mosques and the Copts have had their churches. They all declare "God is one." They are all for Egypt, and Egypt is for them all.

The drive toward fanaticism and factionalism is coming into Egypt from outside the borders. The people making it are not Moslems or Copts, indeed are not Egyptians. They are enemies of Islam, enemies of Christianity, and enemies of Egypt.

For this is an evil attempt to kill all Egypt, destroy its people, eradicate its history and eliminate its civilization and its reputation in the world.

While it has been an obligation of the army's to protect the nation's borders, it is the obligation of the people today to protect the heart and unity of the nation and its traditions, which know only love and tolerance and respect every creed and religion!

The question today is, how did what happened happen, and why?

The war of 6 October and 10 Ramadan united all Egyptians in love and war. The cry "God is great" is the cry of Moslems and Christians together and it shook the enemy's most powerful fortress, the Bar-Lev Line, as they ransomed the grains of sand with the grains of their hearts, shedding the purest of blood in the field. Those Egyptians who died as martyrs and were Moslems surrendered themselves to God as pure souls, or who were Christians surrendered themselves to the nation as chaste persons; thus they all passed on as immortal martyrs. God has joined together the fraternal brothers, the Moslems and the Christians, in life and death, the nation has embraced them in the folds of its grave!

This eternal unity of the institution which will not accept fragmentation has joined us together in peace and in war and is embraced and agreed over the cry "God is great," as well as joining us together in the sacred enthusiasm which will not accept a slackening of fraternity between the patriarchate and the Mosque of al-Azhar, and in the sacrifice of the purest blood!

It has created the greatest revolution "of faith," whose title has been President Anwar al-Sadat and whose pillar and structure have been the entire Egyptian people. It is the revolution of the great intellectual transformation, from socialist or marxist atheism to religion, and people in all Egypt have come to seek deep within themselves the truth and to insist on adherence to what God has revealed in all his divine books, accepting mosques and churches, until they all, in spite of their great numbers, have started overflowing with the people in them, as a reaction to what was called "a wave of atheism and anarchism" and a manifestation of all the people's return to God.

It happened that the people gave President Muhammad Anwar al-Sadat the designation "the devout president" and his era the designation "the government of faith." The first picture that was published of the president and chief of state showed him in a robe with prayer beads on the prayer rug.

The people of Egypt all insisted on giving the devout president, wherever he went, a single gift, God's book (the holy Koran). The permanent constitution has stipulated a state religion and freedom of belief together, and the devout president has established an eternal symbol of the everlasting spiritual embrace between the crescent of Islam, the cross of Christianity and the star of David of Judaism, within a single complex of divine religions. This is truly to be considered a tremendous revolutionary and evolutionary leap which is bringing modern man from the materialistic mentality to the spiritual mentality, because no genuine Egyptian corrective revolution can deny religious loyalty to Islam, Christianity and the /other/ divine religions. Religious loyalty is absolutely not in contradiction with national loyalty, but indeed complements it. Thus the revolution of faith has turned the unity of the nation into an actual fact, not a moral symbol or emotional point, because the people returning to God have believed unanimously that spiritual values are the most fruitful and permanent. The sole meaning of their adherence to their religions has been respect for the other religions, since they revere all the prophets and condemn the use of the designation "infidel" for people who believe in the existence of God, whatever their religion might be.

This great transformation has been as remote as possible from politics and all political appeals, whatever they may have been. It has been the result of the feelings of the devout Egyptian people that alienation from God was the cause of all the defeats which led the greatest striking force in the Middle East to destruction in a few hours and brought us to political, social and economic deterioration!

Naturally, this sort of historic phenomenon has the effect of distressing everyone who wants the Egyptian people to be won over to and to accept defeat, be he from the fossilized right or the adventurous left. The goal of them all is to have us falter in our crusade and falter in our unity -- especially those who have been attired in the robes of an agitated marxism that is unable to touch the true pulse of the Egyptian masses, but are anxious to renounce all religious and spiritual values because to them religion is the opium of the people!

Thus all these people, the stupid right and the red left, have made a number of attempts to strike out at national unity with stones, bring us back to the stone age, and dig a pit of factional fire by committing aggression against churches and opposing Islamic sentiments, or trying through false publications or poisonous rumors to revive the religious wars whose time has passed and whose victors and vanquished were buried centuries ago. However, mass awareness and rapid political and official intervention have caused these attempts to collapse before their evil could spread and their danger could become commonplace. Here Moslems rose up to protect churches and Christians rose up to protect mosques, all embracing one another throughout history on the land of the great single home of the great single family.

It was unfortunate that religious currents passed without sound guidance and that they were surrounded by exaggeration and the attempt to assert religious affiliation through token demonstrations. At some points, the matter extended to some religious leaders and at others to turning young people, in the name of religion, into a hostile force whose activity was restricted to critizing conditions in their country, and holding faith in the immunity and immortality of these leaders and their rejection of self-criticism, on grounds that they were vengeful and irritated by real discussion:

Some of these leaders have become implicated in hostile political activity, and suspicious figures have appeared on the surface, inside and outside Egypt, who are trafficking in religion and speaking in the name of the leaders of religion!

Egypt will never be able to be quiet over the decline of some people who cloak themselves in religion while embracing factional provocation in a manner that has gained acceptance, depicting individual events as if they were factional aggression although it would have been good policy to put all matters in their proper perspective and confine them to the context of presenting them to officials but not bringing them before the religious podium, the political man in the street or, sometimes, expatriates!

It was necessary to pause to take stock, because Egypt, for a long time, has separated religion from politics, preventing men of religion from engaging in politics and dissolving all religious parties and factional organizations because it was the nation of freedom of belief that embraced the positive nature of feelings before the constitution stipulated "religion belongs to God and the nation belongs to all."

It is necessary for our devout leader and self-denying president, Muhammad Anwar al-Sadat, who expressed the July revolution and caused the May revolution to burst forth, to put a decisive end, through radical solution, not just temporary palliatives, to those people who confuse the domain of God with the domain of the earth, because fanaticism and factionalism are hostility toward God and the nation, and there is no safety or mandate for people who blaspheme their country.

Our duty, after the president has declared his decrees to protect the mosque and the church, so that they may together remain a source of spiritual illumination, is to strive together in an earnest holy struggle against factionalism and fanaticism and to cooperate to save our nation from the enemies of the nation and religion, forming close ranks and drawing swords from our faith. Let them form an alliance with the devil; they will never overcome us as long as God is our ally and as long as our love of our nation is noble, chaste and pure.

TOP EDITOR CRITICIZES AMERICAN PRESS STAND ON LOCAL CRACKDOWN

/Editorial by Ibrahim Nafi': "Response to a Remark by the NEW YORK TIMES"/

/Text/ President al-Sadat was completely clear in his talk to the people and in his talk to foreign correspondents. However, the attack some Western papers mounted on the facts of what has happened in Egypt calls for a reflective pause. Here, it is enough to comment on the editorial in the NEW YORK TIMES titled "Remark on a Difficult Time in Egypt."

It is not enough to say that it is the personal feelings or friendships behind this "remark" that are affecting us now; rather, it is necessary also to stress a number of facts that this and other newspapers are ignoring:

Foremost among these is the fact that President al-Sadat's regime is not a "client of the West's"--rather, Egypt has been in the vanguard of the policy of nonalignment and positive neutrality. This has been summarized in its simple slogan: "Friendship with all, and, if a dispute occurs, on the basis of principles alone."

Therefore, Egypt in its foreign policy has not been slow to condemn America's negative behavior regarding South Africa's aggression against Angola and continued occupation of Namibia. Egyptian foreign policy's condemnation of the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan, a Moslem country, has proceeded from the same premise.

Egypt has frankly declared to the Soviets and the Americans that any interference in its domestic affairs will be rejected in its totality and its details.

The firm relationship between Egypt and the United States is not one of "alignment" but is an expression of Egyptian national interests, which are linked to a number of positive American stands such as the cleaning up of the canal, the role of full partner in the peace treaty, and economic and military aid to raise the standard of living of the Egyptian people and develop their armed forces.

It is strange that Egypt should need confirmation from the newspapers of the West that its "domestic affairs" are to be considered fundamental to the realization of national sovereignty and that the commander's responsibility, in these affairs, is to his people alone.

President al-Sadat, in spite of that, alongside his responsibility to the Egyptian people, accepts a special responsibility toward world public opinion, which supported him in his peace initiatives, on condition that that not conflict with any dangers infringing on his people, first and last.

While Egypt has been waiting for an apology for articles written by foreign journalists, such as that by David Hirst on 1 January 1973 whose gist was that collapse is imminent in Egypt, here he is repeating the same talk and the same line in 1981.

Egypt has presented all the facts to the foreign correspondents, and hopes that the campaign of distorting the truth of what has happened will not continue. Here it is sufficient to glance at the figures on people put in detention:

Of these, about 300 have past records.

There are no more than about 30 old or new political personalities who took part directly or indirectly in or instigated the escalation of the factional strife. The rest are all religious extremists.

Egypt views the portrayal by some foreign correspondents of what is happening here, and what might on the other hand actually happen in Israel or the United States itself, with astonishment.

There are extremist religious groups in Israel like the Gush Emonim about which such a commotion is not raised.

There is an Israeli obstinacy on the autonomy negotiations which is providing the Arab opposition with "an instrument that supports them in their opposition," in the words of the NEW YORK TIMES.

There is the American leniency, which the NEW YORK TIMES acknowledges, toward Israel's conduct regarding the comprehensive peace process, such as the obstruction of the negotiations on full autonomy for the Palestinians, which after all is the heart of the matter, as well as the issue of Jerusalem and the issue of the settlements; one must consider that there are no problems regarding peace between Egypt and Israel and consequently a final withdrawal from Sinai.

Egypt has clearly stressed its desire for democracy and, in the light of the results of the investigation, a popular charter society will meet containing all representatives of the Egyptian people to set forth a "new charter" spelling out a proper method for the political exercise of democracy.

There remains our support for the conclusion which the NEW YORK TIMES editorial reached when it said "President al-Sadat, in spite of what has happened, remains a bold statesman and an intelligent, balanced leader. If we have exceeded the limits in criticism, the current misfortunes he is passing through deserve to have people devote proper understanding to it." This is all Egypt is asking -- just proper understanding!

REPORT ON JORDANIAN BRIGADE SUFFERING IN NORTHERN IRAQ

JN121215 Jerusalem AT-TALI'AH in Arabic 12 Nov 81 pp 1, 11

[Text] News reports received from Amman and Baghdad have stressed that Jordanian military units were sent to Iraq after the visit to Baghdad by the Jordanian regime's leaders in the wake of the great defeat and losses inflicted on the Iraqi army in the battle to break its siege on the Iranian city of Abadan and in its withdrawal to the west bank of Karun River.

News reports say that Jordan had previously called for volunteers including retired military personnel, for service in the Iraqi army and other units such as the medical service. The sending of combat units to make up for the Iraqi army's impaired ability to confront the raging revolution in Iraq's Kurdistan is a new development. Arrivals from Amman and Baghdad said that the forces of the communist partisans and the Kurdish Peshmerga had inflicted heavy losses on a Jordanian brigade as it was carrying out search operations in Kurdistan against the revolutionaries. These losses amounted to hundreds of dead and wounded, in addition to hundreds captured, whose leaders were put on trial by the partisans.

Reports say that the Jordanian brigade's losses are basically attributed to its commanders' ignorance of the real situation in Kurdistan and the nature of the region, in addition to their adoption of a method different from that of the Iraqi forces, which confine their presence to the tops of mountains and move in large columns at specific times and only along main streets to avoid clashing with the large and effective revolutionary forces.

Jordanian authorities are still keeping this matter secret for fear of the impact news of these large losses will have on the situation in Jordan despite the elapse of 3 weeks after the brigade's tragedy.

OPEC POLICY CONSIDERATIONS EXAMINED

Algiers EL MOUDJAHID in French 14, 15 Oct 81

[14 Oct 81 p 14]

[Text] The decline in petroleum demand would appear to be the result of the impact of numerous factors, including in particular:

--The generalized slowdown in the economic growth of the industrialized countries, whose average rate of expansion of gross national product should stabilize barely above 1.5 percent per year for the next 10 years;

--The success of policies of economizing on energy achieved in the home-use and industrial sectors by the governments of the Western countries;

--The increased importance attached to coal and the establishment of nuclear electricity generating plants--in various forms and at various intervals, but which are nonetheless beginning to make their effects felt--and in a much more timid way the limited impact of "new forms of energy" at present;

--The appearance on the petroleum market of new producers that are not members of OPEC, such as Mexico, the North Sea area, Egypt, and Malaysia. The discoveries of oil in these areas should strengthen in the future the already noticeable decline in imports from the OPEC countries.

The Western media have expressed total satisfaction. They have hastened to conclude that "the cards have changed hands," and that the domination of the oil market by the producing countries is completely over. In short, the time for revenge is at hand.

Certainly, we are far from the energy crisis and the gloomy prospects which were a matter of general agreement hardly 2 years ago.

What miracle has happened, then, to modify the world energy situation so fundamentally in such a short time.

In reality, this pessimism regarding demand--which unfortunately certain members of OPEC have accepted so quickly, giving it more authenticity--is only aimed at confusing the facts of the problem.

However, the view that there has been a structural decline in petroleum demand deserves to be taken up and analyzed, even if the forecasts on which this alleged decline is based are strewn with objections. It is nonetheless true that, beyond the monetary pressures on the market and prices, the OPEC countries have political and strategic interests involved.

The Market Crisis Before 1980

The bulk of the studies on long term supply and demand published before 1980 were of the view that the increase in demand for energy during the 1980's and 1990's would inevitably create severe pressure on petroleum supplies, which could seriously disturb the pursuit of economic growth in the industrialized countries.

The impact of this pressure, which might develop after 1983, according to some sources, and by 1990 at the latest, according to others, would lead to a grave energy crisis and, as a consequence, would push prices to very high levels.

In this context it was considered that massive recourse to petroleum from OPEC countries would remain unavoidable and that petroleum would remain the leading form of energy (one-third of the energy consumption of the Western world in the year 2000).

FORECASTS CONCERNING THE OPEC ZONE FOR 1985

Source of Forecast	Level of Demand for OPEC Petroleum in Millions of Barrels Per Day
EEC [European Economic Community]	38.0
U. S. Department of Energy (1979)	36.0
IEA [International Energy Agency] (1978)	42.9
PIVING [not otherwise identified] (1978)	36.6
EXXON (1978)	40.0
Congressional Research Service, U. S. Congress (1977)	42.9
WAES [not otherwise identified]	45.0

The estimated productive capacity of the OPEC zone for 1985 would be about 35 million barrels per day, and any substantial increase above this figure is conceivable only with difficulty. The OPEC zone would therefore not be in a position to satisfy needs of this size.

An increase in petroleum prices seemed inevitable. This conclusion, shared by all of the studies, resulted from the tendency toward an increase in demand and the leveling off of production.

According to these same studies many factors would contribute to increasing the demand for petroleum:

1) Non-petroleum-based energy is not immediately available. Between 6 and 10 years would be needed to complete construction of a project for the production of energy;

2) The cost of equipment for the production of non-petroleum-based energy is generally higher than that for conventional petroleum equipment;

3) The developing countries, where housing is often dispersed over a wide area and where there is no natural gas or electrical network, will largely use petroleum. Their consumption should increase a great deal to satisfy the needs of a regularly growing population.

4) With the exception of natural gas, all non-petroleum-based energy requires long and costly adaptation;

5) Finally, in case of an unforeseen increase in requirements caused by economic recovery in the industrialized countries, petroleum is the only form of energy available in instantaneous fashion and in a relatively sufficient quantity.

As against this prospect for an increase in demand, production threatened to level out or even decrease.

The principal question which then dominated all these forecasts was knowing how far petroleum prices could increase and when they would reach their maximum level.

In these same forecasts petroleum prices of $50, $60, and even $100 per barrel were regarded by some of them as highly probable, before massive investments in the production of new forms of energy could be carried out.

Taking into account the very long period of time before these new sources of energy would begin to make their weight felt on the world market (estimated by specialists at 50 years, or the normal cycle required for the transition from one dominant energy source to another), the next 2 or 3 decades would be a very difficult period from the point of view of energy supply.

Even in time, it was estimated, when this evolution would have taken shape, crude oil would continue to benefit from a substantial market and supplementary premiums by reason of its use as a source of petrochemicals, which could only be substituted for with difficulty.

Those were the dominant ideas which made it possible to think that the role of extracted petroleum in the OPEC countries would still be, and for a long time, decisive in the long term energy balance.

Demand for OPEC Petroleum in Recent Forecasts

The new forecasts of the long term energy situation are giving space to new suppositions incompatible with the considerations which prevailed before 1980. These studies have given consideration in particular to the following ideas:

--The rate of economic growth in the industrialized countries should slow down substantially in the course of the next 2 decades, and that cannot be due solely to traditional cyclical factors;

--The relationship between economic growth and energy consumption is undergoing profound change, in the sense that positive growth in economic activity could henceforth occur at the same time as a much weaker growth and even a negative development in energy demand.

--In the industrialized countries a general tendency toward a change in the composition of the types of economic activity is emerging progressively in the fabric of the national economies. This change could influence the level of energy consumption.

--The rate of non-OPEC production should increase over the medium term, which accompanied by a decline in overall demand, will probably lead to a reduction in the contribution made by OPEC petroleum to the market.

--The physical constraints on the production of OPEC crude oil, presumed to be very important in the older forecasts, no longer seem to have the same relevance.

--A decisive acceleration in the development of substitute forms of energy in all of the industrialized countries.

These factors, taken together, have led some observers to conclude that "the energy crisis" will not be as severe as it had been imagined and that there is even a serious doubt that it will occur.

A comparison between the newer and the older forecasts shows that the forecasts concerning the levels of world energy demand, world petroleum production, and the petroleum production "required" of OPEC in 1985 and 1990 have been noticeably adjusted to lower levels during the last 2 years. It is forecast that the export demand for OPEC petroleum will decrease by 25 percent in 1985 and by 33 percent--or by one-third --by 1990, while requirements for petroleum imports by a country like the United States will decline by half, compared to the initial forecasts.

This comparison also makes it possible to note a reduction in the contribution of petroleum to total energy consumption, by reason of the substitution of other sources of energy and above all because of a substantial reduction in the contribution of OPEC to total petroleum production, linked to a greater availability of non-OPEC sources of supply.

An Artificial Surplus of Short Duration

[Text] These forecasts deserve to be examined carefully. We analyze below the behavior of the three factors which are the most often mentioned to justify the evolution toward a decline in demand. These concern:

--The level of economic activity;

--Economies achieved in the use of energy;

--The recourse to substitute sources of energy.

A Growing Level of Economic Activity

The level of economic activity is one of the principal determinants of the level of energy consumption.

The habit has developed, especially in forecasts of energy consumption, of reducing throught on economic growth to the single standard constituted by the economies of the industrialized countries.

To be complete, it is necessary to examine the prospects for economic growth in all regional groups of countries taking part in the world economy, and first of all within the member countries of OPEC, whose economic and demographic dynamism will soon make them important consumers of energy resources. Their demand for primary energy has already tripled in the course of the past decade. A more detailed analysis of these latter tendencies and of the development plans projected for the future indicates that their rates of growth will continue to be high.

The objectives already known in terms of the construction of petrochemical plants and of refineries for local requirements and for export needs will involve a growing use of hydrocarbons. In terms of volume the available estimates place local demand in the OPEC countries in 1985, 1990, and 2000 at 4, 5, 6, and 12 million barrels per day, respectively [sic; only three years are given, while four levels of local demand are given], for an annual growth during the period in the order of 9 percent per year.

The same tendency in economic growth is expected in the other groups of under-developed countries of Latin America, Asia, and Africa. This growth, dominated by intensive industrial development, will certainly be translated into increased demand for petroleum, as alternative energy sources to petroleum (nuclear energy, coal) are difficult to foresee for financial and technological reasons.

Certainly, in the industrialized countries of the OECD, a noticeable decline in the prospects for economic growth over the middle term is generally forecast. However, these forecasts are not unanimous either regarding the duration of the decline nor on the level of the recession in these countries.

According to certain sources, an average annual growth of 2 to 3 percent per year could be reached in the course of the next 5 to 7 years in the OECD countries as a whole, which is incompatible with the thesis of stagnation and even of regression in the rates of growth advanced in all studies undertaken recently.

These rates of growth constitute a minimum, in the absence of which an expansion in the unemployment rate would make the social balance very problematical.

The resumption of economic activity which would follow these growth rates would sustain much more substantial demand for energy than is generally forecast.

Energy Savings

Two kinds of energy savings are mentioned in these studies:

--Energy savings which would involve "less consumption" per unit of marginal GNP.

This is based on the dissociation which would appear between economic growth and the increase in energy consumption. In short, this idea signifies that the relationship between the two variables--economic growth and the increase in energy consumption (the energy coefficient)--is no longer either proportionate or stable.

Thus, contrary to past development, when the principal variable influencing energy demand was GNP, which was reflected by very high energy consumption, more and more the behavior of the energy coefficient indicates a much smaller energy component. Quite clearly, the increase in prices, by constraining consumers to follow an active policy of energy conservation and by ending the constraints which used to weigh on the development of new forms of energy, is responsible for this change.

Consequently, the petroleum price has become a strategic determinant of demand, which could oscillate toward an increase or toward a decrease, depending on the system of proposed prices.

In reality the level of energy demand is pre-determined in large measure by the existing technical system. Unless there is a decisive change in the latter, which is hardly likely by the end of the next 2 decades, the level of energy demand cannot drop below a level which the specialists estimate at 10 percent at most of present consumption. The efficiency of conservation measures undertaken in the last few years has been achieved in large part because of higher taxation of energy consumption, which could not be continued without danger of disarranging the economic and social mechanisms of production. If their application was easy at the beginning, they will begin to encounter, in the course of their development, social and technical obstacles which will mark their limits. To tell the truth, the majority of the serious forecasts (of the study of the IIASA [International Institute for the Analysis of Applied Systems]) are based on stable or larger energy coefficients.

--Energy savings which would be the result of a kind of specific economic restructuring in the industrialized countries. According to these studies, the high level of industrial maturity achieved in the developed Western countries leads to a sectoral rearrangement within the local economy, dominated by the expansion of the services sector (considered to consume less energy), at the expense of the productive sectors, essentially agriculture and industry. This change in the type of economic activity would have positive economic implications over the long term for energy consumption. A progressive reduction of the latter is expected, along with the consolidation of this tendency.

This reasoning requires at least two remarks:

--On the one hand the degree of intensity in the use of energy by the new lines of economic activity by comparison with the older lines is far from evident;

--On the other hand this new economic balance to the benefit of the services sector is not without serious economic and social risks. Its role will have an impact on the present inflation, which no industrialized country has escaped, although some of them (those whose services sector is less developed) have been less affected than others. Moreover, its development could not be seriously envisaged on the scale predicted, without a decisive increase in labor productivity. In present circumstances of actual stagnation, nothing makes it possible to predict this development.

To all intents and purposes a massive transfer of productive activity toward areas outside the OECD countries, through a new kind of international division of labor, could, in effect, give the services sector a new thrust in the Western countries. However, this prospect is unlikely in a decade or two and, for all of that, is much debated in the industrialized countries themselves.

--Recourse to substitute sources of energy. According to these studies, the overall demand for OPEC petroleum will be noticeably affected by substitutes, beginning with coal and primary electricity (generated by nuclear plants), and, toward the end of the century, by other substitutes, beginning with other sources of energy (especially synthetic petroleum).

It is predicted that the role of coal in total primary energy by 1985 will reach the level of 19 percent (or the same level as in 1980), that it will increase to 21 percent in 1990 and to 23.7 percent by the year 2000.

Moreover, it is predicted that 75 percent of the electricity by the year 2000 will come from coal and nuclear energy.

The Role of Synthetic Products

The increase in the role of synthetic petroleum and gas (compared to their present, very marginal levels) will supposedly reach a level of 4 to 11 percent of world petroleum production by the years 1990 and 2000, respectively.

There is no doubt that these programs represent very ambitious objectives. However, it is possible to have grave doubts about their credibility.

In order to make these substitute sources of energy available within the terms and periods of time forecast, it will be necessary, not only to conquer the technological, social, and ecological obstacles involved, which have hampered their development in the past (only 40 percent of the nuclear program provided for in all of the OECD countries between 1974 and 1980 has been achieved), but also to be able to be in a position to mobilize the enormous credits necessary for their financing.

Just to take up the case of synthetic petroleum (the only alternative energy source really equivalent to crude oil in its "major" uses), it is estiamted that $2 to $3 billion (in terms of 1980 dollars) would be needed to construct a synthetic petroleum plant capable of producing 50,000 barrels per day, or 2.5 million tons per year in petroleum equivalent. A supply on the world scale of 7 million barrels per day by the year 2000 would require financing in the order of $400 to $500 billion. That is to say that the commercial competitiveness of these energy sources is far from being certain in the next 15 to 20 years. Inflation and the high cost of credit, the accumulation of prohibitive regulations, and technological difficulties do not by themselves explain the delays that have occurred in the achievement of programs for the development of alternative energies. In fact it is the low cost, in real terms, of crude oil which has been the decisive element in the stabilization of the relative contributions of the various energy sources during recent years. A recent study on the future of the world energy system, carried out by the International Institute for the Analysis of Applied Systems (IIASA), ended with this same conclusion. In this imposing study, whose object was to analyze the world economy as a whole and bearing on the very long term (1980-2030), the IIASA (which should not be suspected of partiality, as it is exclusively composed of high-ranking scientists from all regions of the world) concluded that the only substitute for petroleum in the next 25 to 30 years is petroleum itself.

Regarding prices, according to the same institute, these should continue their regular growth over the course of the next 2 decades, under the effects of two tendencies: an increase in energy demand, itself linked to a very rapid growth in world population, on the one hand, and the absence of a really competitive new energy source, on the other hand.

To these economic arguments are added technical and political motivations which could strongly moderate petroleum supply.

The decline of petroleum reserves discovered each year throughout the world over the past 20 years or so does not make it possible to hope for a growth in world productive capacities of much more than 1 percent per year, in the absence of discoveries --considered unlikely--of a series of very large deposits comparable to those found in the Middle East between 1945 and 1960 .

Reducing Production

Parallel to these developments, the governments of the producing countries which are members of OPEC have been urged to reduce the rate of exploitation of their petroleum deposits in order to adjust the rate to needs which are often moderate, to avoid social disturbances and pressure on very limited construction capacities, and to save fossil resource capital which increases in value each year while inflation eats away the value of the money paid for petroleum and the financial surpluses accumulated by certain producing countries.

A policy of limitation of petroleum production to the level of consumption could be adopted. Such a policy could be particularly attractive to the states with the lowest population which are large producers, like those of the Arabian Peninsula. In these countries a substantial part of production should be considered "undesirable." Hence, a permanent temptation to accompany any decline in world demand with a reduction of production, to prevent a lowering of the prices.

Beyond their allegedly scientific character, the alarmist forecasts in vogue today should be interpreted for what they are, a supplementary instrument of pressure at the service of a strategy whose objective is the reduction of petroleum prices.

It is significant that the flowering of these forecasts coincides with the preparation, within OPEC, of the first elements of a long term strategy for production and sales with a view to the protection of the petroleum price from monetary erosion and inflation and the improvement of OPEC's purchasing power in real terms.

The artificial surplus of petroleum, created by the present overproduction by Saudi Arabia, which constitutes the point of departure and the justification for all the forecasts of a decline in demand, is too problematical to justify long term deductions to be made. In effect, however long it takes until Saudi Arabia ends by accepting the evidence that its present policy is causing serious damage to the producing countries and when it adopts the measures required by reducing its production and by raising its prices toward levels in harmony with the prices charged by the other producing countries, the market situation will become less artificial, and the petroleum surplus will disappear.

The principle of a respite on the prices front, in the name of which Saudi Arabia has been conducting this policy for 2 years, is without foundation with regard to the impact of previous readjustments of petroleum prices on inflation in the industrialized countries and on the real evolution of their purchasing power. It is well established now that the readjustments of petroleum prices in the past--as attested by the official reports of the OECD, the GATT [General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade] and the World Bank--only played a marginal role in an inflation which is reaching an average level of 15 percent per year. Without going into the traditional battle of indices and figures, it should be recalled that, according to the index of export prices of OECD itself (which in large part underestimates the inflation in the prices of imported goods and services), the index of the petroleum price has gone from $3.03 in 1974 to $14.73 per barrel in 1980 (in current dollar terms the price has gone up from $3.03 to $34 per barrel during this period). This indicates, despite the reservations noted, the extent of erosion of the purchasing power of petroleum prices (according to the OPEC index, the price went up from $3.03 in 1973 to $4.89 per barrel in 1980). The question of the defense of the purchasing power of a barrel of petroleum therefore remains a permanent objective in the face of the galloping inflation in the prices of imported goods. The partial and temporary recovery of purchasing power in 1973, 1974, and 1979-1980 was of short duration and was followed by longer periods of decline between 1975 and 1978. The readjustments in the prices which took place in 1979-1980 certainly gave the producing countries a temporary advantage, but the latter has been very rapidly eaten away following the freezing of the prices decided on by the last ordinary meeting of the OPEC countries. For the rest, the increase in prices to the consumers is not the fault (it should be recalled) of the producing countries.

Who Profits from the Crisis

The evolution between 1973 and 1978 of price composition at the pump of an OPEC standard barrel of petroleum products in Western Europe makes it possible to note a very clear improvement in the receipts of the consuming countries and the achievement of a very consistent profit margin by the petroleum companies.

Thus, in 1978 the sales price of a standard barrel of petroleum products in Western Europe was $33.80 per barrel. Out of this total the governments of the European consuming countries took $13.40 per barrel, whereas the producing countries received $13.00 per barrel. The former increased their receipts per barrel of OPEC products by 70.7 percent between 1974 and 1978, whereas the latter only increased their receipts by 23.3 percent.

The sales price only increased by 49.9 percent in the course of the period under consideration, or $11.25 per barrel. According to a study made by the Shell Company, this increase was 49.3 percent attributable to the governments of the consuming countries and 21.2 percent to the governments of the producing countries. The refining and distribution companies had 18.2 percent and 8.9 percent of the increase, respectively.

The evolution of the petroleum industry which has taken place over the last few years raises in an urgent way the imperative need for regulation of the market by an adequate production policy. Any discussion on the levels of production over the medium term should proceed first from taking into account the vital interests of the member countries.

Having done this, the OPEC countries would cease to be residual sources of supply as a function of market fluctuations only. This policy would bring about more favorable conditions for making the consuming countries appreciate that any supplementary pressure on finite reserves must result in equivalent concessions on their part. Over the short term a policy of systematic adaptation of production to demand is essential. The experience of the last few months has demonstrated that this operation posed no major problem in technical terms.

One should not conclude here without recalling that, for many years the OPEC conferences have been the occasion for denouncing the waste which the policy of "everything by oil" involves. The conferences have continued to call for a policy of conservation which has become all the more urgent since the ratio of proved reserves to production shows a clear tendency toward the exhaustion of the OPEC countries' reserves. This ratio (expressed in terms of production years) was at the level of 85 years in 1957. In 1981 it was no more than 44 years, after having declined to 61 years in 1960 and 48 years in 1970. At the present rate of petroleum extraction, the tendency toward decline should accelerate, to reach 32 years in 1990 and less than 20 years by the year 2000.

It is in the latter framework that it is necessary to place the view that one can take of the decline in petroleum demand forecast in the consuming countries. If this were the case, this decline would constitute a first, decisive step on the path of conserving the value of the world energy patrimony, and that could only make us rejoice. However, that is unfortunately not the dominant concern of some of our partners in the industrialized countries, whose principal objective remains the effective devaluation of petroleum prices. The refusal to advance durable solutions to the problems of prices and their cyclical freezing at insufficient levels which no economic argument justifies can only end in much sharper increases in price. New "petroleum shocks" are included in this logic of denial of the fundamental interests of the producing countries.

VOCATIONAL TRAINING, INSTITUTIONAL REQUIREMENTS EXAMINED

Algiers REVOLUTION AFRICAINE in French No 919, 2-8 Oct 81 pp 9-18

[Article by Kamal Zemouri]

> [Text] One of contemporary Algeria's most crucial problems is youth, particularly the segment aged 14-17 who cannot find their niche, who idly await their tour of national service, which will rescue them from their general apathy. The reasons why this precious national resource is being wasted are well known: the country's academic and vocational training establishment is not able to keep up with the country's demographic growth. Some time ago the deficit was in teaching personnel; today, it is more in infrastructure. Teacher training, fortunately, has finally gotten up to speed, particularly with respect to elementary, middle, secondary and technical education. Nevertheless, there is a weak point in our armor, and that is in vocational training, even though this type of schooling is more and more becoming part of the mainstream. In this field, however, the shortage is considerable, and one finds it at all levels. As the short history of vocational training in Algeria will make apparent, it is still in an embryonic state. Despite its recent institutional expansion, vocational training is still far from being able to meet the demand--both economic and social--for training. Now that the cause is understood, ambitious and laudable efforts are under way. The system is in the process of adapting itself to today's requirements, and also to the future's, which means first priority will be given to economic demand, and second to social demand.

Before 1962 and during the post-independence period in Algeria, vocational training played an extremely marginal role, and was confined to accelerated vocational training (FPA) activities, which were on a limited scale quantitatively, qualitatively and geographically. FPA was basically a training service intended to provide the colonial economy in a very short time and at very low cost with a "core" of qualified lower-level personnel, primarily in the fields of construction, bridge-building and roadwork and basic maintenance. We do not have precise figures on FPA's output, but it was negligible. The legacy from the time of independence, then, was from every point of view extremely modest.

To give the devil his due: it is necessary to train professionals. Algeria has an urgent need for them. The planners, in the preamble to the first quadrennial plan, set out this need clearly. Moreover, 1969, the year when the first national development plan was launched, was to coincide with the first efforts to promote vocational training in Algeria. That anemic structure must be transformed into a revitalized and revalorized institution.

Among the first measures taken can be pointed out the recruitment of training personnel and Algerian management "to enable FPA and other institutions to participate in the national task of raising the general educational level of the citizens." A whole gamut of activities "set off" in the field. The two imperatives of quality and rapidity had to be reconciled: two needs which we will be able to combine. Beginning with that basic idea, two types of training were considered: the first--long-term--is technical education in the traditional academic system. The other was a reinvigorated vocational training, which went through a number of changes of direction, including:

--Some branches of vocational training, especially public works and construction, would be redesigned to benefit other sectors where at the time the pressure was greater.

--The linkage between training and users, or between training and development, was achieved through agreements defining the rights and obligations of each partner.

--The existing system was designed to have excess capacity, in order to resorb academic drop-outs. However, it became increasingly apparent that vocational training was not being carried out on a scale adequate even to meet the economic demand, much less the social.

The gap to be filled, resulting from the country's insufficient vocational training capacity, would have repercussions on the capacity and maintenance of industrial plants. In the ministry of industry, in 1975, only 1,426 employees were in training at the centers under the sponsorship of state-owned companies. However, more and more production units were established around the country, and this could help fill the national shortage of qualified and expert manpower. Efforts were made here and there, in agriculture and the steel industry. Nevertheless, these efforts were not enough, in the face of needs which escalated vertiginously from one year to the next.

Also deserving of mention in our little history is the quite positive experiment of the Technology Institutes, which proved to more of a palliative than a comprehensive solution. The concept was original, but its circumstantial aspect limited its objectives, which were the production of the mid- and upper-level cadres called for by the plan. In that particular context the dynamic relationship between training and development had a brief, glorious moment, only to sink into oblivion, the victim of antagonisms and inconsistencies.

The second quadrennial plan was to be no more generous than the first in regard to vocational training, which still remained the poor cousins of the national academic and training system. On the other hand, the contradictions became even more exacerbated, and new constraints were added to the old. It must be borne in mind that the industrial options of the day did not encourage the training of people in the manual trades.

The gap continued to grow between the academic system, which was introducing innovations on a wide front, and vocational training, which was stagnating and still tainted with the obsolete concepts of the FPA. The overall record of development would highlight the serious shortage of vocational training and underline the consequences of that gap. Thus, on the eve of the 5-year plan, which was to be focused on the development of small and medium-sized industries, vocational training was put in the hands of a secretary of state [a cabinet-level official]. Really, it was high time. The economic need for vocational training reinforced the social necessity. The National Charter, as the written expression of the people's will, did not merely enunciate worn-out principles; it went further, by proposing a program: "vocational training carried out on a vast scale in the country, and action to continuously raise the qualification level of the workers, to enable them over time to become better and better adapted to the demands of modern technology." Elsewhere it said, "neither the needed training for the qualified manpower that is indispensable to the management of big industries, nor creative iniatitive and innovative boldness, nor the entrepreneurial spirit can flourish unless such opportunities are created by the progress of the industrial revolution itself." And the Charter announced the launching of an ambitious worker training program on a scale to provide the labor market with a minimum of 100,000 skilled workers per year.

Another document discusses vocational training, namely the General Labor Statute [SGT], which introduced some new methodological elements. Article 171 of the SGT stipulates that "training provides for the social and occupational advancement of the worker, and assures the economic development of the country. Therefore such activity must be elaborated and implemented with the participation of the workers." Article 178 of the SGT states that "the employing agency may require workers whose qualifications or skills permit, to contribute actively to training and refresher activities he undertakes."

To exhume another text, the "education and training" resolution adopted at the conclusion of the Fourth Congress of the FLN [National Liberation Front] Party diagnosed and proposed a comprehensive remedy which showed a complete understanding of the situation. Thus, the objectives of the quadrennial plan are perceived as an "overall concept for a training institution integrated into the sectors of general and technical education, university education and vocational training which would be the point of departure for a radical reform putting an end to the contradictions, conflicting goals, and poor planning which have become sources of waste and inefficiency." The resolution nicely summarizes the situation which had prevailed until then, the consequences of which we are still paying for. To look at the record is to compare the realities to the ideal. In the case which concerns us, what is important is to understand the relationships that link the three following factors:

1) the nation's training capability (all institutions combined); 2) the overall demand; and 3) the degree to which the nation's potential is being channeled to meet the unfilled needs. The study of these parameters is the foundation for the whole national vocational training strategy.

Radical Solutions

The 5-year plan was to create a very large demand for medium and upper-level cadres and above all--for the small and medium-sized industries--to give impetus to the building of a labor force still seriously deficient. At present, therefore, we find ourselves not, as we were some time ago, at an impasse, but rather at a turning point, with respect to vocational training. We can even say that the critical decision has already been made. And of course we find ourselves once more confronted with cold and pitiless statistics: the manpower deficit now predicted for the 5-year planning period breaks down this way: 43 percent for industrial workers, 72 percent for technicians and 85 percent for highly skilled technicians.

So necessity forces us to adopt radical solutions, such as the mobilization into the national effort of all human and material potential, all the skilled personnel that are needed, wherever they may be found.

The numbers can also help us assess the progress of vocational training. In 1962, there are a grand total of 5,000 training positions, which did not begin to correspond to the needs of the country, either in terms of quality, or the location of centers, or the substance of the programs. The efforts put forth during the triennial plan, and later the first quadrennial plan, gave the system larger scope. By the end of 1973, the overall productive capacity of the system was 9,000, which was encouraging but still inadequate in terms of the ever-growing need.

The second quadrennial plan embraced even larger needs, and in its preamble it described vocational training as "the basic instrument for satisfying the demand for skilled manpower." As a crowning indignity, that demand had to be met by manpower that was imported at a very high cost and paid for in precious foreign currency. Implementation followed the decision without further delay. Results were not long in coming. The number of training positions went to 17,000 and later to 26,000. To accomplish this, doubled training shifts were set up, on the model of the double sittings in primary school. The expansion of capacity also shows how the system became more aligned with the country's economic and technological demands. Thus, we will see the appearance of technical-industrial chains. The sectors of mechanical engineering and metalwork will show a growth rate in excess of 100 percent.

Demand never stops ballooning. The relative shortage of vocational training is most keenly felt at the level of school dropouts. In 1981, the gap between supply and demand persists. Over and above the chronic shortfalls, certain dangerous contradictions can be noted. We have a tendency to train more technicians than skilled workers: this results in under-utilization of the cadres, who are confined to less exalted tasks in the absence of qualified manpower.

The national vocational training policy has the heavy responsibility now of putting an end to the dysfunctions which were responsible for the disorder that impeded vocational training and the various development plans. We still recall the disparity that prevailed then and which resulted, among other things, in:

--a variety of different pedagogical programs, going from excessively specialized training to overly general, and not conducive to rapid preparation for employment.

--a diversity of pedagogical methods, going from traditional to modern, some of which are still in an experimental stage in the industrialized countries.

--extremely varied study conditions and training time, even in some cases for the same kind of training.

--extremely diverse standards for the levels, status, and general outline of the training.

--finally, training costs that varied according to the wildest whims of the institutions providing it.

The new initiative falls like a guillotine blade on the incoherence which characterized the sector. Things are much clearer. Better yet, now there is only one state institution responsible for carrying out this difficult mission. Some time ago, (see REVOLUTION AFRICAINE of February 1981) Mr Mohammed Nabi, secretary of state for vocational training, confided to us that three parameters define the problem with precision: its scope, its diversity and its urgency. The task, he said, is to figure out "how to transform a congeries of disparate training resources into one coherent system with clear objectives and an effective organization, and to standardize the conditions and modalities of training."

The answers to those questions can be seen today in light of the coordination of activities, the ambitious projects written into the 4-year plan, the impetus given to training in industry and the innovative system called apprenticeship (see separate articles). By the end of the quadrennial plan, vocational training will without a doubt be in a position to fulfill its economic and social contracts.

SAUDI DAILY INTERVIEWS FOREIGN MINISTER

GF081020 Manama Gulf News Agency in Arabic 0730 GMT 8 Nov 81

[Text] Dammam, 8 Nov (GNA)--Bahraini Foreign Minister Shaykh Muhammad ibn Mubarak al Khalifah has expressed the hope that all Arab states will support the Saudi peace initiative and that Israel will submit to world pressure and implement the ideas included in the peace plan in order to achieve peace and stability in the region and in order to grant the Palestinian people their legitimate rights.

In a statement made to the Saudi newspaper AL-YAWM today, the Bahraini minister said that the next Gulf summit conference will be a step toward bolstering cooperation among the peoples of the region and toward transferring the Gulf region from the stage of laying foundations and proposals to the stage of implementation.

Shaykh Muhammad ibn Mubarak al Khalifah denied that the Gulf summit conference will discuss establishing relations with the eastern bloc states. He also stressed that Gulf security is now the responsibility of the Gulf Cooperation Council [GCC], which must arrive at a joint cooperation plan in this field.

He added that the principle of defense should be collective because none of the region's states can achieve it singularly. He explained that the method of achieving this is left for the military personnel to decide because it is a technical issue.

The Bahraini foreign minister denied that there is a plan to add new states to the GCC. Commenting on this issue he said that a possibility of expansion does exist but expansion right now, while the council is still not fully established, is premature. He also stressed the GCC states' anxiousness to resolve the Omani-PDRY dispute and put an end to the Iraqi-Iranian war because only the enemies benefit from these conflicts.

The Bahraini foreign minister praised his country's relations with the kingdom of Saudi Arabia and said: Our friends are the friends of the kingdom and our enemies are her enemies too.

He expressed his country's satisfaction over the approval of the AWACS deal with Saudi Arabia and stressed that the kingdom's military strength is a reinforcement to the Gulf and the Arab nation.

KHOMEYNI REPORTEDLY LOOKING FOR SOLUTION TO WAR WITH IRAQ

LD011812 Belgrade TANJUG in English 1611 GMT 1 Nov 81

[Text] Tehran, 1 Nov (TANJUG)--Iran's religious leader, Khomeyni, has ordered the military and political leaders to look into possibilities for either a military or a political solution for the armed conflict with Iraq, unconfirmed information says.

In unofficial talks, however, Iran's official figures still reject any possibility for a peaceful settlement of the conflict since, being prepared for victory, their people could hardly consent to any compromise. Publicly, it is still claimed that the war would end soon in victory for Iran as Iran counts on its superiority in manpower. Priests appeal to the young to get enlisted for war and, for the time being, in addition to the two classes serving their military terms, another four classes who served their terms before have been mobilized.

Judging by everything, many worries--the latest fuel shortage among them--are pressing down heavily on Iran at present. In Tehran and in other cities as well, eyewitnesses say the crisis in petrol and other fuel supplies is harder than at the war start. The fuel shortage is seen as a consequence of successful Iraqi air raids on Iran's oil installations as well as of Iran's being compelled to raise its oil exports at the expense of oil consumption at home. Strikes in oil refineries are also a cause of this shortage, it is heard here.

Habib Chatti, secretary general of the Islamic conference, is informally claimed to have offered 10,000 million dollars in the name of Saudi Arabia in compensation for war damage to Iranian foreign minister (now premier) Musavi. This damage runs considerably higher, according to Iranian estimates, between 50,000 and 55,000 million dollars.

MILITARY SAID UNHAPPY OVER CHOICE OF NEW PREMIER

London IRAN PRESS SERVICE in English No 45, 5 Nov 81 pp 4-5

[Text] Iran's top military brass are reported to be uneasy at the choice of Mir Hossain Mussavi as prime minister because he is held by them responsible for the regime's very poor performance in foreign relations. The military have a direct interest in the regime's foreign policy because it has a direct bearing on the mullahs' ability to buy arms from reliable suppliers. As it is, over the last three months that Mussavi has been running Iran's Foreign Ministry, the country has been steadily forced into international isolation.

Ironically, during the same period, many people point out, the Iraqis whom Iran is fighting expanded their international relations, established more respectability and managed to grab the presidency of the U.N. General Assembly for their envoy to the world body. As a result of such diplomatic inroads the Iraqis have been able to obtain sophisticated military hardware from France, West Germany, Britain and even the United States via Jordan, some military sources have been pointing out. According to some reports the Soviets have also resumed shipment of arms to Iraq despite their new moves to get closer to Khomeini.

All these new developments are a source of anxiety to the Iranian military, who see their own stock of arms diminishing rapidly with no replacements available.

Indeed, the mullahs' policy of arms purchases is being taken as a yardstick of the regime's inefficiency and, worse still, corruption. According to reports in the British press the Khomeini regime is sending buyers who are so inexperienced that "they break all the rules and endanger others." The daily Guardian reported that "legitimate arms dealers and more experienced among the less orthodox dealers are now steering clear of dealing with Iran." Even an attempt by Libya to use former CIA agent Edwin Wilson, who runs a military hardware supply service to get aircraft parts for Iran fell through, the Guardian pointed out.

Meanwhile, three diplomats sent by the regime to buy military hardware in London were involved in dubious contacts which have resulted in criminal proceedings. As a result the three diplomats failed to accomplish their mission.

These instances, the military feel, are typical of the way the mullahs are handling the country's vital job of arms purchases, and the new premier is seen as directly responsible. He had assured the government that he would get help from Libya's Gaddafi. Instead he upset the Libyan leader and other Arabs by his tactlessness. Annoying the military, too, is the fact that the mullahs do not include army officers in missions sent abroad for arms purchases. They usually send ignorant relatives of top mullahs instead.

As foreign minister, Mussavi has spent more time and energy on imaginary schemes to liberate Palestine, to fight imperialism and to sponsor terrorist groups abroad than in serving Iran's genuine interests, the critics point out. His record, compared with the highly significant achievements of his Iraqi rival Sadoun Hammadi, is pathetic, they feel. Yet now he has been rewarded for his failures by being promoted to the premiership.

The military is also suspicious of the new president Khamenei, who as deputy defence minister was responsible for weakening of the army and the execution of scores of officers and other ranks. Realising this, Khomeini last month delegated more powers to the new chief of staff, General Zahir-Nejad, and politely barred Khamenei from interfering in army affairs.

INSIDE OPPOSITION GROUPS ADOPT NEW TACTICS AGAINST REGIME

London IRAN PRESS SERVICE in English No 45, 5 Nov 81 p 5

[Text] Armed opposition forces inside Iran seem to have adopted a new tactic in their continued campaign against the regime of Ayatollah Khomeini. Rather than directing their guns at prominent figures of the regime they are now eliminating middle rank functionaries, especially ideological commissars, informers and the so-called rally organisers.

Last week unidentified gunmen stopped the director of the Ideological Office in East Azarbaijan and killed him, together with two of his armed companions. The victim, identified as Javad Hossainkhah, was driving from Tehran to Tabriz. His car was chased by a jeep near Takestan, and forced to stop. Hosseinkhah and his companions were unable to use their guns. Their attackers ordered them out of their vehicle, took them to a quiet spot nearby and shot them. Their bodies were found later.

Shortly afterwards came the assassination of a hardline supporter of the regime in the headmaster of the secondary school in Tavalesh. His name has not been given. Two other new recruits to the staff of the Qazvin Secondary School named Azizi and Eshavari were also killed by unknown gunmen. Leaflets distributed at the scene claimed that the killings were intended to serve notice to so-called teachers who had been infiltrated by the regime.

In Tehran a city bus driver said to be a leading member of the hezbollahis--members of the fanatical "Party of God"--and also an informer, was shot dead. The shops of two South Tehran mobsters, identified as Hassan Mardani and Gholam Hossain Seyyed-Hossaini, were set on fire. They were alleged to be both informers and organisers of mobs to take part in pro-regime rallies and Friday prayer gatherings.

Similarly, in Kermanshah, Mashad, Tabriz and Isfahan well-known supporters of Khomeini who act as informers and mob organisers have been attacked by the opponents of the regime or their houses and shops set on fire.

Analysts in Tehran believe that the opposition's new tactic in switching from high ranking officials to the middle rank supporters of the regime is intended to weaken the pillars on which the regime's strength lies. Gunning down of middle rank supporters of Khomeini is also a less risky operation because, unlike the prominent mullahs, the second rank ones are not protected by a dozen or so bodyguards and they do not move about in bulletproof cars. Because of the nature of their work the middle rankers are also readily approachable.

Yet they perform a highly vital service to the regime, both in its spying network as well as in herding crowds to swell the attendance at Friday prayers or funeral processions. The Khomeini regime is highly sensitive to the size of the turnout at these public functions because it owed its initial success in ousting the Shah, and later in intimidating other rivals, by relying on well-organised rallies. Even today when a major decision is to be taken which may bring about popular outcry, the method used is to send a crowd in front of the Majlis to demand that that particular decision be adopted. Then the Majlis brands the rally as "the popular will" and subsequently agrees to the demands.

Now, by turning their guns against rally organisers the opponents of the regime expect to deny the mullahs that particular advantage.

Analysts believe the opposition elements who initially took such a heavy toll of the lives of the regime's leadership and who are now eliminating middle rank supporters of the mullahs belong to a highly efficient and professional organisation. They may well be members of a centrist group, and not members of the Mojahedin-e-Khalq, they suggest.

MOJAHEDIN-E KHALQ REPRIMANDED FOR PLOTS, ASSASSINATIONS

Tehran JOMHURI-YE ESLAMI in Persian 3 Oct 81 pp 1, 11

[Text] On the eve of the elections, Rajavi--this fugitive from the wrath of the people--called upon supporters of his anti-peoples' organization to plot against these elections as extensively as possible. He was hoping that with this anti-people request's appearance in the imperialist, fear-generating press, the turnout for the elections of millions of revolution-loving masses would be reduced, and that 3 million votes would be realized. However, the "people," even more full of love than before, took up the standard for their relentless struggle against the world-devourers, and fearlessly, paying no heed to the hypocrites' "heroic"! protection of them, sent their true defenders to the barricades of the defense of the interests of the deprived. The people's active and zealous turnout shows once again that the Islamic Republic of Iran, as one of the world's most stable countries, decisively carries on with its revolution while struggling against internal and external plots. This stability, whose only guarantor is the people's unsparing protection of the revolution, has always been a thorn in the side of America and its cohorts, and they have wanted to refute it on every pretext so as to always have a justification for plotting against the Islamic Republic. Yet the people have always shamed these pretexts, while blackening the faces of those who have buried their heads in the sand and shamelessly equated the killing of innocent people with defense of the people.

These same people, on the day the leader of their clan despicably fled to Paris with Bani-Sadr hiding in the airplane's restroom; stupidly said that in another week the people would bring him back with greetings, praise, whistles and cheers and make him Prime Minister. In the course of filling the shoes of Bakhtiar, Oveysi, Amini, Ariana, and others, the "people"! who are their supporters came together and tried as much as they were able to martyr the nation's officials in order that perhaps the way would be opened for them to come here, but the nation's closing more tightly of ranks in its enmity of them showed them who their true enemies are. Yesterday they mobilized in order to break the ranks of the people.

Who did the purposeless agents of the central cadres abroad martyr in the streets, supporters of dependent capitalism, or representatives of the nation's capitalists?

If their enemies are these people, then why are they hiding from the wrath of the people? Why don't they demonstrate once in Shush Square, Nazi Abad, or the Seh Rah-e Azari? Is it not because there are more people in these areas?

Ask them what class Raja'i came from. At what luxury-laden table did he sit? Don't they know how he lived and what long years he suffered in prison? Ask them how much wealth the martyred Beheshti had, and who swallowed the poison of accusation to obtain a moment's ease for the people in the villages. How many times did Hasheminezhad go to prison, and how many times did those connected with the Mojahedin betray him?

Ask them who the people voted for in the elections, and why?

Who among your comrades-in-arms are enemies of the Islamic Republic of Iran, and what is the American connection with your enmity with the Islamic Republic? Who were you supporting and who were you attacking in your disruption of the elections? Did you get the message in Paris? What percentage of the people in the poor neighborhoods participated in the elections, and how many of the people in the wealthy neighborhoods? What about the villagers?

They know all the answers to these questions. If they didn't know they wouldn't just demonstrate in front of the classy boutiques.

Oh you who have never been able to get the people to turn out whenever you have come out of your fearsome houses against the people who have firmly dedicated their pain, suffering, and deprivation against the superpowers, and even America's henchmen who are your leaders have not been able to disperse the people. Open your eyes and see how the people, in defiance of all your scientific analyses, have solidly participated in the elections and given expression to their rancour against the dastradly assassination of their dear ones.

Those who have thus far been martyred at your treasonous hands were the true supporters of these people and spokesmen for their deprivations. This is why the nation employed them, and you treasonously martyred them. Oh deceived ones! Just once, ask your leaders what is the social class of those they call thugs, Partisans of God, and Phalangists, and how is it that this time the thugs are not capitalists? Ask the leader of your group to plan a demonstration once in the poor neighborhoods so that his voice can reach the ears of the poor people. The deprived ones have certainly heard your entire pitch, and yet you demonstrate in order to bring out the capitalists in the upper part of the city! Are you afraid those calloused hands will tear you to pieces?

Truly, what percentage of the membership of the organization is composed of people who have tasted hunger? On what side of town are your homes? Ask your team leader sometime why all the team leaders' houses are located in places where there are no poor people within forty lots in four directions. Ask them what neighborhoods the team leaders' houses were in for the armed groups and organizations before the revolution, and where the organization's slogans were most often heard, and for which group of people these slogans were most interesting.

You who have taken daggers in hand to kill the people's dear ones, what people are you defending? The people are those who turned out 100 percent for the elections in the Southern part of the city and the villages, and this firmly establishes their strength of purpose in defending the revolution.

IRANIANS' RESENTMENT TURNS AGAINST LEFTIST LEADERS

London IRAN PRESS SERVICE in English No 45, 5 Nov 81 pp 6-8

[Text] A steadily growing feeling of resentment against the Mojahedin-e-Khalq and its allied leftist group leaders over their responsibility for sending so many young people onto the streets to be slaughtered by Khomeini's thugs is reported from Tehran. The public's first reaction when the wave of murders began three months ago was one of severe shock. There was severe criticism even of Khomeini, who was openly called "the most bloodthirsty tyrant Iran has ever seen."

"But with Bani-Sadr and Rajavi in the safety of Paris while their misled and openhearted supporters were being killed like flies, it was only natural that with their initial fury dissipated people should begin to blame Rajavi and his colleagues for leaving their supporters to face the music," a Tehran observer pointed out. "The two fugitives in Paris were likened to commanders who had deserted their men in the battle."

As the mullahs intensified their bloody campaign of murder and execution the popular backlash against the Mojahedin leaders grew. Iranians who invariably believe that there must be a sinister hand behind any event even suggested that Khomeini and his henchmen were right in accusing the Mojahedin leaders of being American agents. "Apparently, this is a clever device through which the Americans are eliminating the true leftists by using the mullahs," was a theory constantly aired.

Other Iranians who also look for hidden hands behind every political move suggested that the wave of the murders had something to do with the Russians and the Tudeh. They maintained that the Tudeh party, which follows the Moscow line so faithfully, had triggered the recent showdown between the Mojahedin and the Khomeini group in an effort to break up the country's largest leftist organisation. In doing this, the theory went on, the Tudeh would weaken and effectively eliminate a heretical rival, and thus would emerge as the sole standard-bearer of the left.

Advocates of this theory held that the Russians had two political surrogates in Iran. The first, known to everyone, was the Tudeh party, which because of its record of blind obedience to Moscow, was very much discredited in the country. The second was, they argue, the Mojahedin-e-Khalq, which had a kind of national and religious cover and because of that could attract many genuine leftists who had no love for Moscow.

The advocates of this theory argue that the enormous funds at the disposal of the Mojahedin and their outside contacts prove the point that they were supported by a foreign power. And the fact that they only attacked the U.S. and even tried to hand over U.S. Embassy documents to Russian agents showed their real orientation.

They claim that after the quarrel between Bani-Sadr and the hardliners came into the open Moscow tried to persuade the Mojahedin leadership to maintain neutrality and keep some place on the Iranian political scene. But either because of the personal ambitions of its leaders, or other factors, the organisation decided to throw in its lot with Bani-Sadr.

Factors which might have encouraged the Mojahedin to join Bani-Sadr, it is suggested, were:

1. The Tudeh leadership was possibly worried that their party might once again be sacrificed by Moscow if the Soviets decided to put its chips on the Mojahedin number. So they pushed Rajavi into Bani-Sadr's arms to obviate this.

2. It is also possible that the Tudeh leadership managed to convince their Soviet overlords that the excesses of the Khomeini regime had turned the popular tide in favour of a secular system in preference to a religious one; thus, a pure socialist-Leninist set-up was preferable to an Islamic marxist one.

3. Finally, it was suggested that independent factions within the Mojahedin decided to make a clean break from Khomeini and the Russians, and so they saw in Bani-Sadr and his foreign backers, presumably the European left, a good vehicle on which to ride to an independent course.

What is certain is that all the leading players in the political scene, such as the Tudeh, Mojahedin, the Islamic Republic party, the independent leftists including the National Democratic Front, and finally the remainder of the supporters of Bazargan and the National Front, are peripheral groups. Certainly none of them could claim with any confidence they would win a free election, nor form a strong government, Iranian observers contend. Indeed, many people believe that after the overthrow of Shahpour Bakhtiar, the only form of credible government which Iran has witnessed was that of Bazargan's provisional administration in 1979; that government's popularity began to wane after only one month in office, when the atrocities of the revolutionary courts and their refusal to give a fair and open trial to the leading figures of the monarchical regime became clear. Later, the high-handed manner in which the referendum of April 1, 1979 was conducted effectively put an end to the solid public backing for Bazargan, too.

Thus, from a strictly political viewpoint, the bloody fight between the mullahs and the Mojahedin is a factional war between two extremist and by now unrepresentative groups, many Iranian observers point out.

It is inevitable too, that people will note that the victims of today were themselves the killers of yesterday. Now that the dust has settled over the early period of the revolution people can look back to the events of February 1979 and see that it was the combined forces of the Mojahedin and Fedayeen-e-Khalq which raided army barracks soon after the then chief of staff General Gharabaghi called the army off the streets and back to their barracks. On those fateful days of February 10 and 11, 1979 many unarmed soldiers and officers were mercilessly killed by Mojahedin and Fedayeen gunmen.

The same groups were also responsible for helping the young and socially frustrated mullahs to set up Islamic tribunals to dispense summary justice. Not that the mullahs needed much encouragement to resort to violence. But the Mojahedin and their allies provided the mullahs with their technical support and taught them how to be ruthless. The Mojahedin's record, therefore, leaves their main activists with little popular sympathy. Added to that is the group's ambiguous political platform. According to most political analysts in Iran with whom it is possible to keep in touch, the Mojahedin have always said "what they are not, but they are yet to say what they are."

"They say they are not marxists," one analyst points out. "They also say that they are not theocrats. They are neither liberals, nor nationalists, because in early 1979 they openly attacked the National Front and other followers of the well-known nationalist leader, the late Dr Mossadegh. But when you ask them about their political, social and economic programmes they usually dodge the issue and resort to bland and generalised statements."

In today's political climate in Iran two other factors work against the Mojahedin. One is the obscure background of their leaders. Two of their best-known figures--Massoud Rajavi and Moussa Khiabani--were not even born when Iranians nationalised their oil industry. It has taken a bloody revolution and a massive dose of economic chaos and misery for Iranians for them to appreciate the value of "the devil they knew." Indeed, the inexperienced ministers of the successive cabinets after the revolution have left a feeling among Iranians that an obscure young man like Rajavi is hardly a better bet than the untested Velayati or Mir-Hossain Mussavi.

Also haunting the minds of much of the professional and clerical classes is the ferocity with which members and supporters of the Mojahedin and fedayeen, as well as the Tudeh party, whipped up campaigns against all moderate officials in the administration and industry to force them from their jobs after the revolution. They were to blame for destroying the lives of thousands of ordinary officials, it is alleged, and it was they who at that time invoked Islam as their reason.

Thus, along with the callous way the Mojahedin leaders sent young people onto the streets to get killed, many people look at their earlier ruthlessness and wonder what sort of life the Mojahedin might provide if they did take power for a period in Iran. Would it be more murder, purges, confiscations and hardship? Few people would give a firm negative on that, independent observers feel.

OPPOSITION GROUPS' COALITION REPORTED PROGRESSING

London IRAN PRESS SERVICE in English No 45, 5 Nov 81 pp 1-3

[Text] Reports from a number of exile opposition groups in Paris have hinted that current moves to form a loose coalition among them to present a united front with the aim of getting rid of the Khomeini regime in Iran have been progressing satisfactorily.

Efforts were continuing to bring in prominent military names who have both following among officers who are still in Iran and whose inclusion could influence opposition forces inside the country to take new heart and consider action.

There are already signs in Iran that nationalist groups now see the urgency of all opponents of the regime working together before it is too late. Open letters from professional and other groups now circulating in Tehran are pushing this theme vigorously. There is also a strong feeling among observers watching the exile groups that they themselves now feel there is sufficient animosity to the mullah's administration among both military and civilian groups inside Iran to encourage some concerted action.

Additionally the shows of open disgust from a number of foreign governments, as well as the world public at large, over the course of events in Iran have provided new incentives to come together to try to salvage something from the wreck of their country. Fears that Western governments would stamp on any embryonic united opposition front because of their commercial hopes in Iran have dissipated with the signs of a spreading realisation among the industrial countries that unless some change occurs in Iran shortly it "won't be worth a penny to any would-be trader," as one exile put it.

First reports on the new coalition plan said Shahpour Bakhtiar, who heads the most powerful opposition group, the National Iranian Resistance Movement, veteran statesman Ali Amini, who has been working to build up a united front for many months, Admiral Ahmad Madani, and Hassan Nazih, both officials who worked initially for the post-Shah regime and have been sent as anti-monarchist, and several other opposition figures had agreed to work together without sacrificing their own freedom of action.

Reports that overtures were being made to have monarchist leaders join them have since been confirmed by sources close to the groups. Reservations expressed at the outset by Madani over the inclusion of a man like General Gholam Ali Oveissi, the Shah's former strongman, who rightly or wrongly has been blamed for some of the violence in Tehran during the unrest there, are said to have been overruled.

Amini is said to have expressed the view that the people of Iran are so desperate to return to some semblance of normal life, and restore some sanity to their existence, that they are no longer concerned over who comes to save them. Others are said to have supported this view. Oveissi is known to enjoy a strong following among some sections of the military and many exiles.

Some observers also saw the silence of the new Shah on the anniversary of his accession to the throne as a possible reflection of a desire on his and his advisers' part to play as diplomatic a role while the coalition negotiations are going on as possible. "If he does see his role as a constitutional one it stands to sense that while the politicians are negotiating he should be seen as awaiting their recommendations without trying to influence them at this stage," a veteran Iranian official commented to IPS. "Especially when the tide is steadily turning in the favour of monarchy once more."

Observers say the noticeable mellowing of former republicans in their attitude to the monarchy in recent weeks reflects their awareness that insistence of any particular system of government or ideology can only be disruptive rather than help unite Iranians to save their country.

The philosophy of the new coalition is that the groups all work together to topple Khomeini, then guarantee a free plebiscite among Iranians to decide the system under which they want to live. Afterwards, the groups will go their own ways and conduct their political campaigns within the system people decide upon, and under the general principles of the 1907 constitution. That constitution does provide for a mechanism for change in the system, Iranian experts say.

Another factor cited by some observers as bringing about a more practical attitude to the centrist forces are the signs that rightist forces are steadily organising and drawing growing support. There is a natural fear among republicans, the commentators say, that if some effective political organisation to "supervise" the move to topple Khomeini and any return to Iran by exile forces is not set up, then more extremist rightists could impose another oppressive regime and thus spark off new strife.

Some sources close to the new coalition activities say the question of approaching Mojahedin-e-Khalq leader Massoud Rajavi and former president Bani-Sadr to join them had been discussed. But this could not be confirmed.

There are now signs of a growing movement inside Iran to organise popular opposition to Khomeini's rule into an institutional framework. Reports indicate that a number of civil servants, oil company employees, educationalists, lawyers, physicians and businessmen are at work trying to shape up a massive resistance movement.

One indicator of such a move has come in the form of an announcement by the hitherto unknown group calling itself the Association of the Civil Servants of Iran. In a leaflet the founders of the association have announced their readiness to provide civilian back-up to any military move to topple the present-day rulers of Iran.

The association has called on all the Iranians to be ready to play their due role in the movement, which it says is bound to put an end to the rule of the mullahs. However, it has cautioned the people not to take rash decisions, not to endanger lives unnecessarily and not to act alone. It believes that all the opposition groups at home and abroad, military and civilian, must narrow down their objection to the single act of saving the homeland.

The association has specifically called on all opposition groups to leave aside ideological differences, party loyalties and sectarian considerations in favour of the all important task of saving the national identity and territorial integrity of Iran.

It warns various political and ideological groups that what is in danger is the very existence of Iran, "our very nationhood and our Iranian identity, because the present-day usurpers of power in Iran are blatantly and shamelessly bent on destruction of everything which has an Iranian identity."

The association goes on to state: "Nothing else is in immediate danger; neither Islam, any particular ideology, nor any kind of regional rights. We stress that what is in real danger is the very basis of our nationhood. If we lose that we will lose everything else. There will be no use for any ideology, faith or creed if we lose our homeland and identity."

It stresses that only Khomeini is gaining from the present obsession of "certain political groups in the opposition camp with ideological considerations or personal ambitions." It sets out its plan for unity of all opposition groups as follows:

1. Regard Khomeini and his regime as an army of occupation who must be evicted from Iran by a well-planned military operation.

2. Organise civilian back-up to make the liberation move as smooth and as bloodless and painless as possible, because during the past few years too much Iranian blood has been spilled and too much pain suffered.

3. All Iranians have a right and duty to participate in the war of liberation but there must be a clear-cut command structure with the military wing in the lead.

4. Avoid popularist slogans, especially those which--while desirable under ideal conditions--are meaningless at present.

5. Always remember that our immediate task is to evict an occupation army so as to reinstate national and constitutional institutions which have been destroyed or usurped by the army of occupation.

OPPOSITION SUPPORT OF MILITARY REVIEWED

NC301846 (Clandestine) Radio Iran in Persian to Iran 1330 GMT 30 Oct 81

[Text] The morale of Iran's soldiers has always been high, which is something that cannot be (?ignored). After 3 1/2 years of treason, Khomeyni and his associates are (?still) trying to (?weaken) the army. After all the executions of the brave men of the armed forces, gendarmerie and police force and after all the pressure imposed on the armed forces (?as a result of which) many personnel had to leave the country, (?we continue) to see that wherever an Iranian soldier is, he feels the pains suffered by his homeland with all his being and conveys the feeling of patriotism (?to the people around him). [passage indistinct] This feeling of responsibility, this continuous thought about the destiny of Iran and of Iranians is (?a flame burning) within the soldiers and something that has been displayed time and again (?on various occasions and places).

(?The feeling of patriotism is so strong in the soldiers) that the calamity stricken people of Iran have attached all their hopes to this devoted force. With each passing day, the Iranian people's expectations on the Iranian army increase. And with each day, the burden on the shoulders of the military personnel becomes heavier. Their duty becomes (?more important) and their mission more (?specific). The truth is that the Iranian armed forces and military personnel--from ordinary soldiers, gendarmes and policemen up to the higher ranks--have never had a confrontation with the Iranian people. From the very first days of their service, they have used their weapons to confront foreign enemies and to preserve Iran's territorial integrity. The two things of importance to them are the preservation of Iranian thought and keeping Iran (?safe) from foreign aggression.

From the very start, Khomeyni and his associates regarded the Iranian army as a force confronting them. They knew that if they did not destroy the organizational (?bases) of the army and did not weaken the patriotic (?feeling) and dignity of the soldiers it would be impossible to place the army at their own disposal.

(?From the very first days), the first step taken was to mislead a number of military commanders with the help of Huyser's sinister mission and, by using the hireling Palestinians and the pro-Palestinian Mojahedin, they pillaged the garrisons as best they could. Khomeyni [word indistinct] in the sense that in the beginning he praised and eulogized the armed forces and he ordered his devotees to place flowers in the barrels of the soldiers' guns during demonstrations. When (?he achieved what he wanted, he approached) the soldiers in the name of Islam and (?by infiltrating the army with his officials) and revolution guards, he tried to place religious (?beliefs) within the army vis-a-vis the firm determination of patriotic commanders.

The tragedy brought about by Khomeyni (?was very clearly) aimed at the officers and NCO's of the armed forces. (?However) he could not pass (?certain limits).

The second stage of Khomeyni's deceit became obvious when the patriotic Kurdish, Torkaman and Baluchi rose to confront the religious dictatorship of the (?Shi'ite bigots). By sending the armed forces to fight the Kurds, Khomeyni was trying to hit two birds with one stone. In other words, he intended to destroy the Kurds and to decrease, as much as possible, the popularity of an army that had never raised a weapon against a compatriot. Both of these plots failed because the Kurds alertly refrained from confronting the armed forces and [words indistinct] treated their military captives very respectfully and the armed forces treated the Kurds with the highest spirit of patriotism, so much so that Khomeyni was enraged and Khalkhali was sent on a mission to massacre the Kurdish captives. At any rate, Khomeyni's plans failed and Khalkhali's massacres only increased national and world aversion toward Khomeyni.

At this stage in Iran's history no one is as heavily burdened with treason as Bani-Sadr. He, too, was confronted with the healthy morale of the armed forces personnel and with the depth of their patriotism.

The third stage of Khomeyni's deceit in the armed forces was implemented during the war with Iraq. Khomeyni tried, by using (?the wretched) Bani-Sadr, to belittle the commanders. He appointed Bani-Sadr commander in chief to tell the armed forces personnel that "the post to which all of you attach such great importance can be filled by any ruffian if I wish." But we all know that Khomeyni and Bani-Sadr were both defeated at this stage too, so much so that today when reviewing the Iran-Iraq war, everyone praises the armed forces and its personnel and denounces Khomeyni and Bani-Sadr.

The Iranian armed forces have special characteristics, the first of which is their patriotism and the fact that they are nationalists, either knowingly or unknowingly, The second is that the army has gained great experience from the incidents and the historic experience of the past 3 years and has (?displayed) an extremely [word indistinct] and praiseworthy behavior. The third is that it believes in its military (?know-how). The fourth is that the army is disgusted with the fundamentalist nature and bigotry of the regime. And finally, the army is composed of constructive men and not destructive and fatalist elements. It is because of these inherent (?values) that the Iranian armed forces have stayed completely (?untouched) and each and every one of its personnel is (?worthy of praise).

(?Iran's salvation) depends on the heavy mission that all (?army) personnel shoulder. There is no doubt that with the first opportunity all of them will unite to save Iran in a humanitarian but powerful way. Today, the military in Iran and abroad are all thinking of the homeland's salvation. This is why they enjoy the support of all the groups opposed to Khomeyni and his destructive regime. Iranians respect and attach hopes to the armed forces and will never forget that in these past 3 years of calamity, the armed forces have truly struggled and showed (?their devotion) both at home and abroad.

Neither intrigues by the left nor deceit by the clergy can mislead our armed forces. The armed forces is a manifestation of patriotism that is aware of its mission [word indistinct]. The armed forces [words indistinct] and do not harass compatriots. The armed forces have shown that they are the spirit of Iran.

MEASURES TAKEN TO IMPROVE SECTORS OF ECONOMY

Electricity Output

Tehran BURS in Persian 13 Sep 81 p 7

[Text] The Ministry of Energy announced its most important activities concerning electricity and energy in the course of the past year as follows:

Electricity Affairs

The main goal of the Ministry of Energy in the area of electricity is to produce electricity for various uses throughout the country. Obviously, the electrical industry made some progress in the past, but this progress was achieved at a very high cost and the expansion and rate of production were coupled with faulty policies (which were a part of the general policies of the country). Presently, the policy of the Ministry of Energy is primarily focussed on the quantitative expansion of this industry. For instance, providing power for 5 million consumers with probable power outages (a total of 5 days per year) and providing power for 4 million consumers with probable power outages (a total of 2 days per year) will be given priority. In addition to accomplishing the main goal and the quantitative expansion of the network, especially in villages and agricultural and industrial regions, difficulty lies in the demand for electricity for the coming years, which requires that steps be taken from now for more production (qualitative expansion). For this purpose, as well as to take the place of the nuclear power plants, which for political, economic, [technical], and security reasons have been eliminated from the program, the Ministry of Energy has prepared an expansive plan to establish hydroelectric and steam power plants. Hydroelectric power plants, which from every standpoint are the most valuable power plants, are being studied by the specialists of this Ministry. At the present time, with the cooperation of the universities, they are studying appropriate places to build dams. Also, the necessary planning for steam power plants (with a 5,000 megawatt capacity), which are necessary because of the increased electrical consumption and the elimination of the nuclear power plants, has begun.

Another goal of the Ministry of Energy is to create self-sufficiency in the electricity industry in order to free this industry from dependency, which concerns, directly or indirectly, all the industrial and agricultural institutions as well as the daily life of the people.

A brief summary of the activities and the steps taken regarding electrical power follows.

A. Installed Power

At the end of 1359 [21 Mar 80-20 Mar 81], the installed electrical power in the power stations managed by the Ministry of Energy reached 9,553 kilowatts, which shows an increase of 1,622 kilowatts (20.5 percent) compared to the end of the previous year (7,931 kilowatts).

B. Production of Electrical Energy

Between 21 Mar 80-20 Mar 81, the electrical energy produced by power facilities managed by the Ministry of Energy reached 19,869 million kilowatt hours, which shows an increase of 428 million kilowatt hours (2.2 percent) compared to the previous year (19,441 million kilowatt hours). Of the total electricity produced between 21 Mar 80-20 Mar 81, about 13,143 million kilowatt hours were produced by Tavanir Company, 1,107 million kilowatt hours by regional electricity companies, and 5,619 million kilowatt hours by the country's hydroelectric power stations. The electricity produced by hydroelectric stations (4,042 million kilowatt hours) of Tavanir Company was transmitted and sold to various parts of the country.

C. Electrical Outreach to Villages

Before the revolution, the number of villages with electricity was 4,186 throughout the country, which, compared to the total number of Iranian villages (66,000 villages), was insignificant and its annual expansion was quite poor (an average of 200 villages per year).

After the Islamic revolution, this important matter was noted and especially emphasized. After studies were made, a comprehensive plan to bring electricity to the villages was ratified. With this plan, an average of 2,000 villages will be electrified annually, which shows the comprehensiveness of the plan and the persistence of the authorities from the very beginning of their work.

During this same year, the regional electric companies continued their efforts in this regard. During this time, the regional electric company of Isfahan brought electricity to 279 villages, the regional electric company of Mazandaran to 267 villages, and the regional electric company of Gilan to 53 villages.

D. The Expansion of Power Stations

1. Work on the construction of [Naka] power stations, including 4 units of 440 megawatts each, of which 2 units are operational and a third is being tested before becoming temporarily operational.

2. Work on the construction of a 320 megawatt power station in Isfahan, which was completed this year and will become operational in 1360 [21 Mar 81-20 Mar 82].

3. Work on the installation of a large, 800 megawatt power station in Isfahan, the first unit of which will begin operation in Dey '61 [22 Dec 82-20 Jan 83].

4. Work on the construction of a 1,280 megawatt power station in Bandar 'Abbas, of which [3]20 megawatts were operational in the spring of 1980, and the installation of the second and third units are being completed.

5. Work on the construction of the gas power station of Orumiyeh, with a 60 megawatt capacity, which will be operational in the spring of 1981.

6. Work on the construction of the thermodynamic power station of Tus-Mashhad. During the year in question, most of the activities concentrated on building facilities and lodging for the employees. The main work on the power station itself will be followed up during the next year.

7. Work on the construction of a new power station in Tabriz, of which 2 units of 387 Megawatts each are being installed by Tavanir experts and technicians since the dismissal of foreign contractors.

8. Work on the construction of the 1,360 megawatt Ramin power station in Ahvaz, of which a 315 megawatt unit was operational in the fall.

9. Constructing a power station in south Tehran.

This power station will be built to handle the future needs of the nationwide network with a 1,500 megawatt capacity in the vicinity of Tehran.

10. Work on the construction of the reserve pump power station of Siah Bisheh, which will store the energy produced by the thermodynamic power station as a backup during times of heavy load demand.

11. Several diesel power stations of small capacity in different cities have been or are being installed by regional electric companies.

E. The Expansion of Distribution Lines and Stations

1. The completion of the 230 kilovolt Tehran-Isfahan lines between 21 Apr-21 May 80 and the completion of the preliminary operations for the temporary operation of the 230 kilovolt Tehran-Isfahan and Ziaran stations.

2. The necessary steps for the completion of the Najafabad-steel mill power transmitting lines and operations concerning the 230 kilovolt input of the steel mill, which became temporarily operational in the spring.

3. The transmitting lines of the 400 kilovolt Isfahan-Arak-Tehran project have been completed except for parts of the south Rudshur line.

4. The 230 kilovolt Naka-Sari-Kaghazsazi-Qayemshahr unit, in consultation with the Tavanir Company, is being built.

5. The margin of the operations of the second Tehran-Manjil circuit [as published].

6. Work on the preparation and installation of equipment to bring electricity to the national defense industries in Isfahan was begun temporarily in Khordad [22 May-21 Jun].

7. The 400 kilovolt eastern lines of Naka-Tehran, which became operational in Esfand [20 Feb-20 Mar].

8. The 400 kilovolt western lines of Neka-Tehran, which have made 20 percent progress and the operations of the project are continuing.

9. The 400 kilovolt project of Ziaran-Tabriz, which had made five percent progress at the end of winter.

10. The Tabriz-Mahabad-Orumiyeh lines, which have made five percent progress.

11. The 63 kilovolt Gilan lines project, which will be created to strengthen the connection between central and eastern Gilan.

12. The 66 kilovolt Fars lines project. The goal of this project is to transmit electricity from the natural gas power station of Shiraz to a number of cities of this province. Activities in all areas of the project continue.

13. The stations of the project for the expansion of the 132 kilovolt Azarbaijan electrical unit, all of the lines of which have been completed and have made 50 percent progress during this year.

14. The project of the 400 kilovolt transmitting line of Shiraz-Fasa-Sirjan.

The project is in progress and its goal is to connect the two main lines of (Tehran-Isfahan-Bandar 'Abbas) and (Ahvaz-Omidiyeh-Shiraz).

15. The comprehensive distribution project for Tehran.

This project is very actively being implemented and its goal is to cover the city of Tehran and its close suburbs.

16. The 63 kilovolt transmitting lines project of Khorasan, which made very good progress during the year in question.

Animal Husbandry

Tehran BURS in Persian 14 Sep 81 p 2

[Text] According to a PARS NEWS AGENCY report, the seminar on studying the resources for national self-sufficiency in animal husbandry products, which began on 23 Aug, completed its work with the issuance of a resolution.

The text of this resolution, consisting of 10 articles, is as follows:

1. Speedy determination of ownership on the basis of Islamic guidelines.

2. Considering the importance of the role of studying and treating animals and poultry in order to attain self-sufficiency, the veterenarian organization is to prepare a plan for providing and justly distributing vital medicine and to establish centers for the production of needed vaccines, under the supervision of the Razi institution of Hesarak.

3. In order to better control the diseases that humans and animals share in common, and to support the producers of the company for Iranian dairy industries, steps must be taken to create the necessary centers to collect the milk produced by small cattle raisers.

4. To provide and distribute thoroughbred hybrid milk cows needed by cattle raisers who meet the requirements, the organization of animal husbandry must take advantage of all the resources for raising hybrid thoroughbred cattle.

5. Considering the necessity of improving the condition of fishermen and the vital need to protect and preserve the acquatic resources as well as accelerate the construction of the southern shores, fisherman service centers must be established by the northern fishery company to devise the necessary regulations to preserve water resources and to increase the stock of fish in water reservoirs, lakes, and behind dams. Also, a council made up of the members of the general assemblies and the general directors of the northern and southern fisheries must be formed and the authority of the general assemblies and the board of directors of the two fisheries must be conferred on the above-mentioned council.

6. Believing in the major share of the tribes in the production of non-dependent animal husbandry products and the particular social life of this stratum of our fellow citizens, it is necessary that the affairs of tribes be centered in one unit. Also, since the tribes make up a significant percentage of the national population, from now on, the nation's population must be divided under the headings of urban, rural, and tribal.

7. In order to coordinate the development of planting feed, a headquarters consisting of the regional representatives of the offices of forests and pastures, animal husbandry, agriculture, research, sowing, and industries of the foundation of the oppressed, the reconstruction crusade and the land distribution boards in the regional office of agricultural affairs is to be established and given the necessary responsibilities.

8. Considering the special importance of corn in feeding humans, animals, and poultry, encouragement should be given to the planting of this grain.

9. The affairs of the preservation, correct operation, reformation, and revitalization of pastures, with the technical supervision of the national organization of forests and pastures, are to be implemented through pasture upkeep projects through self-help and the direct participation of rural and tribal cattle raisers as well as the establishment of rural and tribal Islamic cooperative councils.

10. In order to precisely and completely implement the above items, it is necessary to establish centers for rural services, to combine and reconstruct organizations in the Ministry of Agriculture and Rural Development, to train the existing cadre, to make organizational plans based on accurate statistical information to ensure cooperation and coordination between all the organizations in implementing the items of the resolution, to provide the required funds for implementing the related plans, and to eliminate troublesome financial and other regulations. Also, the animal husbandry unit of the Ministry of Agriculture and Rural Affairs will be responsible for the implementation of the items of the resolution.

Tehran Water Works

Tehran BURS in Persian 22 Sep 81 p 3

[Text] The Ministry of Energy announced the activities of the Tehran regional water organization as follows.

1. Operations

Untreated Water

The untreated water to be purified from the water resources, including the Jajrud and Karaj rivers and the semi-deep wells, is transferred through the water works facilities to the water treatment facilities of Tehran. From 21 Mar 80-20 Mar 81, about 222.52 million cubic meters of untreated water was transported from the above-mentioned sources to Tehran and 38.29 million cubic meters of it were used for planting forests in the east and west of Tehran and for the industrial factories around Tehran as well as for washing pipelines. The remaining 404.23 million cubic meters were sent to the Tehran treatment facilities. Treatment facilities used 7.14 cubic meters and 397.09 cubic meters, after treatment, were put at the disposal of 565,614 Tehran consumers.

Laboratories

The laboratories, through checking samples and making various biological, bacteriological, and chemical tests, control the water from its source to its ultimate delivery to the consumer. If the water is polluted or impure, they determine the reasons and eliminate them. During the year in question, 10,574 tests were carried out on water samples in various laboratories of the organization as follows:

Chemistry laboratory, 906 samples

Bacteriology laboratory, 6,333 samples

Biology laboratory, 2,438 samples

Laboratory for the study of water resources, 563 samples

Sewage laboratory, 188 samples

Karaj Drinking Water

In 1342 [21 Mar 63-20 Mar 64], the Tehran regional water organization began to implement the first stage of the plan to install drinking water pipelines for the city of Karaj. In 1344 [21 Mar 65-20 Mar 66], in accordance with an agreement, the operation of the water facilities of the city of Karaj was conferred on the Tehran regional water organization. From 21 Mar 80-20 Mar 81, 3,614,599 cubic meters of treated water was put at the disposal of the consumers.

3. Development Projects

Project for Building Lar Dam

Operations of the implementation of this project until the end of winter, 1980, has been as follows.

Building the dam and tunnel of Lar and related facilities, 92 percent progress.

The tunnel to reach the Lavarak power station, 45 percent progress.

Installation of the Kalan power station generator, 75 percent progress.

Project for the Irrigation of Dasht-e Qazvin

The goal of this plan is to provide the necessary water for the region of Dasht-e Qazvin, including that required for agriculture, industry, and drinking. During this year, the activities in all areas of this project have continued in a remarkable manner.

Project for the Irrigation Network of Varamin and Garmsar

The percentage of accomplishments at the end of winter, 1980, are as follows:

Building a diverting dyke and the first section of the Varamin irrigation network, 60 percent.

The main building of the Varamin network, 51 percent.

Section three of the Varamin irrigation network, nine percent.

Building the Tehran-Varamin canal, 75 percent.

Digging operational wells, 75 percent.

Building the diverting dyke and irrigation network of Garmsar, 65 percent.

Project for Studying the Building of the Saveh Dam

The goals of this study project are to irrigate, build dams and water resources for the Saveh region, to make use of surface and underground waters, to build dams on the Forqan and Mazlaqan rivers in order to collect the flood waters, and to prepare an irrigation project which would benefit agriculture, in addition to producing electrical power up to about 10 megawatts.

The studies for the first and second stages have been completed and from 21 Mar 80-20 Mar 81, the consulting engineers were selected and the necessary contracts have been signed and exchanged.

Poject to Study the Reservoir Dam of Taleqan and the Long-Term Plan for Tehran Water

Excavation and exploratory operations restarted from 22 May 80 and on 8 Mar 81 became temporarily operational.

Mapping and sample taking operations have continued in the course of the past year.

The Project to Build the Sewage System for the City of Tehran

Restudying the project for the network and the sewage treatment facilities of Zargandeh and Qeytariyeh by consulting engineers.

Preparations for the project to create the network and the sewage treatment center of Gisha as well as the sewage pipelines of Shahrara and emptying the water works wells with two muck vacuuming tankers.

The continuation of the covered Yakhchiabad canal to a length of 840 meters.

Mapping the bed of Firuzabad River and 43 side streets of Gisha region and the mapping for the project of Qeytariyeh and Gisha streets.

REPORTER IN TEHRAN LOOKS AT EVIN PRISON, EXECUTIONS

Helsinki HUFVUDSTADSBLADET in Swedish 18 Oct 81 p 6

> [Text] A few dozen kilomerers south of Tehran lies the enormous cemetery of Behesht Zahre. In the cemetery of the martyrs are all thos who died as heroes of the Islamic republic. There are the tombstones of Aytollah Taleghani and Ayatollah Beheshti, President Raja'i, Prime Minister Bahonar and Commander-in-chief Fallahi.

But only a few hundred meters away is a place no true Islamic revolutionary will visit. There "the condemned" have been thrown into their mass graves. They are young people of the leftist-Muslim Mojahedin organization who after their executions rapidly have been brought to Behesht Zahre. The few tombstones which were erected by relatives have been crushed by the revolutionary guard.

The Mojahedin youths do, however, profess themselves to Islam and have, therefore, earlier barely been allowed burial at Behesht Zahre. Executed marxists have been thrown into mass graves in secret places. According to reliable sources, executed Mojahedin adherents are no longer brought to Behesht Zahre, and the parents are no longer told where their children are buried.

At Behesht Zahre hardly anyone condescends to glance at the littered cemetery of the Mojahedin youths. The tombstones have been crushed to pebbles, which have been scattered over the whole area. Parents naturally do not know exactly where their children are buried, and those who visit are harassed by young revolutionary guards.

Before President Abolhassan Bani-Sadr fled to France, the Mojahedin was not officially prohibited, and it even happened that members were buried in the cemetery of the martyrs. But the stones have now been removed and so have probably also the bodies.

Relatives Wait

Practically all executions in Tehran take place at Evin prison. Outside, people gather every day to gain some information, if possible, about their relatives. But information is only given when the execution has already taken place.

"It has also become usual to allow the condemned to call his relatives a short moment before the execution to tell them that he or she is about to be shot," says a well informed source.

At best, the relatives are also told where the body will be brought. The return of bodies is now a rarity. The bodies are instead transported in trucks and in buses with the curtains drawn to the secret burial places.

Bill for the Execution

After a while it often happens that the relatives receive a bill for the ammunition used at the execution. It can involve unreasonable amounts of up to the equivalent of 4,000 Finnish marks. Parents can also be requested to pay for their children's stay at Evin prison.

Information about what happens inside the walls of Evin prison is scarce. The few people who are released will, from fear of reprisals, not talk about their experiences. It is, however, commonly known in Tehran that torture occurs.

Evin prison is now completely overcrowded, even the washrooms are used as cells.

The officials do not try to cover up that youngsters are executed. The religious head of Evin prison has said that he himself has condemned 14-year-olds to death.

"But generally we do not execute children," Chief Public Prosecutor Musavi Arbedili recently explained.

"Instead we have them classified as insane," he said.

No Iranian boy or girl over 16 years of age can, however, criticize the regime without risking execution. They are considered adults and fully capable to answer for their own actions.

But not even executed members of the leftist-Muslim Mojahedin will in the future be buried in sanctified earth. They will probably be thrown into a mass grave which their parents will never be able to find.

ECONOMIC DISASTER LOOMS CLOSER

London IRAN PRESS SERVICE in English No 45, 5 Nov 81 pp 9-10

[Text] Signs that Iranians face a winter of discontent, with drastic fuel and food shortages, became clearer this week.

Oil sources said there were signs Iran was struggling to keep its oil exports up to between 300,000 and 400,000 barrels a day following the damage inflicted by Iraqi bombing raids on the Gurreh station which pumps the crude across to the country's main terminal at Kharg island.

And a government announcement over Tehran radio on Tuesday morning ordered that the capital's petrol stations should suspend all sales. A government spokesman tried to explain this by saying that other Central province towns had had their ration of petrol increased, so Tehran's deliveries were late coming in.

Both Iran's two main meat suppliers, new Zealand and Australia, are no longer delivering following non-payment of outstanding bills. New Zealand is owed, it is claimed, $30 million. Last year New Zealand supplied 30,000 tons of lamb worth 70 million NZ dollars. Tehran has begun talks with Turkey to increase lamb imports from there, meanwhile hinting that the shortage is due to butchers selling more than the ration to some customers, leaving none for some cardholders.

The Italian firm of Condotte d'Acqua is also said to have withdrawn from the Bandar Abbas port development project, for which agreement on resumption of work was finalised not long ago. Sources say Iran has not come up with the $30 million it was due to pay the Italian company.

The Japanese Mitsui group have already warned that their withdrawal from the 3.6 million joint venture petro-chemicals project at Bandar Shahpur was also imminent if Iran did not put up additional cash. Sources say the decision has now been made. Economic sources say that this could only mean that Japanese experts and officials agreed the project could not be saved.

Problems over currency transfers are also believed behind the decision of the Spanish airline Iberia to halt its flights to Tehran, and Lufthansa to reduce its service to a single flight weekly. Air France cut off its own flights in August.

Even when Iran was exporting 500,000 barrels of oil a day in September the income from it was only around $550 million a month, sufficient to cover only about 40 percent of the officially estimated monthly import bill of $1.3 billion.

Economic sources calculate that Iran's foreign exchange reserves are now below the $3 billion level--some say they are no more than $2 billion already. This would mean Iran has imports coverage for only two months more.

Shortages of foodstuffs are already leading to long queues at shops in the cities of Iran. In spite of widespread claims of bumper rice and wheat harvests rice is hardly to be found in the shops and bread prices have soared. In Tehran the popular lavash bread now costs 20 rials, compared to 5 rials not long ago. When it can be found, rice costs 360 rials a kilo (nearly five dollars at the official rate of exchange).

People contacted by phone also reported they were paying 120 rials for a single egg. There were long waits for chicken available at very high prices, too.

The Ministry of Agriculture said this week that the bumper wheat crop meant Iran would buy 1.4 million tons less from abroad during the current year. It also announced that private enterprise was being called in to help unload ships which have been waiting for up to 50 days to get into Bandar Abbas. This would save extra payment for waiting time, and help to speed up distribution. Until now all the signs had suggested the regime planned to nationalise all its trucking firms.

Government spokesman Behzad Nabavi tried to explain the rice shortage in a recent interview with the Ettelaat daily in Tehran. He said this was the first time the government had bought rice and "money reached the centres slowly so that buying slowed down." They hoped to overcome that problem soon.

"Our other problem was that as soon as we announced that we planned to buy rice and cut the flow of rice from the Caspian provinces (where it is grown) those who had rice left over from last year immediately hoarded it away," Nabavi said. "These ungodly people, whom Mr Rafsanjani calls economic terrorists, immediately raised the price of their rice and since the government had not made any rice available on the market they were able to sell the rice at an exorbitant price."

Rice rationing, Nabavi explained, meant that each province had a share, not each individual, and so each province was responsible for distributing its own share to cooperatives and small shopkeepers.

Nabavi said the government was controlling the distribution and sale of rice for the public good and promised the best quality rice would soon be available at 210 rials a kilo. The government would also pay higher prices for lower grade rice to encourage more planting of the lower quality product since there was only limited land available for the first grade crop. He also contended that by the time rice reached the shops in Iran under the old system 200 people had had a cut out of it and 20 million tomans worth of profit were made.

NEW SPLIT IN KURDISH RANKS

London IRAN PRESS SERVICE in English No 45, 5 Nov 81 pp 10-11

[Text] The dictatorial, strongly communistic line of Kurdish Democratic Party of Iran leader Abdolrahman Ghassemloo has led to a split in his party ranks, according to Kurdish sources in Paris.

Ghassemloo's decision to embrace the cause of former president Bani-Sadr and Mojahedin-e-Khalq leader Massoud Rajavi and to join their National Resistance Council has brought protests that Bani-Sadr was the man who launched the war against the Kurds when president and commander-in-chief of the armed forces.

Following the disclosure of Ghassemloo's pledge to Bani-Sadr, a number of leading figures in the party have resigned and formed their own breakaway party under the same name.

The dissident group wants the party to play more national a role and they accuse Ghassemloo of deliberately limiting his activities to Kurdistan when there should be wider concern for the national situation. They also accuse him of pursuing a strict communist line, along with treating his opponents with brutal justice similar to that of Khomeini.

Pro-Ghassemloo sources in Paris were not contactable to confirm news of this split.

Meanwhile, continued heavy fighting is reported between various Kurdish forces and revolutionary guards in areas near the Turkish and Iraqi borders. Reports suggest the guards are trying to cut off arms supply routes to the Kurdish areas. Significantly, official reports from Tehran on the fighting to not mention the army, only the guards, for the first time.

Tehran claims that the guards have cleared 31 villages of "outlawed armed groups," a term usually applied to the Kurdish and other guerrillas. Boukan, Marivan, Bahen, Naghadeh, and the Mahabad areas have seen the fiercest clashes. Heavy casualties are reported on both sides from Ravansar; while in Kurdish attacks on revolutionary guards headquarters and other key points in Mahabad a number of guards were killed. Later the guards claimed to have executed four captured attackers.

Tehran radio has also accused Kurds of burning to death captured officials and guards.

FUTURE OF MULTIMILLION-DOLLAR PETROCHEMICAL COMPLEX UNCERTAIN

Tehran SOBH-E AZADEGAN in Persian 24 Oct 81 p 2

[Text] The 3.6-billion dollar Iran-Japan petrochemical complex on the Persian Gulf that has remained incomplete on account of the Iran Islamic revolution and of the war in the Persian Gulf, is now bringing relations between the countries to the danger point.

The Japanese Mitsui group, the largest Japanese investor in the complex--which is the largest Japanese commercial venture in a foreign country--has said that it is ready to withdraw within the next 10-day period.

Sources at the Japanese Ministry of Foreign Affairs stated: "The Japanese Ministry of Foreign Affairs is seriously concerned about the impact of Mitsui's withdrawal from this project on the relations between Japan and Iran, a country that for a time used to fill the major part of Japan's oil needs."

The Mitsui group says that in case Iran does not agree to provide another 652 million dollars for the completion of the project, it will withdraw from the petrochemical venture at the port of Imam Khomeyni.

A Mitsui spokesman stated to REUTER: "We cannot wait indefinitely, and it is possible that within the next 10 days we shall withdraw from the project, unless Iran should give a serious response to our proposal (which was presented last April)." Mitsui's withdrawal from the petrochemical project--which is 85 percent completed--is not a sudden shock for the Japanese. Informed sources said that many Japanese bankers and investors support Mitsui's withdrawal from the venture because of the Islamic revolution in 1979 and especially the bombing of the complex by the Iraqi air force. The last Iraqi attack on Monday, during which a bomb damaged the power lines between the two complexes, was the cause for Mitsui's issuing its final statement.

Relations between Iran and Japan are already at a low point. Last year, Japan applied economic sanctions against Iran over the issue of the U.S. hostages in Iran, and is now importing an insignificant amount of oil from Iran.

Mitsui says that if it withdraws from this project, which has the backing of both the Japanese and Iranian governments, according to the insurance act on Japanese government exports, it will request an indemnification of 870 million dollars from the Japanese Ministry of International Trade and Industry. Mitsui has invested an amount of 300 billion yen (1.3 billion dollars) and starting next month, when the due date arrives, payments on heavy interest and on the principal will begin to accumulate. The petrochemical project was started in 1971, when 5 Japanese firms, among them the Mitsui company and the Petrochemical Mitsui company--an Iran-Japan firm--formed a joint investment partnership on a fifty-fifty basis.

Construction activities have thus far cost 1.17 billion dollars. Construction work on the project, which was supposed to produce 350,000 tons of ethylene per year, did not start until 1976, and at that time, the increase in the price of oil resulted in a large-scale rise of expenses.

In 1978 Takeo Fukuda, the then prime minister of Japan, visited Tehran to strengthen the already close relations between Japan and Iran and to firm up Iran's oil exports to Japan. One year later, the shah was overthrown and the government of Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeyni inherited the half-finished complex. The chaos that occurred as a result of the Islamic revolution stopped all construction work at the Imam Khomeyni port, and with the exception of a short period in the middle of 1980, construction activities did not take off again.

Last September, the first Iraqi air attack caused damages amounting to 800 million dollars to the petrochemical complex. Mitsui says that Japanese workers will not get back to their jobs as long as the war continues.

Iranian authorities say that perhaps they will have recourse to East European countries to complete the project. Although Mitsui says that the Japanese government, which is a financial backer of the project, respects Mitsui's decision to withdraw from it, informed sources state that Mitsui's request for indemnification on loss of exports may meet with difficulties. They add that it is possible that Mitsui may be faced with a court claim by Iran in the event Iran takes legal action against Mitsui for non-fulfillment of its obligations in accordance with a 30-year agreement.

While Mitsui is talking about withdrawing from the venture at the port of Imam Khomeyni, another large Japanese company, Mitsubishi, together with the Dow Chemical firm and Saudi Arabia are investing capital in the construction of a huge petrochemical complex at Al-Jabil. Analysts say that this plan is important, because within the last 10 years, Saudi Arabia has replaced Iran as the largest provider of oil to Japan.

SKIRMISHES BETWEEN IRANIAN PILGRIMS, SAUDI POLICE REPORTED

Anti-Zionist March in Mecca

Tehran ETTELA'AT in Persian 5 Oct 81 p 15

[Text] Mecca, PARS NEWS AGENCY. Yesterday, at 4 pm at the invitation of the responsible officials and the pilgrims to the House of God a magnificent march took place from the great square of "Mo'abedeh" in the city of Mecca to the House of God. In it nearly one million Muslims from around the world participated, and the length of the lines of march reached several kilometers.

According to this report the self-sacrificers of the Islamic revolution were riding bicycles in front of the demonstrators. They carried flags of the Islamic Republic of Iran, placards in Arabic and pictures of Imam Khomeyni. In this march, the Muslims of the countries of Kuwait, Pakistan, Indonesia, Turkey and several African countries were present. They played an active role in the matter of keeping discipline and encouraging the people situated at the sides of the street and watching the magnificent march. According to the report, a group of Muslims from Kuwait shouted slogans in Arabic to the following effect:

"Military aggression against Kuwaiti soil was accomplished by America and its lackeys, not by Iran." In the same way, the slogans repeated in Arabic during these demonstrations were as follows: "America is the enemy of the Muslims," "Death to Israel," "God is great."

This march continued until 7 pm Mecca time yesterday. It was stopped several times by police and security agents of the Saudi regime, who were stationed at various places in the streets. But the unanimous roaring of the Muslims of the world prevented the stopping of this tremendous movement and the marchers continued their demonstrations.

The Death of an Iranian Pilgrim

Mecca. While driving in one of the crowded streets of Mecca a Saudi officer struck an Iranian pilgrim named Qebleh-'Ali Hatemi, who died after being taken to the hospital. According to the report, the Saudi government, which has repeatedly criticized Iranian pilgrims in the news media and accused them of disorderliness and failure to observe the law, has itself ignored this matter and until now has not taken any steps to detain the accused.

Financial Aid

Mecca. The Organization for the Hajj and Pilgrimage situated in Mecca has announced: Those pilgrims who have recently had their money stolen or who have lost it will be paid the sum necessary for the purchase of a sheep for sacrifice.

Interview with the Minister of Guidance

Mecca. Yesterday morning after entering Mecca, in an interview with the PARS NEWS AGENCY, Mr Ma'adikhah, the minister of Islamic guidance, announced the viewpoints of the government of the Islamic Republic of Iran concerning the problems and difficulties of the Iranian pilgrims and the restraints brought into existence for them by the Saudi government.

Concerning the political positions of the government of the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia, he said: Certainly the political positions of the government of Arabia do not coincide with those of the government of the Islamic Republic of Iran, but the decision in this respect is related to the Foreign Ministry.

Concerning the behavior of the government officials of the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia with the Iranian pilgrims, he said: Of course this kind of behavior cannot be unaffected by Arabia's political positions. Naturally Arabia's behavior with the Iranian pilgrims does not follow a desirable or ideal form. But it must be said that they are imposing restraints more than the amount that we had thought, and this problem is in need of profound study. He continued: The Arabian officials imagine that since the key to the Sacred House of God is in their hands, all Muslims must imitate them, but this is an undue expectation. However, if we should want to come to the Hijaz in other than the season of the hajj, then we must follow international regulations. But the question of the hajj does not fit into these sterile international regulations; and the Kaaba, according to the clear text of the Koran, belongs to all Muslims, even if the worst relationships prevail between us and Arabia.

In another part of the interview Hojjatoleslam Ma'adikhah said: Amir Nayif and other Arab officials emphasize that the hajj is a place solely for humility and worship, and only this idea is taken into account by them. Of course, with respect and while accepting the question of worship in every instance, it is still not necessary for all Muslims to think like them. We consider the holiness of the hajj a volcano against world-wide arrogance and a death to America and Israel. We believe that were a reasonable hajj to take place on the part of the Muslims, Israel would no longer remain; and were the Muslims to perform the pilgrimage in a manner which would satisfy the Prophet, this shameful stain of the occupation of dear Jerusalem would be cleansed from the Muslims' robes.

In another part of his words he said: On the basis of the way of thinking which rules Arabia, if a single "Death to Israel" should be said out loud, they intervene. In many cases it has been observed that they have insulted and arrested an Iranian pilgrim for possessing a few coins on the back of which is the picture of Jerusalem. I am sorry that the Arab officials do not encounter cases realistically and that they want everyone to think like them. Of course, since according to the Koranic verse the hajj is not the place of dispute and conflict, this problem must be solved after the rites of the hajj.

At the end the minister of Islamic guidance hoped that the Muslims would be wary of becoming the puppets of imperialism and make the most of these ceremonies.

The Surrounding of the House of the Kaaba

Mecca. Last night, as a result of the mourning ceremonies of the Iranian pilgrims to the House of God in the courtyard of the Kaaba, which led to their being joined by one-third of the pilgrims from other countries, the agents of the special police of the Sausi kingdom surrounded the house of the Kaaba.

According to the report of the PARS NEWS AGENCY, in spite of a divine custom that the pilgrims enter the house of the Kaaba without shoes and barefoot, the government agents of the Sausi kingdom established themselves within the courtyard of God's House wearing boots, helmets and masks in order to prevent the mourning ceremonies of the Iranian pilgrims in this sacred place.

According to his same report, by reason of the great coming and going and the crowding of Iranian and foreign pilgrims, the general headquarters of the Imam's representatives was also put under the control of the agents of the security police. Yesterday the agents of the Saudi kingdom rented a room in the general headquarters for the sake of this task and moved into it.

The transport of the great load of Iranian and foreign pilgrims to the House of God is the responsibility of buses which were rented by the Iranian government at great expense and which take all the pilgrims from place to place free of charge.

At the outset it was agreed that in exchange for free service the government of the Islamic Republic of Iran would display the flag of Iran and the picture of the Imam on the buses; and to ease the activities of the pilgrims, Iranian assistants would be employed to help the drivers. But it did not take long before the government of the Arabian kingdom could no longer tolerate the display of the flag of the Iranian government, so it ordered that the flags of Iran be removed from the buses. In this connection three Iranian assistants were arrested and imprisoned.

According to another report, on Friday the imams of the mosques of Mecca and Medina counseled the Muslims in their sermons to refrain from making use of the ceremonies of the hajj for worldly and political ends. While asking the pilgrims to perform the hajj like the Prophet, they asked them to be aware and to avoid performing acts which would invalidate the pilgrimage. The imams of the mosques, who are appointed by the Saudi kingdom, claimed in addressing the pilgrims that paying attention to political and worldly affairs and mixing religious slogans with political matters are actions which strike a blow at the good name of the Islamic community in its most sacred land and cause this divinely instituted duty to deviate from its proper course. As a result, Muslims would return to their homelands carrying a burden of sin. The Friday imam of the Mosque of the Prophet also said to the pilgrims: Pay attention only to the works which Abraham accomplished during the pilgrimage. He also advised the pilgrims not to distribute political announcements.

Letter of Protest to Interior Minister

Tehran ETTELA'AT in Persian 5 Oct 81 p 15

[Text] Glorious Mecca. According to the report of the reporter of the PARS NEWS AGENCY sent to Glorious Mecca, after entering Mecca Hojjatoleslam Ma'adikhah, the minister of Islamic guidance, issued an announcement in answer to the declarations of the Minister of the Interior of Saudi Arabia. The complete text of the announcement is as follows:

In His name -- exalted is He!

His honor Amir Nayif ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz Al-Sa'ud, president of the Supreme Council of the Hajj and interior minister of Saudi Arabia!

Pursuant to announcements of the Ministry of the Interior in which were observed certain subject matters:

As the minister of Islamic guidance and the president of the Supreme Council of the Hajj of the Islamic Republic of Iran, I have met with certain obscurities. As a result I am forced to present certain questions as follows:

Is it possible for there to be Muslims in Iran and other countries of the world who might come to conclusions concerning the hajj and the duties of the pilgrims different from your statements?

It is conceivable for a large group of Muslims to believe that the hajj also possesses, in addition to the humility and worship in the sense that you have taken into account, important social aspects -- just as can be deduced from such blessed verses as "God has appointed the Kaaba, the Sacred House, as an uprising for men"?

Do you not think that great numbers of Muslims, with inspiration from Koranic verses and the Sunnah of the Prophet, might consider, along with the slogan "God is greatest," the cries "Death to Israel," "Death to Israel-nourishing America" and "Death to the anti-Islamic superpowers" their religious duty and God-given responsibility in the hajj? And that the rites of the hajj, from the "sacred robe" to "throwing the pebbles" and other acts might remind them of their duties, which are precisely the rejection of the followers of Satan? In your view is it correct for Muslims who like yourself do not think about the hajj to be forced to put aside all of their beliefs without any objections and to abandon their religious duties? But Noble Mecca belongs to all Muslims and is not the fief of a special group, just as the Lord of the world's inhabitants declares: "[The Holy Mosque that We have appointed equal unto men,] alike him who dwells therein and the nomad."

Mr Amir Nayif! You have accused the revolutionary Muslim nation of Iran in your declaration. It is necessary for me to emphasize once again that during this year's hajj the most difficult constraints were placed by your officials upon this nation which carries on its shoulders in front of all Islamic movements the flag of the struggle with unbelief and world-wide arrogance and which has become surrounded by the plots of East and West. But in order to perform the divinely-instituted duty, all of these constraints have been borne, to the extent that, right now, according to the statements of the responsible officials of the hajj, a number of brothers are in prison on various pretexts. Some of them have suffered losses for the crime of carrying a few one-rial coins upon which is impressed the picture of dear Jerusalem, and some of them have been deprived of performing their religious duty, the hajj. Mr Amir Nayif! The revolutionary Muslims of Iran, like all the revolutionary Muslims of the world, consider shouting against the pillaging arrogant ones one of the greatest acts of worship. They consider the hajj, at the same time that it is an act of worship, the basis for struggle with unbelief, idolatry and injustice; and they do not think that this struggle contradicts humility. It will not be possible to struggle against their beliefs with force forever.

At this point I do not mean to deal with this problem any further, since we are in the atmosphere of the hajj, and "There is no disputing during the hajj." With the above allusions I felt that it was my duty at least to defend the nation of Iran. In conclusion I propose that the government of Saudi Arabia allow the viewpoints of the Ministry of Islamic Guidance concerning the hajj, along with detailed arguments, to be presented in the publications and the radio and television of your country.

The government of the Islamic Republic of Iran is also willing to publish your viewpoints concerning the hajj and its publications and its radio-television without cutting even a single word.

In the same way we are prepared to sit with you in free discussion in this area, at any time you consider proper, so that the public opinions of the Muslims of the world may find the opportunity to judge us impartially.

PURGES, EXECUTIONS IN ARMY DISCUSSED

NC291510 (Clandestine) Voice of Iran in Persian 1805 GMT 28 Oct 81

[Text] Several more patriots have been executed and many other military personnel have been thrown into the regime's dungeons. Sheykh Reyshahri has once again uncovered a wave of dismissals and purges in the Iranian armed forces. Sheykh Reyshahri has said that purges have started and that the dossiers of hundreds of military personnel are being studied by the "Islamic military courts."

This is neither the first nor the last blow being inflicted on the already disintegrated Iranian armed forces. In the turbulent days when the propagandists of the Islamic Republic had started the sinister slogan of "an army so impotent" they were actually revealing their filthy intentions to destroy the indivisible Iranian army. In the days of terror when the most outstanding commanders and soldiers of the Iranian armed forces were executed [words indistinct] (?in Tehran), the enemies of Iran were uncovering their treacherous plan to destroy the powerful Iranian army. In the flaming days of (?July) 1980, when patriotic officers, NCO's and other military personnel were being executed or thrown into Khomeyni's dungeons on charges of attempting a coup, the enemies of Iran were showing signs of their hostility against the zealous Iranian army. Throughout the entire period when personnel of the armed forces which was against the regime of mullahs and reactionaries and when (?heroes) of Iran and (?descendants) of Kaveh the ironmonger [a hero in Persian mythology] were being hunted down and hundreds were being dismissed and "purged," the only objective was to destroy the main weapon in the hands of the Iranian people and the manifestation of national dignity and the guardians of Iran's sovereignty and independence. In doing so, each and every one of the persons reared by Khomeyni and his masters (?played his part) in a great treason. From the satanic imam to the slain Beheshti, from Ebrahim Yazdi to Bani-Sadr, and all the toadie who played or are playing a role in destroying Iran, each inflicted a blow on the power of the Iranian armed forces so that they could weaken it as much as possible and so that the most determining factor for the salvation of the enslaved homeland would be finally removed.

Now the treacherous regime wants to (?clandestinely) put an end to the war with Iraq. It no longer needs the armed forces. Therefore, it is better to immediately start breaking the remaining links in the strong chain of the armed forces in order to prevent it from rising to destroy the domestic enemies once (?it has peace of mind) from the foreign enemy. So, it is better to recommence, as soon as possible, the play of purges, to execute, imprison and dismiss. But how long can this (?wretched) play continue? Can many thousands of officers, NCO's and other personnel of the armed forces be purged and dismissed? Can the dismissal of (?groups and groups) force the thousands of military personnel to obey, stay quiet and calm? What an empty thought!

Even if the regime finds new excuses each day to implement its treacherous plans and to "purge" hundreds of army personnel each day, the Iranian armed forces will still continue to live. It will breathe until the day it stifles the traitors. The Iranian armed forces, as weak and disintegrated as it is now, continues to live and to be awake. It is supported by millions of (?Iranian patriots) and enemy-breakers--a young and alert force that is shouting "goodbye Islamic Republic!"

REPORT ON EXECUTIONS, DOMESTIC UNREST

NC291718 Paris AFP in English 1700 GMT 29 Oct 81

[Text] Tehran, 29 Oct (AFP)--A further 41 executions were announced here today, with the ISLAMIC REPUBLIC newspaper reporting 22 armed opponents of the regime and two "corruptors" executed yesterday and the revolutionary prosecutor revealing 19 other executions, but giving no dates.

The newspaper, organ of the ruling paper, said six leftist people's Mojahedin were executed in Tehran's Evin prison.

The state news agency PARS added that one man, identified as Mehdi Ta'fari, was found guilty of participating in the bombing of the Islamic Republic party headquarters last June, which left 74 dead. The remaining executions took place in various provincial towns.

The 19 were executed in the Gulf town of Busheir, at Nahavand in the western province of Hamadan, and at Ghaem Shahr, in Mazandaran Province, Iranian television reported, quoting the revolutionary prosecutor.

Violence was reported elsewhere in Iran yesterday.

An unidentified motorcyclist fired shots at the home of Iranian executive affairs minister Behzad Nabavi, then escaped through the return fire of revolutionary guards, Azadegan newspaper reported, adding that the minister was not hit.

At Qasvin, 300 km (200 miles) west of here, a clash between bodyguards of religious official Hojjat Ol-Eslam Lashekari and Mojahedin reportedly resulted in one dead and two injured.

Also the ISLAMIC REPUBLIC newspaper reported that Mojahedin fired at four school children in a store in the city of Bojnurd, killing one and injuring two.

In central Tehran a grenade was thrown at the car of a Hezbollahi (fundamentalist), while in the western city of Kermanshah a grenade explosion caused heavy damage to the home of religious official Hojjat Ol-Eslam Reza Kazemi, but no casualties, the paper reported.

BRIEFS

TEA PRODUCTION--Tehran, 28 Oct (PARS News Agency)--The production of tea rose 15 percent in this Iranian year compared to the same period last year, and an amount totalling 10 billion rials has been paid to the farmers, according to 'Ali Sa'id-lu, the head of the state-owned tea organization of the country. Sa'id-lu, who was speaking at news conference, said that in this Iranian year 32,000 hectares were under tea plantation and about 26,000 farmers are in the tea production business. Concerning the reasons for this increase, he said that wages had been increased in the tea factories, price of tea leaves increased, more chemical fertilizers were distributed, more loans were extended to farmers and there was more money given to the factory owners for equipment and expansion. In relation to the amount and distribution of the imported tea, he said that the importation of tea must be approved by the tea organization of the country according to its quality and quantity, and this organization has taken over the distribution of imported tea for supporting domestic production. Therefore, the price of tea has decreased. [Text] [GF281558 Tehran PARS in English 1525 GMT 28 Oct 81]

LABOR-INTENSIVE PROJECTS--Tehran, 28 Oct (OPECNA)--Economic independence and the basic needs of the people are stressed by the provisions of Iran's national budget for 1982-83. Mohammad Taqi Banki, minister of state in charge of the Plan and Budget Organization, told a press conference Saturday that emphasis would be placed on projects giving quicker returns and the expansion of labor-intensive industries. Governmental institutions and executive organizations would work toward filling gaps in domestic production by expanding small units more suited to the economic conditions of the country, Banki said. Banki also referred to the potential of the country's dams, saying that about 500,000 hectares had been added to land already under cultivation by the expansion of irrigation canals. OFFICIAL REBUKES BRIGHT STAR MANEUVERS

JN151609 Baghdad INA in English 1540 GMT 15 Nov 81

[Text] Baghdad, 15 Nov (INA)--A high ranking Iraqi official described U.S. military exercises, Bright Star 82, as the peak of the policy of intimidating the Arabs whether being moderates or progressives. Secretary general of the Revolution Command Council, the highest legislative body, Tariq Hamad al-'Abdallah in an article published in AL-THAWRAH daily Sunday said the U.S. is practicing the iron rod policy against the Arabs.

The U.S. military exercises fall within the framework of the semi-war policy adopted by America towards the Arab region and are merely a show of force to intimidate and frighten the Arab people, he explained.

Mr al-'Abdallah said the U.S.A. endeavours in increase [as printed] tension and accelerate the plans set for its rapid deployment force within the semi-war strategy which calls for a military build up aimed at confronting the possibility of any national uprising that might take place and disturb the balance of U.S. interests in the region.

He stressed the fact that the Middle East region saw a great deal of American explicit interference since U.S. failure in Vietnam and Southeast Asia in general. The U.S. semi-war strategy, he said, is based on three principles: consolidating of the Zionist entity in the Arab region by any means, keeping the Arab region as a source for cheap energy and to drag the region into the U.S. sphere as part of the process of undermining the non-aligned principles and breaching national sovereignty, he added.

Any attempt to include an Arab party into the big powers rivalry to side with any of them means a call for the other power to interfere, thus the international situation will be more deteriorated and trends of dependency are created in the Arab region, Mr al-'Abdallah said.

Detailing further aims behind the U.S. exercises, he said the U.S. wanted to imply to the Arabs that Israel's security is a part of America's national security... it is unacceptable to oppose the Camp David accords..Arabs have to stand idle vis-a-vis the Iraq-Iran war.

The U.S. wants to say to the Arabs, he added, increase your oil production; but not the prices...nourish us so that we may send you our jets, armies and fleets as quick as possible to defend you against a don quixote fear.

BACKGROUND OF CABINET MINISTERS DISCUSSED

Tel Aviv MA'ARIV in Hebrew 6 Aug 81 pp 18-19

Menahem Begin -- Prime Minister

[Article by Ilan Kefir]

[Text] For 29 years Menahem Begin would deliver the second speech on the day of the presentation of the new cabinet--the speech of the opposition. Yesterday for the second time in his life, Begin delivered the opening address. He presented to the Knesset his new Cabinet which he had formed after 21 days of exhausting coalition negotiations which left more than a little bitterness.

Menahem Begin, 68, reached this moment after an enervating, extremely bitter, and stubbornly-fought election campaign. His election victory was a personal achievement. The Likud's election battle was first and foremost a one-man campaign by a man who stood virtually alone in the glare of the spotlights. Western diplomats who observed him in the election campaign described him as the best competitor today in any political arena in the free world.

Begin's main accomplishment in the election campaign was his success in convincing many that the "bunglings" of his outgoing Cabinet were a non-recurring, transitory phenomenon and that the galloping inflation is also a temporary phenomenon with which his next Cabinet will be able to cope successfully.

Yesterday he stood on the dais of the Knesset as the leader of the 48-member ruling party and a coalition government dependent upon a majority of one member of Knesset. The Menahem Begin of yesterday was different than the man who announced about one-half year ago the advancement of the election as an honorable way out designed to prevent his going to the president. At that time the achievement of the signing of the peace agreement with Egypt was swallowed up by 150 percent inflation and the shattered relations between Cabinet ministers.

From an almost hopeless situation when many were predicting the end of the political road for him and at a time when the members of his party were behaving as if their ship were sinking, Begin succeeded in reviving and breathing new fighting spirit into his camp.

His personal biography is replete with struggles, hardships, a war for political existence, more than a few disappointments, and anguish. For 29 years during which he was defeated in eight election campaigns, Menahem Begin displayed remarkable survivability.

He was born in Brisk to a Zionist family. His father, Ze'ev, was the secretary of the community in the city. In his childhood he was a member of Hashomer Hatza'ir, however this was a passing episode and he joined Betar. In his twenties he completed law school at Warsaw University.

At 18 he began Zionist activity and was selected as a Betar representative in Poland. Seven years later he was appointed the representative of the movement in Poland after having served as the Betar representative in Czechoslovakia.

With the Nazi conquest of Poland he fled from Warsaw to Vilna. Most of his family who remained in Poland were killed in the Holocaust.

In September 1940 he was arrested by the Soviet authorities for Zionist activity and sentenced to 8 years imprisonment at hard labor. He described the period of his incarceration and exile which lasted more than a year in his book "Lailot Levanim" [White Nights].

In 1942 he immigrated to the Land of Israel as a volunteer in the army of the Polish General Anders. A year later he took command of the Irgun Tzvai Leumi, and in 1944 he announced a revolt against Britain. During the entire period of the struggle against the British, which lasted 4 years, Begin was sought by the British who put a price of 5,000 pounds sterling on his head.

After the establishment of the state, Begin founded the Herut Movement against the background of a troubled relationship with the ruling party, Mapai, and its leader, Ben-Gurion, because of [Operation] Season and the Altalena affair.

Ben-Gurion coined the expression "without Herut and Maqi [acronym for the Israeli Communist Party]", but the taboo was broken when Begin joined the government of national unity headed by Levi Eshkol on the eve of the Six-Day War.

In 1977 the upheaval occurred which brought Begin to the seat of leadership. Last month Begin succeeded in keeping the seat.

Ariel Sharon--Minister of Defense

[Article by Ya'aqov Erez]

[Text] This morning when Ariel Sharon, 53, reviews the IDF honor guard, composed of representatives of the arms and services, in the Ministry of Defense square, it will be for him not only a moment of the realization of aspirations but also a novelty in a long road of military and security activity which he set out upon when he enlisted in the army in the War of Independence and became a commander who made a deep impression on the IDF combat tactics.

Sharon's record is marked by milestones which influenced not only the units which he commanded but also the entire IDF. From the time when he was the commander of Unit 101 and later a paratroopers unit, Sharon distinguished himself with the originality of his military thinking, his combat tactics, and the manner in which he led his forces. Among his milestones are wars and periods of confrontation. In the Six-Day War he was a division commander and launched a daring strike in the Egyptians' rear at Umm Qatf. When he was commanding general of the Southern Command during the War of Attrition, the Gaza Strip was cleaned out of terrorists and attacks were carried out against the Egyptian side of the Canal. In the Yom Kippur War when he was a major general in the reserves, he commanded the division which was the first to cross the Canal and caused the turning point in the war.

Arik Sharon is considered an outstanding field commander, a combat tactician, one who knows how to achieve his objectives by the concentration of effort and the application of the principle of surprise. These qualities have helped him on more than one occasion in his military career. However, in public life he has not always been successful in applying his military doctrines.

Prior to the previous election Sharon headed the Shlomzion list which won only two seats in the Knesset. Afterwards he joined the Likud and was appointed the minister of agriculture where he concentrated his maximum effort in Judea and Samaria. He established there an extensive system of settlements, however, he angered many farmers who criticized his method of operating as minister of agriculture.

In the Ministry of Defense Sharon is treading on firm ground. Here he will be aided by his military knowledge and experience in defense matters, which are far greater than that of any other minister in Menahem Begin's Cabinet. In his new position he is faced with difficult tasks. On the one hand, completing the evacuation of the Sinai, including the settlements of Pithat Rafish, and on the other hand, the terrorist threats in the north, the Syrian intervention in Lebanon, and the possibility that the eastern front will be reestablished. On the one hand, his past promises to bring about changes in the IDF without hurting its military strength. The essentials of Arik Sharon's policy are still unknown. Today in his meetings with the senior cadre of the civilian system and the general staff, he will present the tasks toward which he wants to move the defense system as the eighth minister who has headed it.

Yoram Aridor--Minister of Finance

[Article by Shraga Maqel]

[Text] It is difficult to compare the meteoric rise of Yoram Aridor to another case in the political arena. In a few months he went from an obscure deputy minister in the Office of the Prime Minister to the man who did more than anyone else for the rejuvenation of the Likud and its victory in the election, as the minister of finance whose policy gained the sympathy of broad sections of the public despite its being criticized by many.

Public opinion polls forecast a very gloomy future for the Likud government at the beginning of 1981. Yitzhaq Moda'i decided at that time to leave the Ministry of Communications. Prime Minister Menahem Begin gave the position to the deputy in his office who had already become accustomed to filling vacant positions. Aridor once filled no less than five portfolios: Justice, Transportation, Labor and Social Betterment, and Communications were all entrusted to him with the rise of the Likud to power until the DMC ministers joined the government. Whoever followed Aridor closely could already at that time detect his qualities in that to everyone's great surprise all five ministries were directed properly.

However, Aridor waited more than 3 years before his talents were actually discovered. Immediately upon entering the Ministry of Communications he announced the introduction of color television broadcasts, and the public opinion polls immediately began to improve from the viewpoint of the Likud. Then Minister of Finance Yigael Hurwitz left the Cabinet because of its decision to increase the salaries of the teachers, and Yoram Aridor was again called to the flag. Then the great upheaval began. Elimination of the property tax, reduction of income tax, and reduction of sales taxes on automobiles and television sets. The atmosphere among the public changed as if by a magic want the atmosphere in the state, and the closer it came to election day the more the Likud improved its position in the eyes of the voter, until the victory on 31 June.

At a relatively young age, 48, Yoram Aridor sits solidly in the position of minister of finance and conducts the coalition negotiations on behalf of the prime minister.

This success was preceded by years of activity in the Herut Movement. Aridor has a social attitude (he supports full cost-of-living increase payments and income tax relief). He headed the "Blue-White [group] in the Histadrut. He first entered the Knesset in 1969, and 10 years later he was elected chairman of the secretariat of the Herut Movement.

He calls his policy a "correct economy" and at times a "policy of the mind and the heart." Even his opponents do not deny his ability for analysis and quick thinking. He is an economist and a lawyer by education. He maintains that the policy which he adopted before the election will be continued in the future. Indeed, this policy has so far been significantly successful in reducing inflation. Economists today have differences of opinion regarding the policy. Some contend that the massive printing of money which he has used to subsidize the food commodities will take its toll and it is therefore necessary to to take sharp restraining measures. Others praise him for having brought calm to the economy, and in their opinion, more moderate measures in the area of credit and the reduction of government spending will be sufficient.

He is married and has three children.

Simha Ehrlich--Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Agriculture

[Article by Aharon Periel]

[Text] Simha Ehrlich began his agricultural career in Israel 45 years ago. At that time. when he immigrated to Israel in 1936, he worked as a farm worker in the groves of Nes Ziyyona. Today he has "closed" the circle, with a small difference: Then [text missing] of Agriculture in addition to his position as deputy prime minister.

Simha Ehrlich was born in Poland in 1915. During the course of time he established an optical business. He has held various public positions in the Liberal Party, the "heir" of the General Zionists, first on the municipal level in Tel Aviv and afterwards on the national level as party chairman, after he was elected to this post in May 1980.

During the period of 1955-1969 Ehrlich was the head of the Gahal faction in the Tel Aviv municipal council, head of the water and lighting enterprises, head of the Department of Sanitation and Control, and head of the Bureau of Municipal Companies. He also served as deputy mayor during 1961-1965.

He has been a member of Knesset since 1969, serving as a member of the Interior Committee (Seventh Knesset) and a member of the Finance Committee (Seventh and Eighth Knessets). After the Likud came to power, Ehrlich served as the finance minister in the Begin government during 1977-1979.

Ehrlich, a resident of Tel Aviv, has a son and a daughter, and his main hobbies are opera and theater.

Simha Ehrlich is known as a man "with whom one can work," who is prepared to delegate authority, and as one who seeks to work through cooperation. His intimate friends promised yesterday that he will not act impetuously even though as minister of agriculture, he wants to apply liberal ideas such as free competition and providing opportunity to free initiative. His friends assure that "everything that Mr Ehrlich does will be in cooperation and coordination with the settlement movements and the farmers' organizations."

Yitzhaq Shamir--Minister of Foreign Affairs

[Article by Ilan Kefir]

[Text] This morning Yitzhaq Shamir begins his second term as the minister of foreign affairs against the background of serious political problems:

*The deployment of the terrorists in Lebanon and their being equipped while taking advantage of the cease-fire which, according to Israel, constitutes a violation of the agreement.

*The suspension of the F-16 aircraft by the American administration.

*The autonomy negotiations and the continuation of the peace process with Egypt.

*The increasing isolation of Israel in the international community and the damage to its image in public opinion in the United States.

Shamir worked for many years in security activity in the Irgun Tzvai Leumi and the Lohamei Herut Yisrael, an organization in which he was the operations officer and responsible for special actions in Europe.

During the years of the struggle against the British foreign rule, he was arrested twice and in both cases managed to escape. The second time, in 1946, he came on a daring operation to Djibouti where he received political asylum.

After the establishment of the state, Yitzhaq Shamir was given a senior operational assignment in the Mosad which he completed in 1965.

In 1970 he joined the Herut Movement, and in 1973 he was elected to the Knesset and served on the Foreign Affairs and Defense Committee.

In 1977 he was appointed speaker of the Knesset and in March 1980, after the resignation of Mashe Dayan, he became the foreign minister.

Within the framework of his position, Minister Shamir went abroad for diplomatic talks and met with heads of state, including the leades of the American administration. Shamir was the first Israeli dignitary to meet with the President of the United States, Ronald Reagan, after his election.

He is 66, married and has three children.

Ya'aqov Meridor--Chairman of the Ministerial Committee on Economic Affairs

[Article by Shraga Maqel]

[Text] Ya'aqov Meridor, 68, will be forced to work hard during this term of the government in order to make people forget his hard "fall" in the revelation of the new way to produce energy. However, this will not be his only problem. It is still not clear how he will function as the chairman of the ministerial committee on the economy opposite Minister of Finance Yoram Aridor has had no intention of conceding any economic authority.

Ya'aqov Meridor's colorful image combines biographic details which could suffice foe several persons: underground fighter, politician, and businessman who made many millions but also lost millions.

The beginning was in Poland: studies in a heder of the Mizrahi and a Hebrew gymnasium. Meridor was 16 at the time of the 1929 pogroms. He joined Betar and immigrated to Israel in 1932. Here he became the deputy to David Raziel in the Irgun Tzvai Leumi. Together with him, in 1940 he went to Iraq on a secret mission. After Raziel was killed in the bombing of a German aircraft, Meridor became the leader of the Irgun Tzvai Leumi and remained in that position until he turned over the command to Menahem Begin in 1942. His underground activity did not cease even when he was caught by the British and exiled to Africa. He recounts his exciting deeds in the camps of Sudan, Eritrea, Kenya, and Ethiopia in his book "Arukah Haderekh Leherut" (The Road to Freedom Is Long).

Meriodor represented the Herut Movement, of which he was one of the founders, for about 20 years, however his activity in the Knesset did not excite him and he turned to the business world.

In the mid-fifties Meridor used his contacts in East Africa and established Incoda, a canned meat enterprise, in Eritrea for the purpose of selling his product in Israel, however the business failed, and the government had to acquire it in order to save it.

After his venture into fishing in the Red Sea failed, in the early sixties Meridor, together with his friend Captain Mila Brenner, established the Fruit Shipping Company. In less than 10 years this company became an amazing international success story when without significant venture capital and without real experience, it controlled a giant fleet and business estimated at almost a billion dollars. However, the success story was disrupted after the Yom Kippur War and the subsequent world oil crisis which damaged the shipping world. After months of litigation and effort to stay afloat, Meridor and Brenner were forced to sell the fleet at a loss in order to pay off the company's debts.

His close friends describe him as uneducated but imaginative, a man with personal charisma who abounds in great ideas but is not always careful about all the minor details.

One of his daughters is married to the businessman and former member of Knesset Yosef Kremerman, and the other, Miqa, is married to singer Yigael Bashan.

Back in 1977 Menahem Begin had requested Meridor to return to political activity and to "run" together with him, but Meridor refused. In 1981 Begin again asked the man whom he refers to as "my commander and friend," and this time Meridor acceded to his request.

Hayim Corfu--Minister of Transport

[Article by Shraga Maqel]

[Text] Hayim Corfu put in 4 years of work as chairman of the coalition leadership in the Ninth Knesset. Confronted with a diminishing coalition majority, splits, and rebellions of factions, he endeavored to assure victories in the votes.

Corfu is used to supporting his leader, Menahem Begin, in that for the 20 years that he headed a branch of the Herut Movement in Jerusalem, he backed him in all the political storms which plagued the Movement. Begin did not remain obligated. When Jayim Landau finally informed him that he did not want to continue as minister of transport, Begin decided to give the position to Corfu.

Corfu, a sixth generation sabra, was a yeshiva student in his youth. It was only later that he "fell into bad ways." He left the yeshiva, completed law school at Hebrew Unitersity, and even played soccer for Betar in Jerusalem and Netanya.

During the underground days, Hayim Corfu was a member of the Irgun Tzvai Leumi headquarters in Jerusalem from 1943, and he served as an expert in minelaying. In 1944 he was arrested by the British and remained in prison until 1948 in Latrun and 'Akko and later in Sudan, Kenya, and Eritrea (from where he escaped but was recaptured). Together with Meridor and Tzipori, Corfu completes the trio of "Kenya exile" ministers in the new government.

With the establishment of the Herut Movement in 1948, Corfu worked in the Jerusalem branch which he headed until 1977 when he was chosen to be the chairman of the coalition leadership. In this Knesset he was also a member of the Foreign Affairs and Defense Committee. In the two previous Knessets Corfu was a member of the Finance Committee.

As the minister of transport Hayim Corfu, 60, married and the father of two daughters, considers himself as having several major goals: renewal of the campaign against traffic accidents which are claiming victims day and night; improvement of public contact with the Bureaus of Licensing and Public Transport; and in the longer range, preparation for the development of airports and seaports.

His first battle in his new position is already "assured": El Al flights on the Sabbath. There was no avoiding the forcing of the suspension of the flights--Hayim Corfu will act in accordance with the decision. Nonetheless, he believes that El Al is in good hands; and if it continues in the way it began, it can even achieve a condition of profitability.

Mordekhai Tzipori--Minister of Communications

[Article by Ya'aqov Erez]

[Text] In his farewell remarks to the senior personnel of the Ministry of Defense, Mordekhai Tzipori mentioned two achievements which he considers to be supremely important: broadening the authorities of the civilian control system and increasing defense production and export. Tzipori devoted a special effort to these two areas in his 4 years as deputy minister of defense.

Mordekhai Tzipori is a firm believer in the selected echelon's control of the defense system, and he especially emphasizes the subordination of the military level to those of the civilian sector who are placed in charge of it. The deputy minister who "moved up a grade" and has now been appointed the minister of communications will try to apply these principles also in his new position.

He does not shrink from working in an inferior position. There is no doubt that for him, serving as a minister in the government of Menahem Begin--even as minister of communications, a post which he was not looking for--is the realization of a dream. Even if he is not the most fortunate of all the appointees in the government, he managed to keep himself in the line.

He wants to be involved with defense matters also in the future. He has been promised that in a few months the Ministry of Police will be reestablished and that he will be appointed the minister of police. In this position, Tzipori, 57, intends to make full use of the considerable experience which he has acquired in 43 years of defense service. He wants to continue as a member of the Ministerial Committee on Defense. Matters in this spirit have already been concluded with the prime minister. In the ministerial committee, he will seek to exert an influence--so he promised in his farewell remarks to the senior personnel in the Ministry of Defense--on the substantive matters that come up there for discussion.

A veteran of the Irgun Tzvai Leumi who because of his underground activity was arrested twice and exiled to Sudan, Eritrea, and Kenya, he began his career in the IDF in the Artillery, in a heavy mortar unit. He later served in the Infantry and at the end of the Kadesh campaign, he transferred to the Armor. In the Six-Day War he served as commander of the armored brigade in Major General Sharon's division. Afterwards, he was the commander of the Armor School, the executive officer of the Armored Corps, Commander of the Command and Staff College, and Assistant to the Chief of the Operations Branch. After his separation from the IDF, he joined the Herut Movement, and with the upheaval in June 1977, he returned to the defense system.

Yitzhaq Moda'i--Minister Without Portfolio

[Article by Oded Shorer]

[Text] Yitzhaq Moda'i, 55, who directed the oil exploration branch as his private domain and organized a revolution on the map of the government companies subordinate to the Ministry of Energy, left the ministry this week claiming that this position is not appropriate for his status in the Liberal Party. Yitzhaq Moda'i has reawakened the dispute surrounding his character--that human relations is not his forte.

The variety of opinions about him is surprising. An Israeli from a good family background, who took advantage of the "golden spoon" with which he was born, he is a member of one of the older families of Tel Aviv. He has studied in Israel and abroad and has earned an abundance of degrees, including chemical engineer and a master's degree in law and economics.

His military career included, among other things, service as a military attache in London. He was released from the IDF with the rank of lieutenant colonel.

In the sixties he joined the Liberal Party and proved to be a sheep among wolves. After many struggles from which he emerged the loser, he learned his political lesson and at the last convention of the Liberals, he proved to be an outstanding political butcher who has gained many sympathizers by means of countless appointments in the government companies subordinate to his ministry.

His service as minister of energy began on the right foot with the discovery of oil in the Alma field at the end of 1977. Throughout his period of service, he saw himself as fulfilling a mission in Israel's struggle for economic independence.

As such, he went abroad on more than one occasion on ministry business, in a search for sources of oil, he signed contracts for the supply of oil, and he even involved Israel in several troublesome affairs in his attempts to find investors for oil exploration in Israel and to join in oil exploration in foreign countries.

With his support the oil exploration branch was reorganized in a more effective form, and an effort was made to attract foreign professional parties who contributed from their rich knowledge. In contrast to this, he failed in other areas which required courageous decisions to which he was certainly accustomed in his position as director general of the Revlon Cosmetics Company.

Despite the warnings of his advisors in the Ministry of Energy, Minister Moda'i viewed the transition to the generation of electricity from coal as a problem-free process and ignored the human aspects involved in unloading coal in an overburdened port. His compromise position on an issue so important to the economic independence of the State of Israel led to the government's hasty decision regarding the unloading of the coal for a power plant in Hadera at the site of the plant and to the waste of hundreds of millions of dollars of the Treasury.

Moda'i managed to convince the government of the necessity of an agreement with Egypt on the supply of oil before the return of the oil field in the Gulf of Suez to the Egyptians. Had it not been for his stubborn stand on this issue, Prime Minister Menahem Begin would have signed the peace agreement without any agreement on assuring a supply of oil for Israel.

As minister he has on more than one occasion issued confusing statements and become involved in pointless disputes with his fellow Cabinet members, after which Minister Simha Ehrlich suggested that he go for a psychiatric examination. Now his activity will be concluded in the Office of the Prime Minister as a minister without portfolio, activity which will certainly not overcrowd his daily schedule. How will the implementer adjust to a position without real content? This will become evident in the coming months.

Gideon Patt--Minister of Industry and Commerce

[Article by Yitzhaq Dayish]

[Text] During the period of his service in the outgoing government, Minister Gideon Patt was noted for his colorful language which from time to time managed to "anger" many people. For example, in reacting to a leak by a senior official, he said, "Every dog has his day."

When he was appointed minister of industry, commerce, and tourism in January 1979, the Herut people in the Likud demanded that Yoram Airdor, who was then a minister without portfolio in the Office of the Prime Minister, be appointed the deputy minister of industry, commerce, and tourism. However, Patt declared, "I have enough Yorams in the ministry" (the director general is Yoram Ziv and the deputy director general is Yoram Balizovski).

Patt is one of the young members of the Cabinet, being 48. He was born in Jerusalem, graduated from the Ma'ala School, and served in the IDF as a member of Nahal. After his separation from the IDF, he served in 1952-1953 as the secretary of the ten minister of transport, Yosef Sapir, of blessed memory, and the director of his office. Afterwards, he filled a long list of positions in the Zionist Organization of America and was also a delegate to the Zionist Congresses. He studied economics and international trade at a university in New York. When Yosef Sapir, of blessed memory, was appointed minister (1967-1969), Patt served as his assistant.

In 1970 he was elected a member of the Knesset from the Liberals in the Gahal. In the Knesset he served as a member of the Finance Committee and the Economic Committee. With the establishment of the Likud government in July 1977, he was appointed minister of construction and housing. He worked to calm the apartments market by putting apartments up for sale in the early stages of construction.

With the departure of Yigael Hurwitz from the Ministry of Industry, Commerce, and Tourism, Gideon Patt was appointed his replacement. He points to important achievements in export and industry. "Between the times," that is between the Knesset elections and the formation of the new government, he assured the approval of a major program to establish a new granary in Ashdod which would preclude the danger of a shortage of bread and food for animals in the event of a disaster. One must also cite the consumer protection law which was approved during the period of his service.

In the tourism "kingdom," despite its having lost the status of a special ministry and becoming an administration in Industry, Commerce, and Tourism, Patt was regarded one who represents it well. He worked especially for the benefit of tourism in Elat and was regarded there with special esteem. However, it is precisely from this branch of his ministry that he is now separated.

Yitzhaq Berman--Minister of Energy

[Article by Oded Shorer]

[Text] The solid and respected image of the only bachelor in the Cabinet, Minister of Energy Yitzhaq Berman, "conceals" a colorful biography full of contradictions.

Yitzhaq Berman, 68, is the son of a rabbi who was one of the leaders of the Mizrahi. He abandoned religious observances in his youth, graduated from the Mizrahi Teachers Seminary, turned to Betar and then to the Irgun Tzvai Leumi, was a member of the Intelligence Department of the Irgun, was an officer in the British intelligence service which concentrated on acts of sabotage and espionage in the Balkans during World War II, and is a successful lawyer.

With the rise of the state, he served in the IDF, and after he was released, he turned to business. For 4 years he filled various positions, including the general manager of the first automobile enterprise in Israel, Kaiser-Frazer, in Haifa.

In 1954 he opened a law office which became very prosperous. When he was selected speaker of the Knesset in March 1980, he was forced to divest himself of his share of the firm and as such lost a high annual income.

His moderate image and his relatively late entrance into political life (64) helped him maintain neutrality in the Liberal Party and so made him a natural candidate for the position of speaker of the Knesset.

After his selection as speaker of the Knesset, he aspired to raise the prestige and increase the effectiveness of the legislative body. He suggested among other things that marginal issues and proposals be moved to the agenda of the committees and not be considered in plenary sessions, that a way be found to permit the speaker of the Knesset not to participate in the voting, and that an Ethics Committee be established to consider complaints against members of the Knesset.

With the end of the Ninth Knesset, he announced that he would no longer vie for the position of speaker of the Knesset, and as such, he became the Liberal Party's candidate for a ministerial position. Because of Minister Yitzhaq Moda'i's refusal to serve as minister of energy, Yitzhaq Berman, the man who directed British intelligence operations in World War II and was not accepted for service in the Intelligence Corps of the IDF because of his Irgun Tavai Leumi past, became the minister in charge of directing the state's secret policy in the world oil market.

Avraham Sharir--Minister of Tourism

[Article by Yehoshua Kahana]

[Text] Four years after the Likud government ordered the disestablishment of the Ministry of Tourism and its attachment, as an administration, to the Ministry of Industry and Commerce, the ministry was reestablished under Minister Avraham Sharir.

Is Sharir fit to be minister of tourism? Time will tell. As of now, he can point to his closeness to the subject in that in November 1977 he demanded that the then Minister of Transport and Communications Meir 'Amit drastically reduce the air fares to Elat and Sharm ash-Shaykh in order to encourage Israeli tourism to these places. In March 1978 he worked for the construction of a casino in Elat in order to attract, according to him, wealthy tourists who would bring hundreds of millions of pounds annually into the Treasury.

The new minister who reflects in his statements private initiative and the idea of gambling as a source of income from tourism grew up in the working-class neighborhood of Morokhov, was educated in the Hanoar Haoved [Working Youth] Movement, and studied in the Tichon Hadash School, the school of many who set the tone in the Israeli leftist camp. Avraham Sharir is trying to remove the "stain": "From my early youth I was a member of the General Zionists Party, and I was attracted to its liberal ideology."

His initial activity in the party was in the early fifties when he was the secretary of the parliamentary faction while studying law at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem. His close relations with Simha Ehrlich bore fruit in 1964 when he was sent to the United States as a representative of the [Jewish] Agency's Economic Department which was then under the control of the Liberals. Upon his return to Israel after 3 years, he was appointed secretary of the Coordinating Committee of the Economic Organizations in which the Liberal Party had substantial influence.

His big moment came in 1974 when he was called back to Israel by Simha Ehrlich to serve as secretary of the Liberal Party.

The basic surface work in the Liberal Party jumped Sharir, who was a virtually anonymous activist, to fifth place in the Party's list of candidates for Ninth Knesset and to twelfth place in the Likud list.

Avraham Sharir, father of four who lives in the Neve Avivim section of north Tel Aviv, continued to consolidate his position in the Party. In the Tenth Knesset he served as chairman of the Likud faction and as a member of the Finance Committee.

Moshe Nissim--Minister of Justice

[Article by Tzvi Singer]

[Text] Minister of Justice Moshe Nissim, one of the leaders of the Liberal Party, assumed his position in the Ministry of Justice in the previous term, after a lengthy period in which he served as a minister without portfolio and worked in coordinating actions between the Cabinet and the Knesset and in handling ad hoc "burning" issues. With the resignation of the previous minister of justice, Shmuel Tamir, Nissim was appointed as his successor.

Law and justice were not strange to him. He studied law at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem, and after he was graduated as a lawyer, he opened a private office. Nissim was the youngest member of Knesset ever elected. He entered the Fourth Knesset at the age of 24.

Until the Likud came to power, Moshe Nissim was a member of the Education and Culture Committee, the Public Services Committee, the Foreign Affairs and Defense Committee, the Law, Constitution, and Justice Committee, and others.

He served as chairman of the Likud faction in the Eighth Knesset.

Nissim has published many articles on legal matters in the daily newspapers and in legal publications.

He has not served long in the Ministry of Justice, but his influence is already being felt in the ministry. One of the first tasks which he took upon himself was the continuation of his involvement in the enactment of legislation for the protection of privacy, a law which he considers to be very important.

Moshe Nissim is 46, married, and the father of three children.

Eliezer Shostak--Minister of Health

[Article by Yeshayahu Avi'am]

[Text] When the Health portfolio was offered 4 years ago to MK Eliezer Shostak, he had concerns about assuming the burden of directing a ministry at the age of 66. Today, 4 years later, he does not hesitate. In truth, he was the most certain minister in the second Begin government. Mr Shostak feels that in the first term, with the exception of several disappointments including the passing of a national health insurance law, he was successful in his position.

Eliezer Shostak, who will be 70 in 2 months, is a veteran parliamentarian. He has been a member of the Knesset since the Second Knesset when he was elected from the Herut Movement. He was defeated in the election for the First Knesset when he was on the list of the Revisionist Party.

Since then the minister of health has experienced several party crises. In 1967, together with Shmuel Tamir, he left the Herut Movement and established the Free Center. A few years later there was a split in the Free Center, and Shostak established the Independent Center which joined the Likud when the latter was formed in 1973. Afterward, together with Yigael Hurwitz, he formed the La'am Movement (this movement consisted of the Independent Center, Rafi, and people from the Greater Land of Israel). This movement also split. Today, Shostak and his friends are a group, La'am, in the Likud.

Eliezer Shostak was born in 1911 in Wladimirice, Poland. In 1929 he joined the Betar Movement. When he was given permission to immigrate to Israel in 1933, he married his girlfriend Mina. However, at the time of the Arlosoroff trial, members of Betar were denied immigration permits, and the immigration permit was not given to him until 1935.

Upon his arrival in Israel, he began to work in a Betar group in Herzliyya and later in the representation and leadership of Betar. He was one of the activists in the National Labor Federation which had just been formed and was appointed to serve as its secretary in Tel Aviv. A few years later he was appointed the general secretary of the National Labor Federation. He headed it for about 40 years, and he resigned from the position 4 years ago when he was appointed minister of health.

Zevulun Hammer--Minister of Education and Culture

[Article by Yosef Waxman]

[Text] MK Zevulun Hammer, who served in the outgoing Cabinet as the minister of education and culture, continues to work in this field which he loves and to which he devoted most of his time, energy, and ability in the outgoing Cabinet.

Zevulun Hammer is one of the youngest ministers in the new Cabinet. He was born 45 years ago in Haifa, studied at the religious high school Yavneh in his native city, and afterward was graduated from Bar Ilan University with his first degree in Judaic Studies and Education.

In his youth Zevulun Hammer was active in the Bnai Akiva Movement, and afterward he served as chairman of the Students Federation in Bar Ilan, as a member of the presidium of the Students Association, and in this capacity, he was responsible for the World Organization of Jewish Students.

He began his political and party activity as chairman of the Youth and Young Generation Authority of the NRP. He was one of the outstanding individuals among the NRP young guard which he formed into a group within the party which he headed. In NRP circles Zevulun Hammer is today considered also the eventual successor of Dr Burg, as leader of the party.

He was elected to the Seventh Knesset and served as deputy minister of education and culture. On the Eighth Knesset he was a member of the Education and Culture Comm ttee and the Foreign Affairs and Defense Committee, and later served for a short time as minister of social betterment. His hope was to become the minister of education and culture--and he indeed realized it in the Likud Cabinet 4 years ago.

Yosef Burg--Minister of Interior, Police, and Religious Affairs

[Article by Yosef Waxman]

[Text] The minister of interior, police, and religious affairs is the senior member of Knesset and the senior member of the Cabinet. Dr Yosef Burg has been a member of the governments of Israel virtually continuously since 1951.

Dr Yosef Burg was born in 1909 in Dresden, Germany and immigrated to Israel in 1939 after a long period of studies during the course of which he received a PhD and rabbinical ordination. After his arrival, he served as a teacher in the Herzliyya gymnasium, however he soon became involved in political activity as a direct continuation of such activity in the diaspora. He represented the Mizrahi Movement in the Zionist Ececutive Committee and in the national institutions. After the establishment of the state, he was elected a member of the First Knesset in which he was selected as deputy speaker of the Knesset.

In 1951 he was appointed minister of health and after a year, minister of posts. He held this position for 6 years, and from there he went to the Ministry of Social Welfare and held this position for 11 years. In 1970 he was appointed minister of interior and in the outgoing Knesset, the Ministry of Police was attached to his ministry.

Now, as was stated, he will also serve as the minister of religious affairs and he will concurrently continue to serve as chairman of the Ministerial Committee for Autonomy Negotiations which is actually the main issue in which he has been involved for the past 2 years.

His abundant activity in governmental positions has not prevented Dr Burg from fulfilling his duties as the leader of the NRP, as the world president of Mizrahi, a member of the Board of Trustees of Bar Ilan University, and many other positions. In addition, he is one of the most sought after speakers by the fund-raising campaigns throughout the world and is regarded as an outstanding fundraiser for the [text missing] regarded as an outstanding fundraiser for the state.

Aharon Abu-Hatzeira--Minister of Labor, Social Betterment, and Absorption

[Article by Tali Bashan]

[Text] The capacity of Minister of Labor, Social Betterment, and Absorption Aharon Abu-Hatzeira is astounding. During the process of one term he managed to be the youngest minister in history, to be in the center of an unprecedented public storm and to emerge from it "standing tall" to a political struggle which virtually split the people, to strike a blow at his previous party, the NRP, to make his new faction, Tami, the steelyard in the new coalition, and to give himself new positions of power.

Aharon Abu-Hatzeira comes from a prestigious and large family of rabbis from Arford, Morocco (family prestige which has had great significance throughout his political career). He was born in Morocco and immigrated to Israel at the age of 11. After completing his schooling at the ueshiva high school of Kefar Haro'e, he worked as a history teacher in a high school in Ramla. When he joined the NRP, he became its candidate for mayor of Ramla. He served two terms in this position.

The turning point in his status came after an "upheaval" in which Yitzhaq Rafael was shunted aside by his associates in the NRP--the Lamifne faction and the party's Young Guard. At that time Abu-Hatzeira gained a new position of power in the party, and at the distribution of the portfolios in the fresh coalition of 1977, he demanded and even received a ministerial position. This is how Abu-Hatzeira, the nephew of the sainted Baba Sali and the son of Rabbi Abu-Hatzeira, of blessed memory, became a minister at 39.

A short time after he took office he encountered problems in the management of the Ministry of Religious Affairs. In the wake of severe disagreements on the method of managing the ministry and the degree of centralization which the minister took, the then director general of the ministry, Yisrael Lipal (a member of Yosef Burg's camp), resigned. Also, disclosures of irregularities in management began to slowly "trickle out," and criticism was heard of the allocation of funds to yeshivas and rabbis and about the existence of fictitious yeshivas receiving funds from the ministry.

The rest is known. The disclosures and the suspicions raised led to a thorough investigation which concluded with Abu-Hatzeira being brought to trial. "They are spilling my blood," the minister exclaimed at the time. He managed to maintain his composure throughout his trial which ended with his acquittal.

Some say that he destroyed the Ministry of Religious Affairs and left it completely paralyzed. He himself, in his lowkeyed manner, carefully paves his political road and says on the eve of his second trial, "Several months ago I decided to give up political activity, but I do not want to give this pleasure to those who want to see me leave."

APPOINTMENT OF SHARON ASSESSED

Tel Aviv HA'ARETZ in Hebrew 4 Aug 81 p 11

[Article by Yoel Marcus: "A God Who Disappoints or a Devil Who Surprises?"]

[Text] Ariel Sharon's appointment to the post of defense minister will undoubtedly steal the show from the new government to be established today. There is some question as to whether this was a controversial appointment to such a sensitive post, one that affects the well being and physical health of the nation. The debate which occupies every citizen in the nation is not connected with Sharon's military expertise (few question that at all) but rather with his personality. As we know, the attitude towards his personality is ambivalent or polar, not unlike the one experienced by Moshe Dayan during his entire political career. No one is indifferent to Sharon. You either hate him and are suspicious of him or you respect and exalt him.

His close friends speak of him in Messianic terms and see him as a kind of savior for Israel. "He already saved you once (in the Yom Kippur War) and he will save you next time again," was the way one of his friends once put it to his opponents. In their eyes, his anticipated appointment as defense minister goes together with the salvation of the country. The same irrationality which characterizes his admirers also describes his opponents. Their major complaint is that he is a "dangerous man," an "opportunist," and that his main concern is Sharon. These opponents speak of him in terms of dictatorship, tanks, concentration camps and the like.

It is almost certain that there is no more validity to these fears than there is to the praises circulating about Sharon. The fact that in his youth he was a member of MAPAI and, according to Yomani Sharet, afraid of the fact that too many officers were joining the Unity of Labor Party, and that now he is the spearhead of Israel's settlement front, does not make him any more of an opportunist than many MAPAI people who today are members of the Labor Party and who think like him. He has expressed himself sharply about the media whose role in making him a national hero is unquestionable. "We have a unique democracy in which the most severe accusations leveled at the government come from television, and not a single newspaper supports the government," he once said in a newspaper interview. But his criticism does not really deviate from the generally accepted pattern of the Likud ministers who lay all the defects and omissions of the government at the feet of the media.

Sharon himself has expressed his opinion more than once about his public image. In a conversation I had with him when he stood at the head of the "Shalomtzion" list in 1977, he said on this subject, "They say of me that I am a warmonger. Far from it. By my nature, I am an easy going man and not at all despotic, far from the qualities of a dictator that people attach to me." Even if we assume that we should not accept too easily the baker's testimony about his own dough, we can still assume that there is a lot of exaggeration in the notion that by handing over the defense portfolio to Sharon, he will be given dictatorial powers which could endanger the democracy.

He himself once reacted to the horror stories going on around him in an interview with MA'ARIV. "It would be impossible to carry out any campaign in Israel which was not completely subordinate to the law. In my opinion, this is unequivocal." It is also true that we have far too highly developed a system of "checks and balances," not only within the structure of the government but also in the internal structure of every citizen of the state, for us to fear that any defense minister could control this nation with tanks and prison camps. The only one who really has to fear Sharon's appointment to this key position is, perhaps, King Hussayn whom Sharon described as a foreign body in the region who is trying to prevent the establishment of a Palestinian State. We will come back to this in the second part of this article.

Whoever examines what Sharon has been saying for the past 5 years will find--for better or worse--a certain consistency in his approach to problems of security and problems of organizing the defense system as well as in his approach to the future of the settlements. Of all the people in the world, he was the one who strongly supported civilian control of the army. More than 4 years ago, he was already talking about "massive waste" and a "careless attitude towards money" in the defense establishment. Already then, he spoke of the need for a 20 percent reduction in the "inflated army command." He spoke of a lack of order and of the need for reorganization.

From the perspective of his military outlook, he is against the recent tendency to go for "quantity" instead of "quality." the IDF needs to return to the approach of quality which used to characterize it (that is also the reason that he opposed the absorption of marginal youth into the army. "This is an army and not a melting pot or a school." Meanwhile, I am told, he has changed his attitude on the subject, mainly because he is worried about the direction of the development of social divisions within the country). He has always been sensitive to the Syrian presence in Lebanon and to any kind of military preparations taking place on Israel's borders. His reactions to the decision to bomb Lebanon and later towards the cease fire attest to the fact that he is opposed to the strategic outlook which is likely to lead to a war whose consequences are a waste. A course like the one taken in Lebanon would not have happened under Sharon. The move would either have been more basic and comprehensive ("like in Gaza," says one of his friends) or it would not have taken place in the same place at the same time in relation to the same target.

Although his assistants assure us that Sharon will enter his office on tiptoes, and that perhaps a good deal of time will pass before he makes any kind of declarations ("unless the situation requires it"), we can assume that it will not be long before his imprint will be felt within the defense establishment, whether from an organizational point of view or with respect to the conception and suggestions which will be presented to the government for approval. Sharon, however, who has been working hard for weeks on a draft of an outline of his direction as defense minister, is likely to want to leave his mark on the peace process as well, a subject which will be central to political activity in the months and years to come. And in this area, too, there is a marked consistency in his statements.

The point of departure of his approach is very reminiscent of Moshe Dayan's namely, that there are no sacred historical boundaries. The people of Israel have rights "over" the land of Israèl, whereas the Arabs have rights "in" Israel. There is, in his past statements, some deviation from the ideological position of Gush Emunim. "I don't agree with them on several issues, but one must accept them and work with them and keep them moderate. Like Dayan, he says, "It is unlikely that there will be a place in Israel where Jews will not be able to live." In contrast to the approaches of the Alignment and Likud, Sharon has said several times that peace without a solution to the Palestinian problem will keep us continually in our present situation. He has said more than once that we must arrive at a dialogue with the Palestinians and even with the PLO. "It is not important to whom we speak but about what." And his "what" is that a "second Palestinian State" should not be established.

According to him, a Palestinian State already exists--namely, Jordan--and the solution lies in the formation of a federation or confederation ("I am not afraid of these concepts," he once said) between the Palestinian State whose capitol is Rabat-Ammon and Israel and the residents of Judaea and Samaria. He is against too much U.S. involvement in the autonomy talks and believes that, in the final analysis, no true peace agreement can be achieved without Soviet cooperation. His statements indicate that security considerations are more important to him than adherence to ideology in so far as some possible order is concerned on the West Bank, an approach that smacks of pragmatism.

Last year, Sharon was prepared to move down to deputy minister as long as he would be appointed to defense. It is not surprising, then, that his anticipated appointment is the realization of a dream he does not want to see destroyed. His friends say that Sharon as defense minister is likely to do some surprising things--not in the sense that he will shake up the defense establishment in ways that some feel will not hurt it, but as the man who will bring about talks with the Palestinians. How he will do this--is he likely to propose to the Palestinians and the PLO a joint effort to bring about Husayn's downfall--that remains to be seen. In theory at least, there is no question that assured talks with the Palestinians by a man who stands at the head of the Israel front certainly contains elements of surprise. It is too early to say who will be most surprised--his friends, his opponents or Sharon himself.

Either way, he has wanted this position too much, and for too long has thought about what he would do with it, for him not to take advantage of the chance to prove himself. After the first 100 days of grace, we will be able to look back to determine if Sharon is the god who deceives, the Satan who surprises or simply mediocre like all the Likud ministers.

COMMENTARY ON DAVID LEVI

Tel Aviv HA'ARETZ in Hebrew 10 Aug 81 p 8

[Article by Gid'on Allon: "Absorption As a Secondary Matter"]

[Text] On Thursday morning, when Menahem Begin and the members of his government stood in the president's hall waiting to be presented to President Yitzhak Navon, Minister David Levi was among them. He had a reason for being pleased with himself. He had won (once again) in the struggle and had strengthened his position within the government. In place of the absorption portfolio which had been taken from him, he had been appointed deputy prime minister, chairman of the Ministers Committee on matters of social betterment and responsible for the housing plan--all this apart from his job as Housing Minister. Now that the transfer of the office of absorption has become definite, we can summarize his 4 years in this position.

Whoever has followed David Levi's progress since he joined Menahem Begin's first government in June 1977 as Absorption Minister, cannot help but admit that this position served him as a jumping off place for the advancement of his political career and for the strengthening of his position within the Herut movement and the government. During the first months of his tenure, he was full of ideas. He initiated a quiet revolution in the distribution of housing to immigrants. He supported the establishment of an authority for immigration and absorption which would work with the government and the Jewish Agency with him serving as its chairman. He developed a government program for the encouragement of those who left the country during the 30th anniversary of Israel (this was a complete failure). He committed himself to work towards encouraging immigration from the developed nations (particularly France) and to reduce the extent of defection (which did not bear fruit). But at the beginning of 1979, when he was appointed as Minister of Construction and Housing (instead of Gid'on Fass), in addition to his job as Minister of Immigrant Absorption, he began to relate to the subjects of immigration and absorption as to a secondary matter. He spent less time on the difficult problems of immigrants and delegated those to the director-general of his office, Azriel Waldeman, but he fought hard against every effort on the part of the Jewish Agency to do away with the Absorption Ministry and to transfer the dealings on the subjects of immigration and absorption into its hands. In the course of this struggle, he demonstrated his power and influence within the Herut movement. Furthermore, in June of 1979 he forced Prime Minister Menahem Begin to change his mind about doing away with the Ministry of Immigrant Absorption. At the same time, he launched a sharp critique on the prime minister and argued that the government could not divest itself of responsibility for action within the realm of absorption.

Employees in the Ministry of Immigrant Absorption pointed out that David Levi did not concern himself much with the absorption of immigrants once he was appointed Minister of Construction and Housing. He devoted all his time and energy to two main areas: the Ministry of Housing and the consolidation of his political power within the Herut movement. At the same time, he struggled with the Likud position in the Histadrut and established an image as the true representative of the Eastern community and of the lower classes, as someone who watched over the needs of low income people and who did battle in the government against the elimination of subsidies for basic necessities.

David Levi did not contribute anything to increasing the awareness of the government to the problems of immigration and absorption. This area was at the bottom of the list of priorities of the previous government. It did not carry on a single serious discussion about the severe drop in immigration, about the problem of the defection of Soviet immigrants to Vienna, and on the emigration of thousands of Israeli youths from the country each year.

Even when he established an institution for coordination between the government and the Zionist Federation, a special committee to consolidate practical suggestions to reduce emigration, David Levi did nothing to facilitate its discussions even though he was a member of the committee along with Deputy Prime Minister Simha Erlich. Neither did he take any action after the publication of the findings of the public opinion poll (conducted at the initiative of the Ministry of Absorption) about the positions of the Israeli public on the subject of immigration and absorption which indicated a significant worsening in the attitudes of the Israeli public towards the immigrants and a severe estrangement between the old-timers in Israel (especially the educated) and the immigrants.

David Levi was also not bothered by the fact that immigration to Israel had decreased noticeably. The fact that since the beginning of the year (January to July) there were only 6300 new immigrants and that seven absorption centers had closed while the others handled only 50 percent of the usual traffic did not arouse any response from the man who was responsible for dealing with the issue of immigration and absorption.

The appointment of Abu Hatzeira over the issue of absorption in the new government alongside his major responsibility as Minister of Labor and Social Betterment suggests that the new minister is also likely to relate to the Ministry of Immigrant Absorption as to an incidental matter.

MOSHE QATZAV, DEPUTY MINISTER FOR URBAN RENEWAL

Tel Aviv MA'ARIV in Hebrew 7 Aug 81 p 25

[Interview by Talila Ben Zakai: "MK Moshe Qatzav: The Purity of Politics"]

[Text] Tuesday afternoon in the Knesset. MK Moshe Qatzav, deputy minister for urban renewal, has difficulty responding to the confusing situation he has been put into as a result of the composition of the government.

Earlier he was told that he would be appointed as deputy minister in the office of the prime minister, and he was pleased. Later it was decided that the project would be transferred to the Ministry of Housing and Construction in order to expand the part suggested for David Levi, and MK Qatzav agreed.

Meanwhile, David Levi played at being "angry" and left the game. Then they started over and returned MK Qatzav to his original post, namely, in the prime minister's office. For a full day he was in a state of anticipation. Next, Minister Levi became reconciled and became deputy prime minister. The result of all this is that MK Qatzav will serve as deputy to the minister who is deputy prime minister or something like that.

It appears that he is prepared for any arrangement. At any rate, in talking with me he seemed content and did not complain that the game going on over his head was upsetting him. No, he completely understands the situation. And, while he is aware of the bad impression which the extensive negotiations make on the public, he does not see in this situation in which small parties squeeze (appointments or changes in approach) and the party is squeezed enough reason to stop and say "no more" and to go back again to the voters. "It is not that one must maintain party rule at any cost. There is a limit to this too," he says and adds, "but the situation is not serious enough to warrant such an extreme step and such things happen."

Born in Iran (and chairman of the organization of Iranian immigrants in Israel), resident of Qiryat Malahi and chairman of the council (he plans to leave that post soon), 36 years old (married more than 5 years), MK Moshe Qatzav numbers among the young members in the 10th Knesset. "Most of them are from Likud," he says. "The young Alignment people are at least 40." But age apparently does not matter, and he sounds today like the old-timers who speak about every subject without saying anything new. "We are a reflection of the public;" "the patterns of the government are in the process of being crystallized;" "politics can be pure if everyone stays away from negative examples;" "I myself have not been involved in any illegal methods. I haven't even used my elbows, and my career has not been tainted."

To those youths who are sitting at home criticizing the political system, he proposes, "Get involved, enter the arena and be different from the old guard, and then, within a few years, everything will change."

The personal history of Deputy Minister Moshe Qatzav is a nice story of immigration--absorption--development and personal advancement.

He grew up in the transit camp of Qastina (the eldest of the 7 children in the Qatzav family). First, he lived in a tent, later in a bunk. And when the camp became a development town, the family got a real dwelling, a two room apartment--48 mm. square with running water, hook-up for electricity and utilities inside the apartment.

He completed elementary school in Qiryat-Malahi, high school in Ben-Shemen and Beer Tuviya. He finished his academic studies at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem where he also served as chairman of the student council of Gahal.

Since then, his path has been tied to the Herut movement and to a political career, as chairman of the local council at Qiryat Malahi since 1974 ("my most important accomplishment--the satisfaction of the residents with the town"), and since 1977 a member of the Knesset ("during my first term I was amazed at the complete dependence on the part of those elected on the media which determine the rules of the game").

During the past 4 years, he has served in two public posts. This has been hard, he says, but it has been very important. As a member of the Knesset, it is very important for him not to be too cut off from the people. And as head of the council, it is nice that he can bypass bureaucratic procedures and push for issues from a higher level.

Moshe Qatzav Deputy Minister

"This time" MK Qatzav, who is an avid stamp collector, says, "there are already council heads in the Knesset, and I think that this is very good." He himself intends to leave and to devote himself to the Knesset and to his new post as deputy minister for urban renewal. The subject is especially close to him. "It is still too soon to outline in detail my plans, but what I can say is that I would like to function in such a way that in 10 years, we will not have to go back and do any more renewal. I expect also that the young generation growing up in these reconstructed areas will be able to handle whatever problems arise on their own." And if he does not succeed in achieving these objectives, he feels it will not be because of conditions and institutions but because of his own limitations.

MIRYAM GLAZER, DEPUTY MINISTER FOR EDUCATION, CULTURE

Tel Aviv MA'ARIV in Hebrew 7 Aug 81 p 25

[Interview by Talila Ben Zakai: "From the Fortress to the Knesset"]

[Text] At the beginning of the week, it appeared that the government (ministers and deputy ministers) would be composed only of men. And now--surprise. MK Miryam Glazer has been summoned to the post of Deputy Minister of Education and Culture. Now it can be said that 50 percent of the female members of Eikud in the Knesset have gotten select posts.

She does not yet know her way around the workings of the Knesset (nor the MKs' dining room), and even the ushers still have a hard time identifying her. A new face in the 10th Knesset. A student who "skipped" two grades at once--from her life in education to the Knesset and from there directly to the post of Deputy Minister.

It was not a complete surprise. The fact is that as early as the 7th Knesset, she was invited to join, but her children were still small and she did not feel ready for the job. Now with the encouragement of her husband and the agreement of the children (the oldest is married), she agreed to the invitation. She does not hide her excitement about the honor bestowed on her, but she admits that the opening ceremony at the Knesset was disappointing. "I was hoping for a more sensitive ceremony," says the MK who as a school director had lots of experience with setting up festive ceremonies.

"I will do my best," she says again but has trouble at this stage saying anything more concrete. The prime minister suggested the position ("he was my son's godfather'). She does not know the minister of education personally, and, although it is clear that the appointment was made with his approval, he has not yet invited her nor has she sought him out, and she has no idea what he intends for her or how the system of work relations between them will be set up.

But these unknowns do not cloud over, at this first stage, the excitement of this dizzying pace of personal advancement which goes along with the anxiety about being able to fit into a system which demands that you not always say what you think and that you not always fight for what you believe in, but that you quickly develop a control mechanism which forces you to weigh every word and every hand raising against party and coalition considerations. And for her, all this is new.

Miryam (at home it is T'assa) was born in Yemen in 1929. When she was 5 years old, her family migrated to Israel and joined her grandfather (who had come in 1882) in Tel Aviv's Neve-Tsedek. She went from the local elementary school (where the "actors' theater" now stands) to the seminary "Talpiyot" ("I left because I refused to tell on girls who belonged to dissident organizations") and Levinsky ("they threw me out on the grounds that I had missed too much school"). Then she began her career as an uncertified teacher and only later completed her exams and received her teaching certificate (she later completed her education at the university).

Now she is leaving teaching at the seminary as well as at the school in the youth farm of Beitar (sports and youth organization) named after Johanna Jabotinski in Beer Ya'acov, in which she served intermittently as teacher and headmistress since 1951.

"I went there for a year," she says, "and stayed for 30!" (with some breaks). There she married Haim Glazer (who came after her to run the farmstead). Their children were born there (25, 22, and 18). About 10 years ago, her husband left to attend to private business and the family moved to Holon. She continued to direct the school as an "outside resident." And from there, without any intermediate steps of public or political posts, she was established in the Knesset.

"I am used to learning new subjects slowly and thoroughly," says the teacher from the "fortress" (abbreviation for Jabotinski residence), who believes in the need to strengthen the ideological side of education and to emphasize the strengthening of national attitudes.

Miryam Glazer, Deputy Minister of Education and Culture

As a teacher and educator she can only be very critical of the manner of expression and the conduct of many Knesset members. "It is not enough to be chosen. One must behave as one who is chosen," she says, and promises that in this area she will not hesitate to continue to be a teacher and to call for order.

As for the rest--education, integration, reports, briefings, study programs and so forth--she is still keeping silent.

And yes, as for culture, it is apparently for her (as well as for the Minister himself) only an addendum to the main subject--education.

MINISTER EXPLAINS GCC ECONOMIC AGREEMENT

LD121340 Kuwait KUNA in English 1212 GMT 12 Nov 81

[Text] Kuwait, 12 Nov (KUNA)--The Kuwait Finance and Planning Minister 'Abd al-Latif al-Hamad said the economic unity agreement, which the heads of the six Gulf Cooperation Council member states signed in Riyadh last night, will provide a comprehensive framework for economic relations among the council members.

In a statement to KUNA, al-Hamad said the ministers in the economic, financial and planning sectors will meet shortly to lay down the bases for economic cooperation among Kuwait, Saudi Arabia, United Arab Emirates, Qatar, Bahrain and Oman.

The agreement binds the six member-states in a parallel and complementary manner and automatically dissolves all bilateral agreements between the Gulf states while at the same time catering for the needs of the states which did not have such bilateral agreements, he said.

The economic unity agreement lays down the basic principles for economic relations among the six GCC member-states and regulates and fosters these relations with a view to achieving closer cooperation among their harmonious economies, al-Hamad added. The Kuwaiti minister said the agreement will lead to removal of inconsistency among the six Gulf states and formulates and coordinates the economies of these states and helps in creating the best integration amongst them.

The six-chapter agreement includes clauses which place a maximum of coordination in the economic, financial and monetary dealings among the Gulf states and calls for unification of commercial and industrial legislations and customs regulations.

The chapters of the agreement define the bases of trade exchange, tax levying and the encouragement of national products. It calls for equal treatment of the Gulf citizens in the movement of manpower, ownership of land and assets and the transfer of capital and economic activities.

The agreement calls for coordination of oil industry policies including refining, marketing, pricing and exploitation of natural gas and development of energy resources.

Cooperation in tapping scopes of joint technical endeavour with a view to establishing a firm Gulf base dependent on encouragement of research, applied sciences and technology are also included in the agreement.

Coordination of financial, monetary and banking policies and cooperation among the monetary agencies and central banks including unification of the currency constitute an integral part of the economic unity agreement.

GOALS OF BRIGHT STAR MANEUVERS CRITICIZED

GF091835 Kuwait AL-WATAN in Arabic 8 Nov 81 p 22

[Text] Observers say that the goals of the bright star maneuvers which the United States will carry out together with four Arab countries lie in the U.S. Government's desire to show its commitment to protect its friends and interests in the Middle East. The truth is that the maneuvers are designed to protect its interests and not its friends. Indications are that, despite close friendship with the United States, its friends began to fall one after another without any U.S. move to rescue them. The United States is concerned, before anything else, with protecting its interests because there is absolutely no such thing as "friend" in U.S. policy. The Arab countries that will participate in these maneuvers fully realize that their goal is the protection of U.S. interests.

We do not know why these four Arab countries insist on participating with the United States in these maneuvers, which will be interference [words indistinct] sister countries in the council in a difficult position as they try to find an explanation for Omani policy following the optimism that prevailed at the conclusion of latest meeting of the CGG foreign ministers in At-Ta'if.

In addition the U.S. maneuvers come at a critical time when the Arab nation is preparing for two summits. The first is for the Arab Gulf countries and the second is for all the Arab countries. How will these two summits deal with the U.S. maneuvers over Arab territories and shores--maneuvers which had been announced to be designed for U.S. interference in the area? Will the Gulf summit discuss the maneuvers to be carried out in the water of its countries? Will it announce its opinion frankly and loudly so that it will be heard in Oman? Oman indicated, just as the other Gulf countries did, that the security and protection of the Gulf is the responsibility of its countries--and as we know the United States is not one of the Gulf countries.

We, the people, do not know what is being planned against us, but we fully realize that it is not in our favor since our interests contradict completely U.S. interests. As long as the United States protects its interests, it will be threatening our interests. Will those who help the United States protect its interests one day defend our interests?

PUBLICATIONS, RALLIES LAWS--Kuwait, 9 Nov (KUNA)--In a statement to the newspaper AL-WATAN, published today, member of the Kuwaiti National Assembly Muhammad al-Barrak has stated that he and the other 15 assembly members who abstained from voting against the abrogation of Article 35 of the Publications Law, thereby supporting the government, will oppose the new law on publications and have already notified the government of their firm stand in support of retaining Article 35. As to the law on public assemblies and rallies, he said, he supports the deputies who favor retaining the law with the introduction of some amendments. 'VOAH' ATTACKS U.S. 'PLOTS' AGAINST AL-QADHDHAFI

[Excerpts] The challenge between the masses and revolutionary forces of our Arab nation, on the one hand, and the imperialist West headed by the United States, on the other, is both old and new at one and the same time. This is caused by many things which can be summed up briefly in one statement: The imperialist West insists on interfering in our nation's life in order to dominate its territories, exhaust its wealth, enslave its masses by using all means beginning with treachery and deception and ending with plotting, collusion and the use of force--a matter which our Arab masses have rejected and opposed in various ways and which they oppose and reject at present with all the force they can muster.

On 17 June this year, the DAILY NEWS quoted U.S. sources as saying that the Reagan administration was plotting to topple al-Qadhdhafi through some Arab countries friendly to the United States. This is the new scenario to which the Reagan administration has resorted after it failed to harm the revolution or find a trojan war which would realize its dream of toppling the revolution from within.

In view of this, the Reagan administration embarked on the current attempt, invented by its petrified mentality, to differentiate between the revolution and its commander, the brother al-Qadhdhafi, as though the conflict was solely between him and the United States. However, despite the fact that he is the commander of the revolution al-Qadhdhafi is, after all, only one of the masses of the struggling Arab nation and one of the free revolutionaries who have rejected the life of humiliation for their nation and dedicated themselves to securing an honorable life for their nation. Al-Qadhdhafi is only the symbol of the revolution and the cause of freedom not only in the Arab world but throughout the world.

The U.S. attempt to differentiate between the revolution and the commander is a naive one which cannot deceive our Libyan Arab people and our Arab nation. Yet, the United States persists with its deception, resorting at one time to using poison, a byproduct of the U.S. terrorist mentality and Reagan's talent.

This has been revealed by the WASHINGTON POST. Since then, the world has been scoffing at the revelations made by the WASHINGTON POST. But the reply of the revolution and its commander to these threats and aggressive attempts was that the commander does not fear death and that the Arab nation with its revolutionary living forces and the Libyan people do not fear the United States.

The unmasking of this U.S. farce and the revolutionary reply to it, as happened at the Gulf of Sidra, have failed to deter the United States, which embarked on a new attempt even more abominable than its previous attempts: to intercept the commander's plane in a terrorist act of piracy, using its bases all over Europe for the purpose. But as it failed in this too, it embarked on yet another attempt which was exposed by the news agencies and Arab and foreign press and radios this week: to launch an offensive against the life of the commander of the revolution from 10 to 15 November, dates which coincide with the provocative military maneuvers which the United States forces in Egypt will be staging.

Quoting U.S. diplomatic sources, these papers say that the plan is primarily directed against Colonel Mu'ammar al-Qadhdhafi. It is to be achieved through striking at all the places he is believed to frequent. According to confirmed information carried by the world news agencies during the past few days, the operation shall be preceded by camouflaging measures such as strategic B-52 bombers striking at some area inside the Jamahiriyah. Speaking of the details of this criminal operation, the information media say that the U.S. CIA has been monitoring the movements of brother Colonel Mu'ammar al-Qadhdhafi and the places he frequents for months on orders from the Pentagon, as he is supposed to be the primary objective of a U.S. operation to be carried out shortly.

But we say to the U.S. that Mu'ammar al-Qadhdhafi, the symbol of the revolution, can only be reached by the United States over our dead bodies. This is a decision taken not only by our Libyan Arab people but also by the masses and living revolutionary forces of our Arab nation from the ocean to the gulf. This is because we know that our problem with the United States is one of our freedom and the freedom of our homeland and our right to a free and honourable life. It is not one between the United States and Mu'ammar al-Qadhdhafi personally. As al-Qadhdhafi is the symbol of all these objectives and as he is the commander of this revolution, it will be difficult for the United States to harm this continuous symbol of the revolution and its masses, who will achieve their objectives of freedom and complete emanicipation and the expulsion of U.S. imperialism from every inch of the Arab land.

BRIGHT STAR DANGER--Paris, 13 Nov (AFP)--American-Egyptian military manoeuvres "on Libya's borders "constitute a prelude to a military intervention in Libya," [quotation marks as received] said Hafiana, secretary of the Libyan People's Bureau (embassy) here, said today. The manoeuvres, which began on Saturday in Egypt and will involve Sudan, Somalia and Oman, are a direct threat to Libya, Mr. Hafiana said. "The American invasion of the four Arab countries" is part of "global American strategy" against Libya and to prepare for "direct action" against his country, he said. If attacked Libya "will use all means available to defend its integrity," he said. He also reiterated Libyan denial that his country was involved in an assassination attempt against acting American ambassador to France Christian Chapman here yesterday. U.S. Secretary of State Alexander Haig has said that Libya could have been involved in the shooting attack. But Mr. Hafiana said that the American accusations were aimed at "creating conditions of an aggression against Libya" and were part of "a global strategy by the United States to destabilize the regime of Colonel (Mu'amar) al-Qadhdhafi." OMAN FRONT RADIO SCORES MUSCAT CONSULTATIVE ASSEMBLY

[Excerpt] The United States and the remaining imperialist forces in the world have begun to adopt a line different to that followed in past years, so that they can at least preserve their remaining agents and hirelings in this or that area.

At the present time, particularly after the killing of the traitor Anwar al-Sadat, calls are heard from this or that quarter saying that the United States and its allies should continue backing the regimes that support them in the Arab region, without those regimes remaining obviously under the umbrella of their protection in the eyes of their peoples.

On this basis, the United States has advised its agents in the region to carry out formal measures in the near future, such as the establishment of consultative assemblies with very limited powers and which, in the final analysis, are only formalities, of no consequence in the fundamental issues of the people, that is they are facades for (?beautifying) the existing regimes and a negation of the expression of democracy.

What the agent regime in Muscat has announced in this respect is proof of the adherence by that regime to the advice of its American and British masters. We will not be surprised if, in the near future the Qabus regime in Muscat presents us with a dramatic event connected with the military bases and facilities which he granted under the 4 July agreement because, if such event occurs, it will be part of the American imperialist design for the region which aims at creating regional alternatives for preserving the imperialist interests in this area.

The voices that have for some time been calling for the creation of a joint local military force are nothing but reliable alternatives for replacing the Americans and the British in the Arabian Gulf area. [sentence as heard] Among the first tasks of this military force would be to serve the imperialist interests in this area. Its work would include the suppression of the nationalist and democratic forces existing in this vital area and which express the interests of the peoples of the area.

PFLO RADIO SAYS BRIGHT STAR EXERCISES 'DEMEAN' OMAN

EA072010 Aden Voice of PFLO in Arabic 1545 GMT 7 Nov 81

[Text] News agencies have been reporting that American military exercises will be carried out throughout this month in some Arab countries. According to U.S. (?expectations), these exercises, in which the Sultanate of Oman is to participate, will cover Masirah Island and the beaches on the mainland opposite. [Words indistinct]

Eighteen hundred U.S. Marines will take part in these naval exercises. Qabus' regime asked the United States to reduce the number of marines to 1,000 so that the regime in Muscat would not be embarrassed in front of the other Arab regimes. This report was carried by American agencies.

We have explained before that Qabus' puppet regime, by signing a military pact with the United States on 4 July last year, pawned Oman, its people and territory to U.S. circles in Washington. This means that Qabus has distanced himself from the goal of preserving Oman's freedom, independence and honor. We have also explained that Qabus and his regime did not plan the exercises and had no say in them. Qabus did not know about the exercises until it was decided to carry them out. This was natural, of course, because the relationship is between a hirer and a hireling. This is how America treats its agents whenever it signs military pacts with them to acquire military facilities and bases.

Qabus is now asking the U.S. administration to reduce the size of its forces taking part in the exercises, allegedly because he does not want to be embarrassed in front of other Arab regimes. The question is: Will the embarrassment about which the agent regime is talking be avoided by the reduction of the American forces participating in the exercises in Omani territory? This is inverted logic on the part of the regime. [Sentence indistinct].

Even just 10 American or other foreign soldiers carrying out actions on Omani territory with the consent of the existing regime must be regarded as an act of betrayal against the masses of Oman. For this reason, the conducting of military exercises by the Americans, irrespective of whether there are 1,000 or more, must be regarded as an act of treachery against the Omani people. The condemnation of this treachery will not lessen simply because Qabus has asked his new American masters to reduce the number of those taking part in the exercises.

This request of Qabus reported by the news agencies, makes it clear that the pact of 4 July 1980 between the Sultanate and the United States has made the United States an overlord determining the fate of our Omani people, while the agent regime has been turned into a satellite of American imperialism in the Gulf and peninsula.

The fact that the United States has agreed to reduce the extent of the planned military exercises in Oman means nothing since the exercises will still be carried out, and that is the crux of the matter. Qabus has truly demeaned the independence and dignity of Oman.

U.S. MANEUVERS CONDEMNED--Arab national liberation movements and progressive parties represented in Aden have condemned U.S. aggressive military maneuvers which pose a threat to the security and interests of the Arab peoples and all the peoples of the region. In a statement issued today, they declared their solidarity with and support for Democratic Yemen, Libya, Socialist Ethiopia, the Omani, Somali and Egyptian peoples and the Sudanese Communist Party, led by their progressive forces. They pointed out that the situation in the Arab region is at its most delicate and dangerous stage with the conflict between American imperialism and Arab reaction on the one hand and the progressive groups of the Arab National Liberation Movement on the other. They stressed the great danger to our Arab peoples and all the peoples of the region caused by the aggressive policy of the American imperialists and their collusion with Arab reactionary forces. TRADE UNIONS SUPPORT CUBA--The secretariat of the Confederation of Trade Unions of the republic has strongly condemned the threats and aggressive acts by American imperialism directed against the revolution and people in Cuba and which aim at harming the independence of the revolution of the heroic Cuban people. This came in a solidarity cable sent by Brother Sultan al-Dawsh, member of the Central Committee and secretary general of the Confederation of Trade Unions, to Comrade Roberto Veiga, secretary general of the Confederation of Workers of Socialist Cuba. It declared the trade union's (?absolute) and unqualified support for the revolution and people. It said: The Yemeni working class and its trade union movement declare their readiness to defend the revolution and independence of the Cuban people against the aggression of American imperialism and its threats. The cable asked all the forces of progress, democracy and peace in the world to stand against this aggressive policy of the United States and with the struggle of the friendly Cuban people to preserve their sovereignty and independence. The secretariat of the General Union of Women of the PDRY today also condemned American imperialist provocation against the Cuban revolution. In a cable of support it sent to the Cuban Women's Union, the secretariat expressed its full solidarity with the struggling people of Cuba. The cable hailed the just steadfastness of the Cuban people against these provocations. It asked the world public opinion to condemn these aggressive acts and put an end to them. BRIEFS

STAND AGAINST U.S.--Doha, 7 Nov (QNA)--The Qatari newspaper AL-RAYAH has called on the Arab countries to take a decisive stand on the repeated trickery of the United States regarding its intention to create the reality of the just Arab cause and the legitimate Arab objectives, while commenting on the statement that His Majesty King Husayn, the Jordanian monarch, made during his visit to Washington, in which he warned of a reckless hostile Israeli action against Jordan and Lebanon that would spark a war in the region. AL-RAYAH explains: King Husayn went to Washington with the hope of finding new American trends that he could convey to Arab leaders during their upcoming summit in Morocco. At the same time he wanted to convince Washington to answer Jordan's military needs for advanced weapons to confront the expected Israeli attack. The paper deduces: The Jordanian monarch's announcement, in the capital of the American nation, that his country will buy advanced weapons from the Soviet Union clearly shows that he did not [word indistinct] what he had expected from the Americans. It also affirms that the Arab-Israeli conflict has fallen to the bottom of the list of U.S. priorities. AL-RAYAH concludes: So long as the message is clear and America does not want to understand it, it is the Arab's duty to confront whoever does not understand their problems and take a decisive stand that would put an end to trickery and procrastination. MINISTER INTERVIEWED ON PEACE PLAN

JN101107 Amman AL-DUSTUR in Arabic 10 Nov 81 p 15

[Dispatch by AL-DUSTUR correspondent Ahmad 'Ali]

[Excerpts] Baghdad--Saudi Information Minister Dr Muhammad 'Abduh Yamani has said that the Saudi peace plan is the outcome of the resolutions previously adopted by the Arab summit conference and the United Nations. He said that Saudi Arabia had not consulted anyone about this plan because it is not yet binding, but that it does consist of constructive ideas for those who want to make a step forward toward peace. He went on to say that the plan defines exactly what the Arabs want from the world and it has received positive reaction from many fair people in the world and from the Arab homeland as well as the PLO.

Mr Yamani said this in an exclusive statement to AL-DUSTUR during his visit to Baghdad last week.

Asked about the latest Saudi peace proposals on the Middle East problem, Dr Yamani said: In fact, the Saudi peace plan, which was announced by His Highness Prince Fahd, is the outcome of the resolutions previously adopted by the Arab summit conferences and the United Nations. Saudi Arabia announced this plan out of its awareness of the dimensions of its responsibilities but did not consult anyone about it because this plan is not yet binding and merely consists of constructive ideas for everyone who wants to make a sincere step toward a just peace.

He went on to say: We have accustomed the world to hearing only what we did not want. We never used logic and reason to explain what we wanted. The Saudi peace plan defines exactly what we want from the world. We want it to understand our fateful issue and realize that we have basic rights that have been violated and that there are people unjustly displaced from their homeland.

The Saudi information minister added: Israel's rejection of the Saudi peace plan was not a surprise to us but a confirmation of its desire and policy to impose capitulation and not peace. It is our duty at this stage to cooperate in order to further expose the Zionist plot, particularly as we see the beginning of a positive transformation in the world toward understanding our fateful issues. We must not expect a prompt and complete positive understanding, but we must continue to win further understanding and awareness of the dimensions of the Zionist plot, whose victims are the Palestinian people, who have been suffering from displacement and loss throughout the past few years.

He went on to say: Saudi Arabia has prepared a working paper about this plan to be submitted to the forthcoming Arab summit. He added: We were delighted by the positive reactions to the ideas contained in the Saudi plan by many fair people in the world and by many quarters inside our Arab homeland, particularly the PLO, represented by its chairman, Yasir 'Arafat, and his brothers in the resistance movement, whom we expect will adopt this plan and consider it a sound basis for movement in international fields and in gaining further support and effort for the establishment of an independent Palestinian state for the Palestinians on their territory and homeland as well as for the restoration of the occupied Arab territory, including Jerusalem. There is no doubt that the Palestinian brothers' attainment of their basic legitimate rights will enable them to gain more positive results and a greater ability to express themselves, exercise these legitimate rights of which they have been deprived and put an end to the Palestinian people's state of displacement and loss.

DEPUTY PREMIER PREVIEWS ARAB SUMMIT IN FES

LD071332 Riyadh SPA in English 1200 GMT 7 Nov 81

[Text] Riyadh, 7 Nov (SPA)--Second deputy premier and commander of National Guard, Prince 'Abdallah 'Ibn Abd al-Aziz has said the Saudi Arabian peace plan for establishing just and durable peace in the Middle East would ensure the Arab nation's rights and secure means of stability in the region.

In an interview with 'UKAZ newspaper, Prince 'Abdallah reaffirmed that Saudi Arabia is fully aware of its Arab and Islamic duties. "The eight-point blueprint introduced by Crown Prince Fahd is basically derived from the absolute faith in the right of the Arab nation, to lead an honourable life without any bargains on its legitimate rights," Prince 'Abdallah added.

Prince 'Abdallah said the Arab and Islamic nation should find out a right path from the available choices, in order to devise a unified stand, characterising reason, patience and farsightedness and omitting reactions, as it would pave way for the realisation of their best interests.

"The Arab and Islamic nation should be aware of its enemies in the next stage, so as to take a clear and sound stand, devoid of any aims, except the dignity and high place for the whole Islamic nation among the world-body," he added.

"Time is ripe to face ourselves with the reality and pledge not to commit the mistakes of the past and march forward with the pure noble Arab nature to achieve our aims and goals," Prince 'Abdallah said.

He noted the kingdom has been giving prime concern to Arab solidarity and strategic unanimity, that could determine the moves of every nation within the framework of this unity. "Absence of such a strategy will pave way for policies of trial and errors," (?he said).

"The forthcoming Arab summit in Fes (Morocco) calls for a greater degree of frankness and clarity based on the confidence for devising action, on the problem and introducing viewpoints in a sincere brotherly spirit that could totally remove obstacles in the way of a unified Arab action," Prince 'Abdallah said.

He said a unified Arab action will create a favourable climate for a joint Arab and Islamic moves that could serve the prime goals and interests of the whole Islamic nation.

FOREIGN MINISTER INTERVIEWED BY BEIRUT TV ON PEACE PLAN

LD082320 Riyadh SPA in Arabic 2200 GMT 8 Nov 81

[Text] Beirut, 8 Nov (SPA)--His Royal Highness, Foreign Minister Sa'ud al-Faysal has stated that the first and the last word regarding the peace plan which the kingdom has presented will be from the Palestinians and the Arab countries during the 12th Arab summit in Morocco.

In a statement made to Lebanese television tonight, he said that the Gulf Cooperation Council supported the plan at its meeting in al-Ta'if and decided to put it before the Arab summit for discussion, scrutiny, and to arrive at a decision. He added that he has not observed any reservations among Arab states; on the contrary, he observed that there is increasing support for reaching a unified Arab stance toward the issue. If there are some states which have not yet expressed opinion, it is because they are waiting for (?the matter) to be decided at the summit and not by the information media. His royal highness expressed the hope that the Saudi peace plan would enjoy Arab unanimity at the conference.

The minister spoke about yesterday's meeting in Beirut of the Arab Follow-up Committee at ministerial level and he stressed that the Lebanese issue is one priority which the Arab world must tackle. He said that the Arab Follow-up Committee, thanks to efforts from all sides, reached agreement on the main elements which will pave and open the road for national accord. He added that yesterday the committee also reached agreement concerning the Supervision Commission. This [word garbled] important and fundamental door will open the road for national accord. He expressed pleasure that the cease-fire in Lebanon is continuing to hold, a matter which indicates all parties' awareness of the critical stage which requires self discipline. He also expressed hope that the parties concerned would accept and cooperate with what the committee achieved yesterday regarding the opening of passageways between the areas of Beirut. He stressed that this will create grounds for harmony.

The foreign minister stressed the kingdom's concern for Lebanon's interests at all levels, and said that the kingdom's participation in attempting to resolve the Lebanese problem is part of the joint Arab action. He added that the kingdom, through its participation in the Follow-up Committee, bears its responsibilities in full with regard to both the work of the committee or anything concerning other Arab actions so as to make available the suitable circumstances for national concord. His Highness Prince Saud al-Faysal called upon the Lebanese to shoulder their responsibilities as there is a limit to Arab action toward Lebanon and any such action cannot be a substitute for Lebanese action. The minister referred to the efforts which the kingdom had exerted so as to achieve a cease-fire in the south of Lebanon, and said that this action showed the pivotal nature of the Palestinian issue and the importance of contacts with the PLO. He called on the United States in particular to appreciate the role of the organization and to contact it with regard to resolving the Palestinian issue.

NEW RULES RECOMMENDED CONCERNING GOVERNMENT-SUBSIDIZED STUDENTS ABROAD

Riyadh AL-RIYAD in Arabic 10 Aug 81 p 3

[Article by Hamad al-'Askari: "Fahd Agrees to the Decisions Made by the Committee for Government-Subsidized Students Abroad: Standardization of Stipend Payments in Saudi Riyals In Order to Bring About Equality"]

[Text] Payment of 50,000 Riyals to Each University Graduate Who Works for the Government. The Annual Total in Allowances Is 11,700 Riyals for Students in the First Category, and 9,200 Riyals for the Second Category.

Study Concerning Opening Saudi Schools for the Children of Government-Subsidized Students Abroad, and Organization of Special Study Programs for Them After They Return.

The decision of the committee which was formed to study the situation of government-subsidized students abroad include consolidation of the agency in the education offices which supervises them. This however does not apply to military students who are engaging in military studeis and taking military courses. It was decided to restrict government-subsidized education abroad to graduate level education, excluding students who are below this level. It was also decided not to send any government-subsidized student abroad before he has worked for the government for 2 years, and that after such a 2-year period it should be the job of the educational attache to get him accepted into a university. Another of the decisions was one which provides for the standardization of salary payments to employees who are government-subsidized students abroad. It was decided that all such employees, in all government bodies, should receive half of their salaries.

These were among the recommendations of the committee which were approved by His Royal Highness Prince Fahd ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz, heir to the throne and deputy prime minister. The committee issued these recommendations after holding several meetings uder the chairmanship of His Royal Highness Prince Sultan ibn'Abd al-'Aziz, minister of defense and aviation. The members of the committee included His Royla Highness Prince Nayif ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz, deputy commander of the National Guard; His Royal Highness Prince Salman ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz, governor of Riyadh; His Royal Highness Prince Turki al-Faysal, chief of General Intelligence; his excellency the minister of higher education; and his excellency the minister of education.

The minutes of the committee meetings include the following recommendations:

1. Social and Administrative Problems

The committee feels that it is possible to attribute many of the problems, which are faced by government-subsidized students abroad, to the sudden changes in environment and culture which they encounter, and the committee feels that in order to put a halt to these problems it would be well to take the following steps:

A. Preparation of awareness programs by the office which deals with government-subsidized education abroad, together with experts from universities and the informational media. These awareness programs would be in the form of short courses which would give to the students going abroad some idea about the type of society which they will be going to in order to lessen the element of surprise which they might be subjected to.

B. Preparation of booklets and pamphlets which would help the students going abroad to learn about the social, economic, and legal situation of those countries in addition to some of the main issues which concern the lives of students there and which they can expect to be exposed to.

C. Students going abroad are attached to their homeland, always feel a link to it, and wish to keep up with events there and with the achievements which are taking place in their homeland. Because of this, it is necessary for the Ministry of Information to have each student abroad subscribe to a newspaper or magazine of his choice which would then be sent directly to his address via the press organizations.

D. As much as possible, one should benefit from the presence of official representatives [in the foreign countries] who meet with the students, examine their situation, and study their problems. This should be done in coordination with the education offices which, in turn, assume the task of making preparations for such meetings with the students.

In order that the students be carefully kept track of, it is necessary to fix the responsibility [for doing this job] by unifying the supervisory and stipend-paying agency in the Office for Government-Subsidized Education Abroad in the Ministry of Higher Education. This should apply to all government-subsidized students abroad with the exception of military people who are engaging in military studies and training. All government bodies which have government-subsidized students abroad should transfer the funds necessary for their students from their accounts to the account of the Ministry of Higher Education at the beginning of each fiscal year. Furthermore, the above-mentioned Office should keep these government bodies informed concerning their students abroad, and should do so in the form of periodic reports.

2. Principle of Government-Subsidized Education Abroad

In view of the fact that most of the problems of government-subsidized students abroad usually occur among younger students who have usually been sent to study at a level lower than that of graduate level education, and since universities in Saudi Arabia have the capability of providing all university courses, the committee recommends the following:

A. Restricting government-subsidized education abroad to graduate level education and not sending any students abroad to engage in studies below this level, whether the ones being sent are students or government employees.

B. Not sending any students abroad before they have worked for the government for at least 2 years. This condition should be adhered to except in exceptional cases. And in such exceptional cases the matter should be studied by the minister of higher education and the head of the Civil Service Bureau, and should require the approval of the Higher Commission.

C. Not sending any student abroad until the educational attache in the government body which will be sending him obtains admission for him to the university which he will be attending. Also, this university should be an acceptable university.

D. The universities, together with the government bodies which have the need, should make a study of this need and set up appropriate programs and courses of study which would make it unnecessary to send students abroad, particularly in the field of university studies.

3. Salaries, Stipend Payments, and Allowances

The committee also made a study of the salaries, stipend payments, and allowances which are being paid out to government-subsidized students abroad, and came to the following conclusion:

A. Salaries: A great many of the government-subsidized students abroad are basically government employees and receive their employees' salaries in addition to their stipends as students. The amount of the salaries paid out to these students at the present time differs from one government body to another. Some of the government bodies pay out the entire salary, whereas most of the government bodies pay only half of the salary. In view of this fact, and in order to adhere to the principle of equality, [all] government employees who are sent abroad to study should receive half of their salary.

B. The committee recommends that the stipend payments be established in terms of Saudi riyals in order to achieve equality in stipend payments without increasing them. This should be done in accordance with the following:

a. The countries which the students are sent to should be divided into two categories according to their economic situations. The first category should include the United States, Canada, Latin America, Europe, Japan, and China. The second category should include other Arab and Muslim countries as well as the other countries.

b. Stipends of students in countries in the first category should be set at 2,600 Saudi riyals, and the stipends of students in countries in the second category should be set at 1,600 Saudi riyals.

c. Students in countries in the first category should receive a one-time annual payment of 1,200 riyals for this purpose. These payments should be made only for the fixed period of government-subsidized study abroad and should not be paid for any period which exceeds this uniform established period of study.

d. Students in countries in the first category should receive a clothing allowance of 4,000 riyals, and students in countries in the second category should receive a clothing allowance of 2,000 riyals. These should be annual one-time payments, and they should not be paid out for any years in excess of the years which have been established for study abroad and which are the same for everyone.

e. For students in countries of both categories a sum of 3,000 riyals should be paid out to students in advanced applied studies as an allowance for buying scientific equipment and implements. This payment should be paid out one time for every stage of scientific education.

f. The sum of 3,000 riyals should be paid out one time for every stage of scientific education as an allowance for students of high theoretical studies to buy source materials.

g. Every student abroad should receive an annual payment of 3,000 riyals as an allowance for the typing of papers and reports.

h. An incentive payment should be made to each student for every academic semester which he studies. But the academic load which each student has should be 15 semester hours in universities which follow the two-semester system and 18 semester hours in universities which follow the three-semester system. This applies to the undergraduate level. As for the graduate level, the student must take at least 12 semester hours in universities which follow two-semester system and 15 semester hours in universities which follow the three-semester system.

i. The stipend payments should be paid out at the rate of full salary for students who have achieved a grade [average] of 4 points our of a possible 4, and should be paid out at a rate of half salary to students who have achieved a grade [average] of 3 points out of a possible 4. This should apply to the undergraduate level. Stipend payments should be paid out at the rate of full salary to graduate-level students who have shown their excellence by achieving a grade [average] of 3.5 points out of a possible 4. Incentive payments should be paid out to students who have not changed their field of specialization and whose university is one which is of a high level and which has been recommended by the Saudi education offices and universities

j. Bachelor students should receive 4,00 riyals and married students, whose wives live with them, should receive 8,000 riyals every year as an allowance for medical expenses, and the Saudi government should assume the expenses of any surgical operations.

k. Married students whose wives live with them should receive a monthly payment equal to 50 percent of their stipends. This should be paid out as long as their wives live with them in the countries where they are studying. Furthermore, a sum of money equivalent to 25 percent [of their stipend payments] should be paid out for each child of theirs living with them. However, the total of such payments should not exceed 50 percent of their stipend payments.

4. These rules should, without exception, apply to all government ministries and departments and public establishments. They should supersede all previous decisions or orders which conflict with them.

5. The committee feels that all government-subsidized students abroad should enjoy the benefits of this fiscal system. But students who have already started their study programs should not be affected. They should continue to receive their money in accordance with the benefits of systems of payment which precede any decisions taken on the basis of these recommendations in addition to the benefits of this system.

6. General Recommendations

Students abroad encounter difficulties when faced with the problem of educating their children in accordance with the educational programs followed in Saudi Arabia. There are no schools abroad which follow curricula similar to those in Saudi Arabia, and this forces the students to either leave their children behind or to tutor them. In order to solve this problem the committee recommends the following:

A. The Ministry of Education and General Superintendency for the Education of Girls, in conjunction with the education offices, should be entrusted with the task of preparing studies which would result in an integrated plan to open schools for both the children of government-subsidized students abroad and the children of Saudi officials and those who are members of families of Muslim and Arab communities abroad.

B. The Ministry of Education and General Superintendency for the Education of Girls should undertake to create special educational programs for the children of government-subsidized students who have been abroad and who are returning. The task of such educational programs would be to qualify them for, and facilitate their reentry into, the normal educational program.

C. Most government-subsidized students abroad face the problem of finding housing when they have graduated. However, this problem is not solely one encountered by these students who have been abroad. It is also encountered to the same degree by those who have studied in universities in Saudi Arabia. As a means of solving this problem, some government agencies give housing or housing allowances to those who work for them. In view of this problem, the committee recommends that a sum of 50,000 riyals be paid to each graduate who becomes part of the government work force, on the condition that he was a regular full-time student and not just a part-time student.

D. The Civil Service Bureau should be entrusted with the task of making a study of the principle of having the government subsidize students who study at universities inside Saudi Arabia, especially when they are students who are pursuing graduate studies.

TASK, OBJECTIVE OF INSTITUTE OF PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION DISCUSSED

Jiddah SAUDI BUSINESS in English No 24, 9 Oct 81 p 18

[Article by Habib Rahaman: "Keeping Pace With Administrative Needs"]

[Text]

AMONG THE MANY institutions set up by Saudi Arabia to lift performances in government offices, the Institute of Public Administration is doing a pioneer service. Training and retraining public servants are a continuing process to meet the challenges of industrial and technological advancements, on the one hand, and on the other, to keep pace with the progress made in social, behavioral and administrative research.

Muhammad Al Ateiq, acting director of the institute, Jeddah branch, defined a multitude of functions for the institute. One is to set up and execute educational and training programs for civil servants; a second, to conduct research in cooperation with government authorities; a third, to collect, classify and catalogue government administrative documents of the Kingdom. The institute's main office is in Riyadh and has a branch in Dammam.

The acting director also cited: holding conferences on development administration to be attended by top-level civil servants; calling for Arab regional and international conferences in the Kingdom and participating in similar conferences abroad; publishing research data and exchanging such within the Kingdom and with Arab and other countries. Also important is encouraging scientific administrative research by offering leave time and remuneration; offering educational and training scholarships in various fields of administrative affairs; and accepting training from Arab countries as well as benefiting from technical and material assistance offered by international agencies and private institutions.

The institute, an autonomous body of the government, was constituted through a royal degree in 1961. Its affairs are managed by a board of directors constituting the minister of finance and national economy as its president, the deputy minister of education, the vice rector of the University of Riyadh, the vice president of the Civil Service Bureau, and the director general of the institute. The noteworthy factor of the institute is that it does not charge any fees from the trainees, and its financial obligations are met through the grants of the government

Muhammad Al Ateiq said the institute has nine main departments, through which it imparts the required training. The department of in-service training is responsible for designing, organizing and executing training programs for different government employees who have already put in at least one year of service with the government and are exposed empirically to the problems of management. Programs have been held in the following areas: management, operations and management, personnel administration, financial administration, planning and development, statistics, school administration, higher secretaryship, material administration, office work, typing (Arabic and English), and computers.

The department of pre-service training was created after the institute found that completely "ready trained and ready to work" persons cannot be generally found to fill vacant posts. Under this scheme, specialized education in various administrative and allied field is given to meet the manpower requirements of the government in the coming years. For these programs, fresh graduates are taken from high schools and universities, depending upon the level of future responsibilities of the trainees, for the training in various programs according to the interest and aptitude of the employees. Studies in legal affairs, finance, administration, customs, statistics, hospital administration, and citizenship all have been undertaken. A computer training program has also been added this year. The department of executive development organizes programs for top-level officers of the government. The objective of the program is to keep them abreast of the latest developments in their fields. Under the department of special programs, training for various governmental agencies whose needs are not met through the other programs is organized. Sometimes, the training needs are typical of an agency or a group of agencies warranting an exclusive special training.

The aim of the English language department is to develop in the selected government employees a degree of proficiency in English through an intensive or semi-intensive programs, so trainees are able to perform their professional duties more efficiently and more effectively. The department of library and documentation collects books, periodicals, pamphlets, and all kinds of reports. Files of all newspapers and magazines published in Saudi Arabia are maintained. There is a special section for educational films. Microfilms of selected newspaper and periodicals are also available. The reference section of the library has the latest editions of encyclopedias, bibliographies, indices, almanacs, and atlases. Presently, the library holds over 50,000 volumes,mostly in Arabic and English, and receives more than 300 journals and periodicals. It also publishes a quarterly bulletin. Al Ateiq said that the department of consultations helps public agencies in solving their administrative, organizational and procedural problems. It conducts studies on specific problems and gives its recommendations. So far, it has conducted more than 300 studies.

Research is undertaken by its own department, too. It also cooperates with the concerned officials in the government agencies in directing and supervising their studies. Al Ateiq said that the institute's educational technology center produces and maintains audiovisual materials such as motion picture films, videotapes, slides and slide tapes, and other media which help promote the efficiency and effectiveness of the training. It also maintains a well-equipped auditorium and conference halls with facilities for simultaneous translations. The secretariat for administrative reforms' main function is to coordinate the work relating to the High Committee for Administrative Reforms and the Staff Committee for Administrative Reforms. It prepares agendas and drafts the minutes of meetings of the two committees.

RESULTS OF SURVEY MADE AMONG FEMALE LITERACY STUDENTS

Riyadh AL-RIYAD in Arabic 15 Aug 81 Supplement p 9

[Article by Susan Mustafa: "The Effect of Anti-Illiteracy Programs on the Saudi Home"]

> [Text] The Anti-Illiteracy Campaign Is Moving in Two Directions: Expansion of Elementary Education, and Concentration on Adult Education. How Do Women and Mothers Utilize Their Education in Their Dealings With Others?

What do 200 illiterate women have to say about the effect which the elimination of illiteracy has had on both their private and public lives?

Have they changed their ways of dealing with their husbands, children, and neighbors? What changes have taken place in their homes and in their management of the household in accordance with available resources? What means have they followed to solve both their general and personal problems? Have they changed their ways of utilizing their spare time?

The answers to these questions are given in a scientific study which was done concerning the effect which the elimination of illiteracy has had on Saudi women in both their private and public lives. The research study was carried out by the [female] students of the Higher Institute of Social Service in Riyadh.

Scope of the Problem

Statistical estimates tell us that the rate of illiteracy in Saudi Arabia is between 70 and 75 percent, and that it is more widespread among older men, women, people in rural areas, and among the Bedouins who constantly migrate from place to place. In keeping with the overall advancement which is taking place in all areas of the country and which requires that human resources be appropriately trained in order to take over the reins of this movement of progress, legislation was enacted concerning the elimination of illiteracy and concerning adult education in Saudi Arabia on 9 Jumada II 1932 A.J., and a time-frame of not more than 20 years was set for the elimination of illiteracy and ridding the country of its effects. In order to arrive at an integral statistical picture concerning the efforts which have been made during the last 5 years to educate women and concerning the effect which this has had on their lives, the researchers undertook a comparative investigative study involving both literate and illiterate women.

A Campaign in Two Directions

During the last 10 years, from 1385 A.H. to 1935 A.H. [as published], the campaign to eliminate illiteracy in Saudi Arabia has been moving in two directions. The first direction has been that of increasing facilities for elementary education in order to uproot illiteracy among the very young, and the second direction has been that of concentrated efforts made to bring literacy to adults. In addition to the Ministry of Education, [other bodies participating in the anti-illiteracy campaign have been] the Ministry of Defense, the Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs, the Public Security Policy Directorate, the General Superintendency for the Education of Girls, and national organizations.

During this period the number of adult education centers rose from 393 to 1,425. Also, the number of literacy students increased three-fold during this period, reaching a total of approximately 100,000 men and women.

The adult education system consists of a stage lasting 16 months during which time illiteracy is eliminated, followed by another stage of equal length which is devoted to further education. When a literacy student completes the first stage of elimination of illiteracy, his reading level is equal to that of a fourth-grade elementary school pupil.

Elimination of Illiteracy Among Women in Saudi Arabia

The 20-year plan for elimination of illiteracy contains three stages, which are: preparation, trial testing, and complete implementation--which means eliminating all remaining pockets of illiteracy.

The General Superintendency for the Education of Girls began by opening five schools for the elimination of illiteracy in the year 1392-93 A.H. Then the number of these schools gradually increased until, 3 years later, every town or village covered by the plan had one or more schoos for the elimination of illiteracy. In the third year of the program, the total number of these schools went up to 322, and the number of literacy classes was about three times as large as the number of such classes during the previous 2 years. One result of this was a tremendous increase in the number of female literacy students.

It should be noted here that the efforts made to eliminate illiteracy have not been restricted to quantity, but have also been directed toward qualitative development. Efforts are constantly being made to improve the anti-illiteracy programs as far as the courses, planning, and school books are concerned, so that the programs are appropriate for women, respond to the needs of their daily lives, and incorporate the possibility of these women to make a conscious contribution toward the development of society. There are also programs which are being prepared for educating women in matters regarding motherhood, children, the family, principles of sanitation, and household management. Since the Superintendency realizes the importance of eliminating illiteracy among women, it participates in all conferences [dealing with this matter] which are held. It has participated in both the international UNESCO conferences and the Arab UNESCO conferences.

Development of the Courses

When the literacy schools for women were opened, they had no special course. They proceeded in accordance with the literacy and adult education course which the Ministry of Education had set up--and which was basically set up for male literacy students. But then in 1397 A.H. a special course for women was set up in order to enable them to educate the young. In other words, courses were developed which were appropriate for women's mission in life and for their own particular cultural realms.

The Second Five-Year Plan

When the second five-year plan began, it contained particular objectives with regard to the elimination of illiteracy. These objectives indluded the following:

1. Increasing the number of anti-illiteracy centers in order to include, as students, the largest possible number of illiterate women. At the end of the second five-year plan, there were 1,312 literacy schools.

2. Increasing the number of literacy classes. By the end of the second five-year plan the number of such classes went up from 963 to 13,125.

3. Decreasing the number of students in each class so that there would be no more than 30 students in each one.

4. Providing educational opportunities for eliminating illiteracy in rural areas.

5. Increasing the total number of [female] literacy students. At the end of the second five-year plan the number of such students totalled 393,751.

6. Increasing the number of newly-recruited [female] students.

7. Striving to choose a particular type of [female] teacher to work in the anti-illiteracy program. This was to be achieved by training such teachers in educational methods appropriate for the type of students they would have.

8. Providing the necessary academic requirements to complete the educational process.

9. Use of various types of informational media in these centers. Here we should point out that the anti-illiteracy centers have also opened their doors to women who are not Saudis. At the end of the second five-year plan, the number of [non-Saudi] Arab female students was more than 2,500, and the number of [non-Arab] foreign female students was nearly 1,500.

Integration of Efforts

In addition to what has already been mentioned, the Ministry of Social Affairs has opened literacy classes for women in its Centers of Development and Social Service. These classes use the courses set up by the Ministry of Education, and the Ministry provides them with the necessary technical assistance.

There are also private national associations for the teaching and education of women, and these associations are found in Saudi Arabia's large cities. Of course, these efforts hav also resulted in a large increase in the number of female literacy students.

The Field Study

With this as a theoretical scientific background for the research topic, the scholars began the second part of their undertaking, which was the field study. The study was conducted with a sample population of 200 female students in the anti-illiteracy schools run by the General Superintendency for the Education of Girls. Also, another comparable sample population of 50 illiterate women was chosen. This was done in order to discover the effect which the elimination of illiteracy had had on both their public and private lives, and to find out if there was any difference between what educated women and illiterate women do in their daily lives.

Surprising Results

By comparing the results of the social status of both the literacy students and the illiterate women, surprising results were arrived at, and they were different from what the researchers had expected. In fact, they were precisely the opposite of what they had expected. They found out the following:

1. Size of the family: The female literacy students live in an extended family which includes grandparents, children, husbands and wives, and the children of those of the men who are married, together with their wives. But we find that the illiterate women live in families which include only husbands and children. It was found that women in extended families saw the children going through the various stages of education and that this was an incentive for them to become educated.

2. Educational status: The percentage of illiterate people in the families of the female literacy students was not more than 15 percent, whereas this percentage in the families of illiterate women was 64 percent. This confirms the previous result arrived at.

3. Children: The literacy students have no children younger than 10 years of age. The illiterate women, though, have children who are not old enough to go to school and who therefore take up their time, not giving them a chance to take advantage of opportunities for education.

4. Husbands: The husbands of the literacy students are usually merchants and men who engage in the free professions, and their work requires them to be gone from home for long periods of time. The number of working hours which these husbands spend away from home varies from 6 to 9 hours, and this gives their wives an opportunity to study. But in the case of the husbands of the illiterate women, their working hours total no more than 7 hours.

Comparative Study

Then the researchers compared the answers of the literacy students with those of the illiterate women in five particular realms in order to find out what the effect of education has been on their private and public lives.

Household Development

Concerning household development, the researchers found that 40.5 percent of the literacy students had moved to better living areas, 91 percent of them had changed their household furniture, and 44 percent of them were unhappy with their housing and were thinking about moving to another place. Sometimes they mentioned that the reason for this was that the living conditions were not sanitary. What this means is that they had acquired particular standards for their homes and wanted to put them into practice. In addition to this, it was found that literacy students utilized their resources in a more progressive fashion. They allocate a monthly sum for the renovation of household supplies and goods, and they save part of the income in the form of jewelry. Although this means freezing a part of the household income, through education they can learn to switch over from doing this to investing their financial surplus.

On the other hand, none of the illiterate women had changed their place of residence, although 36 percent of the illiterate women in the sample population had renovated their household furniture. Although one-third of those in the sample population complained about cramped living quarters or high rents, none of them had found a way to solve these problems. In addition to this, it was found that they spend all of their family income on food, clothing, education, and entertaining guests--and on this latter activity they spend large sums of money.

Manner of Dealing With Others

The study showed that the literacy students had eight different ways in which they felt they had to interact with their husbands, and that they had learned about these ways from five sources. The illiterate women, though, knew only two ways of doing their marital duties, and had learned them from three sources.

As for dealing with the children, the study showed that there were seven areas involving child care and five methods of accomplishing this child care. This was the result of the answers given by the literacy students. But the illiterate women said that they were involved in only four areas of child care and that this was accomplished by three methods. They did not feel that it was necessary to supervise their children when they played, and they did not know the benefit of taking the children for a walk in the fresh air.

The results also showed a difference when it came to dealing with neighbors. The literacy students said that they had five different ways of trying to be a good neighbor, and that they had learned these things from five different sources. The illiterate women, on the other hand, knew of only three such methods and had learned them from only two sources.

Application of Religious Knowledge

In spite of the religious atmosphere which is especially prevalent in Saudi society, it was shown that education had its effect in increasing and intensifying knowledge of religion. This was clearly shown by the percentages of the sources from which the women in the two sample groups acquired their information when interacting with their husbands, children, and neighbors. It turned out that 25 percent of the illiterate woemn acquired their information from their knowledge of religion, whereas this percentage among the literacy students was 48 percent. As for knowledge about religious observances and teachings, the literacy students had much more knowledge concerning these matters. Their knowledge was measured at 92 percent, whereas this knowledge among the illiterate women was only 49 percent.

Use of Spare Time

The literacy students knew the value of taking walks with the children and the effect that such walks had on integration of the family and on promoting mutual understanding between the generations and bringing them closer. This is something that not even one of the illiterate women knew. They also had learned how to organize their spare time every day so that it would be divided between the household, caring for the children, and educating and furthering [themselves].

Scientific Approach

It was also shown that learning gave the literacy students educational awareness concerning how to solve their problems in all realms, and that they resort to a scientific approach when doing so. And the more educated the person was, the less that person resorted to a non-scientific approach.

For Educated Women Only

The researchers directed a number of particular questions to the educated women alone in order to find out what problems they encountered of an educational, economic, and social nature, and how they were able to deal with and solve these problems. Concerning educational problems, the respondents confirmed that there were five of them, namely: lack of ability to learn, fear of or embarrassment about making mistakes, lack of time, how the teachers dealt with them, and inappropriate study topics. They also mentioned ten reasons for failing in their school work, including: neglect, laziness, lack of concentration, not being able to study full-time, and a poor memory. They suggested seven ways of dealing with these problems, including: paying more attention, organizing one's time, going to school longer, and the use of more audio-visual aids.

What this shows is that they were able to identify the reasons and were able to suggest solutions.

As for economic problems, those who had acquired education were able to switch from one job to another which paid more and was less strenuous. Also, some of them had been able to acquire a new type of job. In both cases they strove to earn more money and to balance the household budget in a more comprehensive fashion. As for social problems, 22 percent of the respondents said that they faced the problem of the husband having a previous wife. Four-fifths of this 22 percent were able to keep their husbands, and their husbands did not marry again after marrying them. In the case of the illiterate women, 20 percent of them married husbands who had previous wives. However, only half of the women in this 20 percent were able to keep their husbands.

Clear Effect of Education

1. Improving their household situation as well as their income situation, either by budgeting the money for spending and saving or by increasing the income through getting a job or by changing from one job to another.

2. Finding numerous ways of exercising their duties as a spouse, and the same was true with regard to care of the children.

3. Increasing their knowledge of their religion and applying this knowledge well since they understood the importance of it.

4. Learning the value of time and how to make use of it by organizing their spare time and utilizing it in different realms.

5. The use, by a large percentage of the literacy students, of a scientific approach toward solving their problems.

Important Recommendations

As a conclusion to the scientific results which the researchers arrived at, they presented a number of important recommendations which we should take up. They included the following: The concept of eliminating illiteracy traditionally relies on teaching reading, writing, and arithmetic to illiterate adults. In this sense, it is an educational process more than it is a social process since the elimination of illiteracy leads to the opening of broader horizons of knowledge to an individual. However, it would be better to expand the objectives and programs of this approach of teaching adults so that it would include the following:

The social aspect: The anit-illiteracy programs should try to educate their [female] students so that they will be enlightened and able to keep pace with the modern development within whose framework society is moving toward a better life.

The intellectual and psychological aspect: This aspect grants these students the opportunity to develop and grow within their society. Perhaps these students are unable to benefit from modern changes because they are unable to understand them in an enlightened manner.

Therefore, the anit-illiteracy programs should be oriented toward having their students acquire new intellectual skills, values, and directions which complement their personalities. They should provide them with new means of fulfilling their lives, should enable them to better understand life, and should enable them to continually utilize what they have learned from their self-development and from the development of their society. They should become able to make sound judgments concerning the events in their lives and should be able to participate, in a positive and effective way, in the solving of the social problems which confront them.

Being Part of a Group

Elimination of illiteracy is traditionally done by means of a particular school book. But in the opinion of the literacy students, it would be better if the program, for its educational material and in order to move toward achieving its objectives, would rely on the long experience which the literacy students have had in their own lives. The programs should use this experience as a basis for their teaching. This should be done so that such adult education will fulfill the needs of the individual students and satisfy their aspirations for a better life--and at the same time develop their knowledge so that it can keep pace with modern changes.

The Importance of Further Study

The researchers emphasize the necessity of keeping track of those students who fail to attend class, of helping them to solve the problems which prevent them from pursuing their sutdies, and of enabling them to maintain the level of knowledge which they have achieved. This requires that the class hours be well chosen after ascertaining the preferences of the students who will be taking part in the literacy courses, and this should be done before the classes begin. This also requires being fully aware of the objectives of the program of study and linking the program to the everyday needs of the students. This should be done because adult education should always be based on a realistic premise which impels the student to assess her current status and to see what benefit will be gained from the educational experience in terms of improving her status. It is also necessary to have the successful graduates continue their studies, and this should be done by opening the doors of evening classes to them in all of the other educational and vocational levels. For example, they should be able to take classes in order to become lab assistants and nurses. All of this should be done in order to prevent them from once again reverting to their former status of being illiterates.

Using Informational Media

Efforts should be made to utilize informational media in awareness campaigns concerning the elimination of illiteracy. At the same time, careful selection should be made of successful programs and methods which are appropriate for the person requesting the informational media, and this should be done by means of indirect notification.

Methods of Learning

A student needs correct orientation and needs to be trained how to listen to and follow the lessons. She also needs to have the freedom to express her ideas and feelings and to engage in discussion without any feeling of fear or embarrassment. The students should also get acquainted with and get used to each other. Likewise they should participate in the teaching process. And they should work toward mastering the course. In addition to all of this, the students' general social motives should be linked to their own particular motives, and if this takes place then the school can thereby help them to formulate their own motives for learning.

Previous and Future Research Studies

At the end of their research study, the scholars were careful to mention previous studies that had been made. One such study was a field study concerning the degree to which literacy students had benefited from anti-illiteracy programs in the year 1397 A.H. This study was conducted by a group of students from the Institute, and their sample population consisted of 90 literacy students. They were asked the following questions: Why are you taking the course? Do you intend to continue with it? Do you study diligently for the course? What is your opinion about what you are studying and about how useful the course is? What is your opinion about the teaching method of the course? What are the greatest difficulties that you are facing? What are your suggestions concerning this?

The respondents answered that they were taking the course because they personally wanted to, and they wished to continue with it. They answered that they had benefited from the courses that were being taught, and they agreed that there were several difficulties which they faced, mainly the difficulty of the courses. They said that they did not have enough time to study, and that too much study was required each day.

Concerning future research studies, the literacy students suggested the possibility of using this study as an aid when conducting other research studies that would be more comprehensive and would include sample populations from among literacy students in classes in cities, rural areas, and desert areas in all regions of the country. On the basis of such studies one could gain an overall picture which would be helpful in the planning of literacy courses for women.

PLANS FOR NEW RAILROAD LINE REVIEWED

[Article: "A Railroad Line Connecting Mecca with Medina Is in the Fourth Five-Year Plan; the Riyadh Customs Station Is Ready to Unload 2,000 Containers a Month; the Fixing of Fees for Transporting Containers from al-Dammam to Riyadh"]

[Text] Al-Ta'if, Saudi News Agency--Yesterday there was a meeting of the board of directors of the Saudi Government Railroad Organization, chaired by His Excellency Dr Ghazi al-Qusaybi, minister of industry and electricity and deputy minister of communications. Those present at the meeting were the members of the board of directors.

After the meeting, Shaykh Faysal al-Shahil, the director-general of the Organization, told the press that the broad discussed the subject of setting rates for the transport of containers from the port of al-Dammam to the customs station in Riyadh. He said that the purpose of this discussion was to determine some of the fees and rates connected with this activity. He said that the board made sure that these fees and rates would be reasonable so that they would not be a burden to consumers and, at the same time, would not be competitive with those charged by truckers. He said that the board approved what was submitted to it concerning this matter. Shaykh al-Shahil indicated that there were companies which had gotten in touch with the Government Railroad Organization concerning the use of railroad cars to transport dry cement from al-Dammam to Riyadh, and that particular rates had been approved for transporting these materials. He also indicated that the board had approved the Organization's budget for the year 1402-03 A.H. He added that the board had approved the promotion of some of the Organization's employees and that it had granted the Organization's director-general some emergency powers.

Concerning a question dealing with the possibility of having a railroad line connecting Riyadh with the Hijaz, al-Shahil said that the third five-year plan included a comprehensive study of the railroad lines in all of the regions of Saudi Arabia as well as a study of their economic feasibility and which priority was to be given to which line or to which area, depending on the results of the study. As for linking Saudi Arabia by rail with some of its neighboring Arab countries, he said that this subject was currently under study.

He pointed out that the government of Kuwait had suggested the construction of a railroad line which would connect it with Saudi Arabia. He said: "We suggested to our fellow-Arabs in Kuwait that the plan be postponed until Kuwait is linked [by rail] with Iraq so that there would be greater benefit in having a railroad line between Saudi Arabia and Kuwait. [The possibility of constructing] this railroad line is currently under study." The director-general of the Saudi Government Railroad Organization denied that the customs station in Riyadh was suffering from any congestion. He said: "So far we have not felt any pressure, but there is an increasing amount of activity. The first month that the station was open it unloaded 150 containers, and the third month after it was opened this figure totaled 980 containers." He assured us that the station was prepared to unload approximately 2,000 containers per month. "If we see that there is too much pressure on the station, then we will construct new railroad lines since we are prepared to do this in terms of what we have in the way of financial allocations, equipment, and job slots."

Concerning the railroad line which would connect the holy places of pilgrimage with each other, al-Shahil said that this subject had already been discussed in the first two meeting organized by the Ministry of Planning in Riyadh and in Jiddah. He pointed out that the two meetings had approved a working paper which had been submitted by the Saudi Government Railroad Organization. This working paper had stated that the construction of railroad lines should not be restricted to the holy places of pilgrimage and Jiddah, but should connect all of the holy pilgrimage places, including Medina. In addition to this, the working paper also said that there should be transportation of goods along with a customs station, [meaning that] the goods should be shipped from Jiddag and processed by customs in Mecca as is done in the station which is in Riyadh. It is expected that this railroad line will be built during the fourth five-year plan. He expressed his satisfaction concerning the level of efficiency and expertise in their jobs which Saudi personnel working in the Railroad Organization have achieved. He pointed out that the Railroad Organziation had established a vocational training center in order to create a new generation [of employees] who would have the skills necessary to do jobs connected wiht the railroad system. Concerning the importation of new trains, the director-general of the Saudi Government Railroad Organization said that many of the air-conditioned trains had been renovated and that they were faster than the old trains. He also said that modern methods of microfilming had been introduced into the work of the Organization, and that the Organization intended to introduce the use of computers--in cooperation with the University of Petroleum and Minerals.

FIVE PORTS HANDLE INCREASING IMPORTS

Jiddah SAUDI BUSINESS in English No 24, 9 Oct 81 pp 15-17

[Article by Ahmad Kamal Khusro: "Five Ports Handle SR 100bn in Imports"]

[Text] IMPORTS NOW valued at more than SR100 billion a year and vital to the Kingdom's development, continue to flow into Saudi ports. Dr. Fayez I. Badr, chairman of the Saudi Ports Authority (SPA) said in 1976 SPA's five major ports handled about 10 million tons of cargo. In 1980 the figure rose to 28.8 million tons, a remarkable increase of 188 per cent.

The chairman, reviewing progress of the ports during the last year, said the allocation for seaports in the Third Development Plan is almost SR24 billion and is a testimony to "the success which has been achieved in the four years since the creation of the Ports Authority in September 1976."

He pointed out the authority has been able to introduce modern management techniques, large-scale investments in basic berth capacity and sophisticated cargo-handling equipment. "Significant milestones passed during the year include the publication of unified and consolidated rules for the ports, the preparation of unified tariffs and greatly improved safety measures for personnel and cargo," said Badr. "In the future, the completion of the hydrographic survey of the Kingdom's Red Sea Coast and the provision of ship repair yards at Jeddah and Dammam will be of immeasurable value to those who navigate in the Red Sea."

Badr cited the increasing role of ports, noting "ports will become our new pipelines carrying raw materials and manufactured goods to and from the Kingdom. The Kingdom's commitment to free trade combined with its ever increasing import requirements mean that in the next five years we expect at least a further 50 per cent increase in cargo passing through the ports."

In its annual report for 1980, SPA said that compared with 1979, the total volume of cargo discharged rose by more than 3 million tons to 27.5 million tons, an increase of 13 per cent. There was a noted improvement in the performance of the ports of Jubail, Jizan and Yanbu, whose development as modern ports started only recently. Cargo discharge at Jubail increased by 58 per cent from just under 1 million tons in 1979 to over 1.5 million tons last year. Jizan port and Yanbu Commercial Port discharged 1.5 million and 1.3 million tons respectively, increases of 42 per cent and 24 per cent over 1979. The Kingdom's largest port, Jeddah Islamic Port maintained its pre-eminent position. About 14 million tons of cargo, representing 51 per cent of the Kingdom's seaborne imports came through this port, an increase of 11 per cent from last year. At King Abdul Aziz Port, Dammam, discharge increased by 5 per cent to 9.2 million tons.

Reflecting the Kingdom's continuing development plans, construction materials formed the major part of seaborne imports, amounting to 17 million tons, an increase of 13 per cent over 1979. Within this group of commodities, imports of bulk cement rose by 43 per cent to 9.2 million tons. The much less efficient import of bagged cement declined by 52 per cent to 1.5 million tons, showing the market's support of the SPA's decision to provide efficient and cost-saving specialist bulk cement facilities.

Foodstuff imports during last year rose by more than 12 per cent to 5.9 million tons. Imports through Jeddah port alone amounted to 4.4 million tons, representing an increase of 21 per cent over last year. The number of livestock handled at Jeddah rose by 19 per cent to nearly 3 million head, and the port maintained its position as the world's largest livestock handling port.

The trend toward containerization of exports to the Kingdom continued steadily during last year, the report said. Nearly 820,000 TEUs were handled compared with 714,000 TEUs in 1979, showing an increase of 15 per cent. This increase helped both Jeddah and Dammam ports to enhance their position among the 50 most important container ports of the world.

Since this trend toward containerization is to gather speed in the coming years, the Ports Authority is providing better facilities to handle container cargo. About 35 per cent of all general cargo arriving in Jeddah is now containerized. To keep pace with rapidly changing patterns of cargo structure, container freight stations are being developed in Dammam and Jeddah. These stations will start operation in 1982, reducing the proportion of bulk cargo and raising productivity still further.

Refrigerated cargo represented nearly 15 per cent of all food imports in 1979 and 1980, the discharge itself being affected by the lack of cold stores in the Jeddah area. In view of the climate conditions and the importance of this cargo, berths 13 and 14 are being developed as a multipurpose food and fruit terminal. Vessels carrying chilled cargo generally will be allocated there. This new terminal, scheduled for completion in 1983, will have fully computerized discharge and delivery procedures.

According to the report, plans are ready for a livestock terminal which will facilitate more efficient discharge, care and delivery of animals. A new multipurpose terminal will be built in the northwest area of the port. The new berths at this terminal will provide productive facilities for dealing with timber, steel and vehicles. Another passenger terminal will be developed in the northwest area to provide improved services to pilgrims.

During 1980 six new berths have been brought into operation, increasing the number of berths available from 37 to 43. Other construction to date includes a 1.5-km causeway and the formation of a 11-hectare island. The steel skeleton of the 12,000-sq.-meter workshop and storage facility is largely completed, as is work on main buildings.

Installation of overhead cranes will start shortly. Construction of mooring dolphins in depths of up to 30 meters has begun. All work continues without any disruption in the Jeddah port's normal operations. The shipyard's two floating docks with lifting capacities of 16,000 and 11,000 tons will be capable of accommodating vessels of 45,000 and 16,000 deadweight tons respectively and will provide much needed facilities for all vessels using the Red Sea.

TUNIS/SOVIET COOPERATION

[Editorial Report] PM091521 Tunis L'ACTION in French 27-31 October and 1 November carries on pages 6, 4 and 4 respectively unattributed reports totalling 1,700 words on a visit to Tunisia by Serafim Ivanov, collegium member of the Soviet ministry of land reclamation and water resources. L'ACTION of 27 October reports a 26 October meeting between Ivanov and Tunisian Minister of Public Works Mohamd Sayah at which Ivanov reportedly expressed "his government's desire to extend and strengthen cooperation with Tunisia, particularly in the sphere of water resources, which is vital for agricultural development." The 30 October edition of L'ACTION reports on another meeting between Sayah and Ivanov on 29 October at which they reviewed past cooperation in the sphere of water resources and examined ways of extending it in the framework of Tunisia's sixth development plan. Ivanov reportedly expressed his government's desire for a "major program of cooperation for the future." The 1 November edition of L'ACTION reports a meeting on 31 October between Ivanov and Tunisian President Bourguiba, after which Ivanov issued a statement to the TAP Agency describing the meeting as "very useful and fruitful" and saying it "will contribute to extending the spheres of cooperation between Tunisia and the Soviet Union."

ARMS DEAL REVEALED

[Editorial Report] PM091410 Paris LE MONDE in French 6 Nov 81 p 10 unattributed report: "Tunisia Has Bought Three Missile-Launching Patrol Boats From France." Tunisia has bought from France three missile-launching patrol boats, building of which will begin next year at the Normandy naval shipyards at Cherbourg. This is revealed by the Flottes de Combat 1982 [1982 battle fleets] yearbook, which has just been published. With a displacement of 425 tons fully laden, these ships, capable of a speed of more than 36 knots (approximately 65 kph) thanks to four 15,000-horsepower diesel engines, will be equipped with eight MM-40 surface-to-surface missiles and three anti-aircraft guns of 76MM and 40MM. The MM-40 missile has a range of 60km. According to Flottes de Comate 1982 the contract between Tunisia and France was actually concluded in June 1981. It will be recalled that Foreign Minister Claude Cheysson and Defense Minister Charles Hernu visited Tunis, the former in July 1981, the latter in August 1981, to guarantee the continuity of Franco-Tunisian relations and France's aid in the modernization of the Tunisian armed forces' equipment.

[Text] The brother leader Col 'Ali 'Abdallah Salih, president of the republic and commander in chief of the armed forces, sent the following cable to King Khalid upon leaving Riyadh Airport:

His Majesty Brother Khalid ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz al Sa'ud, Riyadh. As the members of my delegation and I leave fraternal Saudi Arabia, I would like to express my sincere appreciation for the great hospitality accorded us during our stay in the kingdom. I hope that our meetings and consultations will be repeated in interest of both fraternal countries and all Arab and Islamic issues.

While repeating my profound thanks and appreciation to your majesty all the brother officials, I wish your majesty continued good health and happiness and the fraternal Saudi people continued progress and prosperity under your faithful leadership.

[Signed] Your brother Col 'Ali 'Abdallah Salih, YAR president and commander in chief of the armed forces.

President Salih also sent the following cable to Saudi Crown Prince Fahd:

His Royal Highness Brother Prince Fahd ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz, crown prince and first deputy premier, Riyadh. On my own behalf and on behalf of the members of my delegation, I would like to express our profound thanks and appreciation for the fraternal hospitality which you and all the brother officials accorded us during our stay to the kingdom. We pray to God Almighty to make all our meetings successful in the interest of both countries and the Arab and Islamic nations.

I wish your highness continued good health and happiness.

[Signed] Your brother Col 'Ali 'Abdallah Salih, YAR president and commander in chief of the armed forces.

LIBYA: HUMAN RIGHTS VIOLATIONS DECRIED BY EXPATRIATE

London HUQUQ AL-INSAN WA AL-HURRIYAT AL-ASASIYAH FI DIKTATURIAT AL-QADHDHAFI ["Human Rights and Basic Freedoms in Qadhdhafi's Dictatorship"] in Arabic Jul 81 pp 3-37

[Report by Mahmud Nafi': "Human Rights and Basic Freedoms in al-Qadhdhafi's Dictatorship" with Foreword by Libyan National Grouping, 40 pages]

[Text] Foreword

The late Mahmud 'Abd-al-Salam Nafi' was planning to publish a book in three volumes on "Human Rights and Basic Freedoms in al-Qadhdhafi's Dictatorship." AL-JIHAD used to publish what he wrote on the subject in installments. This book includes these installments as well as other articles hitherto unpublished.

It is evident to every Libyan citizen and to everyone who has been observing al-Qadhdhafi's dictatorship that human rights violations in Libya ever since the late Mahmud Nafi' wrote these articles have increased and that basic freedoms are being increasingly repressed and stifled.

The physical elimination of Libyans living abroad has become a principle of al-Qadhdhafi's criminal conduct. The late Nafi' was one of its first victims. This principle of conduct was emphasized by al-Qadhdhafi himself in his speeches and statements. It was also confirmed at the third meeting of the revolutionary committees and firmly established at the fourth meeting of the revolutionary committees on 1-3 March 1981. Scores of Libyan citizens have become victims of this uncivilized, and offensive principle that al-Qadhdhafi and his henchmen put into practice.

We believe [in the Koranic verse which states] that "Say: 'Nothing will befall us except what Allah has ordained' "[al-Tawbah: 51]. And we believe [in the following Koranic verse]: "You must not think that those who were slain in the cause of Allah are dead. They are alive, and well provided for by their Lord" [Al 'Imran: 169]. Armed with these noble verses [of the Koran] we will defy all obstacles and overcome all difficulties. We will not be humiliated, and we will not grieve. When a believer goes to work, the rocks in the harshest of mountains will yield green plants.

Al-Qadhdhafi and his henchmen mastered their murderous practices and devised new methods for killing people. Their crimes actually became unique. They poisoned children by slipping poison in peanuts, as was the case with two Libyan children, a brother and a sister, in Portsmouth, England. The children were seven and eight years old, and their only crime was the fact that their father resided outside Libya. Then knives and daggers became the method of killing, and one stab to a victim was no longer sufficient. A victim had to be stabbed scores of times in a savage gang-style frenzy of murder and his body was mutilated. This affirms the brutality, the degeneracy and the nefariousness of the criminals and their leader, al-Qadhdhafi, who is neither deterred nor restrained by religion, conscience or morals.

The tyrant continued to master the methods of his crime and his malice which comprised even the remains of those who had died and those he had murdered abroad. He showed the deep resentment he harbored for them when he ordered that they not be buried in Libya. Bodies were returned from the airport. The bodies of those who had been buried in their country, Libya, were exhumed under orders from al-Qadhdhafi and thrown into the sea outside Libyan territorial waters in accordance with al-Qadhdhafi's conditions. His henchmen exhumed the bodies and threw them into the sea. This was done in front of television cameras, and the operation was shown on television as though it were a successful national liberation operation. Al-Qadhdhafi did not realize then that he had sunk to a new despicable low. Is there anything more uncivilized than such conduct? The tyrant reached the utmost in savagery and malice and thereby achieved a record in a new area of the shameful activities in which he is engaged.

Al-Qadhdhafi did not have the opportunity either to reject or to exhume the body of the late Nafi' who was buried in dignity by Libyans and Egyptians in hospitable Egypt, which we can only thank. We are grateful to Egypt, [the country] which acted in accordance wich its Arab and Islamic principles.

The Libyan National Grouping

> On 23 April 1980 the late Mahmud Nafi' wrote a eulogy for the late Muhammad Mustafa Ramadan who was murdered by the treacherous hand of al-Qadhdhafi in front of the London Mosque as he left it after the Friday prayer. This is the text of the eulogy.

The Late Muhammad Mustafa Ramadan

Friday, 11 April was a gloomy day. It was the day the Libyan Muslim, Muhammad Mustafa Ramadan, was assassinated in the courtyard of the mosque in London's Regent Park after the Muslims had concluded their prayers.

The murderers confessed immediately that they were al-Qadhdhafi's soldiers who had come to London specifically to kill a few Libyans. They acknowledged that the victim was one of those they had come to kill.

The series of physical eliminations inside the country and the assassinations that occurred abroad during the month of April will make the month of April known in the history of our country as execution month, ever since al-Qadhdhafi seized power by force in Libya. April will be known as the month of physical eliminations and nefarious assassinations.

Muhammad Mustafa Ramadan was a Muslim in the full sense of the word. He was a Muslim in his purity, in his loyalty and in his moral character. He was a Muslim in word and deed. His Islam was marked by the spirit of the age and by a sense of cultural openness.

Muhammad Mustafa Ramadan came from a well-known family in Tripoli, the ibn Ramadan family. His father went to Egypt when the country was ruled by Italians and returned to Libya in 1953. Muhammad was eight years old then. His father lived with his sister in the old city, and Muhammad attended Libyan schools and Tripoli Secondary School. He appeared to be very fond of Islamic studies, and he began to write during the third preparatory grade. He took an active part in writing newsletters, and he became a prominent announcer on Libyan radio. He left school to work full time as an announcer on Libyan radio. In 1965 he was summoned by Sadiq Khashkhushah, who was then director of investigations, and he was questioned about his activities. His services then became unsatisfactory, so he joined the British Broadcasting Corporation, the BBC, in London where he worked for 4 years. In 1970 his contract [with the BBC] expired, but he continued to work from abroad for the BBC as an announcer and a program host.

In 1971 he joined the University of Rabat in Morocco as a part-time student. He would travel to Rabat to take the examination, and [he continued to do that] until he received his degree in law.

Muhammad Mustafa Ramadan became interested in the 1969 coup in Libya, and the change gave him an incentive to visit the country. In 1970 he visited Libya for 1 week and returned to announce that military rule had begun in Libya and that a gruesome era was awaiting our people. He did not stop voicing this opinion.

Muhammad Mustafa Ramadan was not a fanatic man. He was rather confident of his ability to take part in a discussion or a dialogue and, therefore, he used to follow the news of the country on a daily basis and to meet and become acquainted with everyone. He even made the acquaintance of al-Qadhdhafi's cousin, Sayyid Qadhdhaf al-Damm when [the latter] was military attache in London. It was said then that Qadhdhaf al-Damm had delivered messages to al-Qadhdhafi and that tempting offers had arrived from al-Qadhdhafi to Ramadan. Among those offers were one to let Ramadan take over Libyan radio and another to let him take over the radio broadcast in Malta. However, Muhammad was careful not to let himself slide into serving the regime, for his mission [as he saw it] was to make the acquaintance of the regime's key figures and inner circle without becoming involved with them in any cooperative effort that would serve the interests of the regime.

Muhammad lived in poverty and died in poverty. He was extremely devoted to the noble concepts of his Islamic faith, to his peace of mind and to the sacrifices he made to promote truth. In those respects he was a wealthy man.

He used to boast of his opposition to military rule anywhere in our Islamic world, and he also used to boast of his hostility to those who exploited religion to sustain their government. He was a revolutionary Muslim, but the time he spent on branding the Libyan regime was only marginal. Islam was his cause, and his opinion of the Libyan regime or his criticism of it was made in the context of discussions about military Fascists who are enemies of freedom and of Islam.

He was always eager to know who was the opposition that was publishing AL-JIHAD. He was hoping to make their acquaintance so he can engage them in a discussion and perhaps contribute to the newspaper, but circumstances did not make that possible. Muhammad was a true patriot and a constant champion of truth and goodness.

Muhammad had a sense of humor. He would occasionally tell jokes, and he liked to use the title, "Afandi," in addressing his dear friends. He liked to read, and he wrote continuously. He wrote to newspapers from Kuwait to Morocco to comment on their articles. He spent most of his limited funds to buy paper, newspapers and magazines.

He published three books, [which included] articles and replies to a few Arab writers. He opposed military rule everywhere.

Our pledge to the late Ramadan and to those who lost their lives before him and to those who will lose their lives after him is that we will continue to fight with all the methods and means [at our disposal] against the brutal, terrorist regime of al-Qadhdhafi. We will not rest until he is overthrown and a sound free regime is established.

It may be that the closing remarks which the late Ramadan will like the most in concluding his eulogy are the words of God Almighty:

"You must not think that those who were slain in the cause of Allah are dead. They are alive and well provided for by their Lord" [Al Imran: 169]. God the Mighty speaks the truth. (23 April 1980).

> Before Ramadan's eulogy, which was written by Nafi', appeared on the pages of AL-JIHAD on 1 May, al-Qadhdhafi's treacherous hand had broken into the office of the late Mahmud Nafi' on 25 April 1980 and unjustly and aggressively murdered him. AL-JIHAD eulogized him in the same issue in which his eulogy of the late Ramadan appeared. This is the text of AL-JIHAD's eulogy.

The Late Mahmud Nafi': in God's Care

To the spirit of our brother Mahmud Nafi' who wrote the eulogy for his associate, the late Muhammad Mustafa Ramadan, 2 days before he died: Mahmud Nafi' died on 25 April 1980 before the eulogy was published. Al-Qadhdhafi's henchmen shot him in his office.

It is not easy to write about Mahmud Nafi' now. We don't know what to write now and what to leave for [other] appropriate times. Brother Mahmud began the actual struggle against al-Qadhdhafi's regime of terror several years ago. He was extremely active, wrote prolifically and worked tirelessly. He never hesitated to make a financial or any other contribution that he was asked to make. He used to make all these numerous contributions quietly and persistently despite everything he used to hear from some people. God only knows how many hardships, dangers and troubles he endured from numerous sources. None of this, however, reduced his energy or his faith in the need to continue making every effort and every attempt to overthrow al-Qadhdhafi's regime of terror.

A few weeks before he died, Brother Mahmud asked that in case he is assassinated, he wished to have what he wrote published in a book. He repeated his wish 2 days before he died. Mahmud used to write in AL-JIHAD a series entitled "Human Rights and Basic Freedoms in al-Qadhdhafi's Dictatorship." He wrote many articles for this series, but only a few of them were published in AL-JIHAD. We will continue to publish these and other articles he wrote. He was also preparing a book on conditions in Libya in al-Qadhdhafi's era of terror. AL-JIHAD published several articles he wrote about the tyranny of al-Qadhdhafi's regime. The last one of these articles was the one published in the last issue: "The Truth about the Recent Arrests in Libya." AL-JIHAD is also publishing in this issue some of what he wrote.

The late Mahmud Nafi' took it upon himself to play an important and a dangerous multi-faceted role. He played that role in an inimitable fashion.

We cannot give Mahmud his due, and our consolation now is that he is with his omniscient Creator.

The criminals, and chief among them is al-Qadhdhafi, have murdered Mahmud Nafi'. They murdered others before him, and they will murder others in the future. The killer, al-Qadhdhafi, thought that by killing Libyan citizens, he could silence the people of Libya who are calling for freedom and justice. Not a single free voice will be silenced. In fact, all the free voices will be heard in unison. They will speak together in solidarity [and call for] the elimination of al-Qadhdhafi's terror, crime and tyranny.

We have suffered a major, grave loss in losing Mahmud. We pledge to continue the course of struggle, freedom and self-sacrifice.

AL-JIHAD

> The late Nafi' had previously written an article about the crimes al-Qadhdhafi committed in April. That article was published in the same issue in which his eulogy of Ramadan and the article that was written to eulogize him were published.

April, a Month of Bloodshed and Martyrs

In April 1977 the Fascist al-Qadhdhafi began to glower more clearly. He executed Libyan citizens--students, officers and simple citizens; some were shot and some were hanged.

In April 1980 another wave of bloodshed began inside the country and abroad.

It began under the slogan or the cover of "fighting bribery among the pillars of the regime." The Fascist then went about eliminating officers, intellectuals and former party members who had left political activity and gone to build for themselves a quiet life away from any [political] posture. But al-Qadhdhafi was promoting the slogan of he who is not with us is against us. That is, he who did not spend his time applauding him and cheering for him was his enemy.

In the decrees he issued in February 1980 al-Qadhdhafi announced under the cover of the so-called revolutionary committees the onset of a stage of eliminating Libyans abroad.

Thus once again it was not enough to be abroad and not to be working against him, but the fact of one's mere presence abroad was [construed as] disobedience to him and an expression of one's hostility to his regime. The mere fact that a Libyan had settled abroad was considered by al-Qadhdhafi to be a declaration of hostility by that person. Therefore, all such people were to be eliminated, and the first to go would be those who were more accessible, the more famous ones and those who were better known to people.

Thus the suicide squad began traveling 1 week before the resolutions of the revolutionary committees were announced. It arrived in London, Paris, Geneva, Athens, Beirut, Bonn, Madrid and in the United States.

If Libyans living abroad were to be eliminated regardless of their attitude toward the regime, there was no longer any alternative but to sacrifice time and money to oppose the existing regime as long as that regime did not hesitate to murder anyone who was living abroad regardless of his position.

Salim al-Ratimi, a merchant who was not involved in politics, was assassinated; 'Abd-al-Jalil 'Arif, a merchant who was not politically involved, was assassinated; Muhammad Mustafa Ramadan, who gave his time to the cause of Islam in exile and who had left Libya many years before al-Qadhdhafi had come to power, was assassinated.

Other people have been assassinated [also], and other assassination attempts are in the offing.

Inside the country al-Qadhdhafi eliminated those who refused to cooperate with the regime even though they were devoted to their families, their businesses and their trade. Others were taken to detention camps--there are 4,000 detainees--for no reason other than that they did not applaud the regime and cheer for it in processions.

Libyans abroad are being called upon to stand together, shoulder to shoulder and to work together and make financial contributions in order to expand the opposition so it can include all Libyan nationals abroad and become influential, effective and strong.

Our homeless people abroad will remain homeless, and they will live under the threat of assassination and elimination every day unless they join forces and work together and not rely on the unilateral solutions that each person may devise apart from others.

We must all understand and become aware of the fact that al-Qadhdhafi and his henchmen make no distinction between those who are working actively [against him] and those who are not. As long as they live abroad, all Libyans have been classified as enemies, and they have all been marked for assassination.

Mahmud Nafi'

> This is another article the late Mahmud Nafi' wrote about al-Qadhdhafi's revolutionary committees and dictatorial governments. He wrote the article before his assassination.

Revolutionary Committees and Dictatorial Governments Have the Same Style

Whenever the colonel wants to sing his own praises and express his wishes and his admiration for himself, he would use terms [that would convey] humility.

Al-Qadhdhafi replaces his name with terms [such as] the Libyan people, the First of September Revolution or the masses. Anyone who has examined his speeches and his statements would find that he glorifies himself in most cases by using those terms.

In the speech he made on 2 March 1980 on the anniversary of what he called the creation of al-Jamahiriyah and the declaration of "the people's power," which took place on that date in 1977 in a remote village in Fazan that used to be called al-Qara but which he called al-Qahirah, one finds that he glorifies himself by using those terms that have been mentioned. However, the Libyan people do not claim for themselves what al-Qadhdhafi is trying to attribute to them. The Libyan people did not call their country al-Jamahiriyah. Even the puppets of the so-called People's Congress agreed unanimously to retain the name, the Libyan Arab Republic. But at the last moment and after the voting was completed, the colonel suggested the name and asked that [the change] be approved--without having the members go back to their principal congresses. He usually insists that they go back to their principal congresses when anyone else dares to make a suggestion. Naturally, his suggestion was approved.

The slogan of "Power, Wealth and Arms for the People," was not devised by the people, but it was rather decreed and distorted by al-Qadhdhafi.

All the other slogans and frameworks he created--the popular committees and the revolutionary committees--are his accomplishments and his brainchildren. The people claim no credit for them. Al-Jamahiriyah was not established by the people or by the masses, nor did they create what he falsely named the establishment of the people's power.

This vainglory which comes through loudly and clearly in al-Qadhdhafi's voice and which resounds from his broadcasts is for his benefit alone. Our people, however, are resentful, and disgusted with his tyrannical vanities.

Al-Qadhdhafi's address, however, did not lack assertions that there were among the Libyan people those who deserved to be physically eliminated and repressed. He was not able to refute the terror that was oppressing our people. He stated in his address, "What is happening in Libya these days is being carried out by the popular masses by means of the revolutionary committees which they created."

And here we ask, did the people even once or under false pretenses take part in choosing the revolutionary committees?

Do the Libyan people even know the names of those specters? How were they chosen? Who are they?

Al-Qadhdhafi is describing what is happening today as the work of the popular masses which is carried out by the revolutionary committees that were created by the popular masses. Everybody knows that the people do not know who are the members of the revolutionary committees. They make up more accurately a secret movement of intelligence [personnel], soldiers and tribesmen.

Al-Qadhdhafi describes the actions of the revolutionary committees, which are under way these days, as "actions that translate these revolutionary concepts. They are a practical expression of the use of these powers which the government had and which the masses now have. The masses are using those powers to practice dictatorship against their enemies. Today, those people against whom the Libyan people are practicing dictatorship are those who tried to exploit the powers of their positions unfairly, exploitatively and arbitrarily."

Al-Qadhdhafi goes on to indicate that the dictatorial practices of the revolutionary committees are like those of a dictatorial regime, except that the dictatorial practices of the revolutionary committees are carried out in the interests of the people. "A dictatorship opresses the masses, the workers and the students. Dictatorial governments use the same tools and the same powers which the revolutionary committees use in their practices against the enemies of the people. These governments use those tools and powers to hurt the people and to practice dictatorship."

Mahmud Nafi'

Human Rights and Basic Freedoms in al-Qadhdhafi's Dictatorship

This report offers a quick survey and a brief review of human rights violations in al-Qadhdhafi's al-Jamahiriyah. Al-Qadhdhafi has been ruling Libya since 1 September 1969. It was then that the people woke up to [the sounds of] military music and the proclamation of a republic which had followed an announcement that the royal regime had been overthrown. The first and last king of that royal regime was King Muhammad Idris al-Mahdi al-Sanusi who was crowned king of the country when Libya's independence was proclaimed on 24 December 1952.

Regardless of the political aspects and secrets that accompanied this event or led to it, al-Qadhdhafi, who was appointed chairman of the Revolutionary Command Council and promoted from first lieutenant to colonel on the eighth day of the revolution, is the one who continued to rule the country until this day. His autocratic control of the government is increasing daily. This [situation] has led to a lengthy and horrible series of acts of violence, oppression, repression, imprisonment and execution that are being carried out against citizens. This includes al-Qadhdhafi's colleagues who took part in the coup with him as well as civilians who were led to jail under different circumstances and detained for many years. They were all tried by special military courts, and tyrannical measures were taken against them in violation of the simplest legal principles and guarantees.

We are not concerned at present with a political opinion of al-Qadhdhafi's regime as much as we are trying to conduct a detached and fair investigation of the position of al-Qadhdhafi's regime on the universal declaration of human rights and of basic and political freedoms for citizens. We are supporting our report with documents issued by al-Qadhdhafi's regime. These documents consist of the following:

First, the statements al-Qadhdhafi made in numerous speeches and in his statements to newspapers and broadcasts.

Second, al-Qadhdhafi's laws and decrees which indicate a blatant violation of the Libyan citizen's basic human rights.

Third, the practices of al-Qadhdhafi and his regime against the citizens when his statements, his speeches, his laws and his decrees are put into practice.

Since this report will be backed up by the three aforementioned references, it has thus avoided as much as possible [basing its statements on] political opinion. The report adheres to objectivity and respects the spirit of scientific inquiry with regard to human rights. In this regard it is serving the interests of historical truths.

In the past, during 18 years of the royal regime the Libyan people have not had to face a wave of violence, repression, emergency courts and executions such as that which they are facing at present. Regardless of the government's political form there was one constitution which provided guarantees for citizens, such as the right to trial in a common court. No one was taken to court, and throughout that administration, not a single civilian or military emergency court was convened.

No one was arrested by any means other than those of the common public prosecution. At that time there weren't many judicial agencies: common and emergency; political and non-political.

No one has ever established that the royal regime tortured any citizen, unless we were to consider in that regard a brawl between an officer and a prisoner due to some friction between them or to personal attack.

No one's home was broken into to be searched unless a warrant from the public prosecutor's office had been obtained and all the legal measures in effect had been taken.

No one was ever accused or condemned except in accordance with the uniform penal code whose provisions comprise all violations and whose purpose is not particulary to protect the regime or fight its opponents.

None of this means that there were no excesses. Nor does this mean that the former administration was perfect or ideal.

One of the most significant errors of the former administration may be its failure to provide an opportunity for the sound development and growth of a political, democratic and organizational awareness among citizens. Not only did the former administration fail to provide such an opportunity, it also impeded that process of development and growth. This created a tremendous political and organizational vacuum in the country and prevented the emergence of firmly established institutions and organized movements. Thus the entire system collapsed when the 1969 coup took place.

Although the establishment of political parties was not prohibited by laws, political parties and organizations did not exist publicly because the opportunity for their establishment and their development was not available. The establishment of any political or commercial office required a permit from the government, and no permit had hitherto been granted for the establishment of a political party by any one of the successive governments in that era. Thus, citizens who were taken to court during the 18 years of the royal administration because they were accused of forming parties--the Socialist Arab Ba'th party in 1961 and the Arab Nationalists in 1967--were accused by the public prosecutor's office of forming parties that had not been officially licensed. They were tried under the same statute under which anyone who would open an office or a store without a permit from the responsible authorities would be tried.

Although parties were not allowed to exist and, consequently, there were no organized opposition parties, the administration did not allow and did not try to form its own party that would have sole control over the government or force itself upon the people. There was, however, a parliament to which citizens nominated themselves on an individual basis. The parliament had legislative powers: it could enact laws after debating them and voting over them. The parliament also had the right to withdraw confidence from the prime minister and from the Council of Ministers.

The judicial authority was independent in accordance with the constitution. It managed its own affairs through its own higher council, the Supreme Court Council. There was also a supreme court which considered suits filed by persons against any violation of the constitution. The supreme court had the right to rule that laws, statutes and administrative orders were unconstitutional if they violated the constitution or the rights guaranteed therein.

The political analysis of the reasons for that administration's severe shortcomings in not allowing the creation of parties and in [tolerating] other excesses may go on at some length, but we are not engaged in a process of presenting a political critique of this administration or of al-Qadhdhafi's regime as much as we are concerned with an analysis of the constitutional and legal reality and the violations of the principles of human rights that are being committed by al-Qadhdhafi's regime, his constitution, his laws and his practices.

It is also not the purpose of this article to make a comparison between two regimes. This article rather introduces us to the life which the Libyan citizen lived by [describing to us] the constitutional and legal form and substance [of that time] so we can compare them with those of the present. Briefly, there was a constitution which provided basic rights for citizens and [stipulated] the form of the state and its regime which was based on the independence of the legislative authority as vested in a bicameral parliament; of the executive authority, vested in the Council of ministers that would answer to the house of representatives which had the right to debate, endorse and decree laws, the state's budget and foreign and domestic policy; and of the judicial authority which monitored the application of the constitution and ensured that the laws, administrative decrees and measures conformed to the letter and the spirit of the constitution.

This was the form of the royal administration--we wish to repeat that this administration was not perfect either in form or in practice--on 1 September 1969 when junior officers in the armed forces carried out their coup. The names of the members of the Revolutionary Command Council were announced 2 months later. There were 12 officers in the council: the chairman, First Lt Mu'ammar al-Qadhdhafi and 11 captains and first lieutenants.

There was tremendous support for this coup and a general agreement that change was necessary. A state of neglect had been prevailing in the country especially recently. Libya had also not made adequate progress. In fact, the steps that had been taken to catch up with the times were few and had been made reluctantly. Elections on an individual basis [continued]; the shortcomings of some elections [lingered]; the establishment of parties was not allowed; and licensing for newspapers was restricted to a few trusted individuals or to those who were known to senior officials. A few newspaper licenses were revoked, in accordance with legal measures. The right of a license holder to appeal an administrative decision that revoked his license was left unchanged, but the Supreme Court which considered his appeal usually ruled in favor of newspaper publishers. Citizens grew tired of the old worn-out faces that had no new ideas to offer. The regime had not forged ahead energetically to assimilate the changes that had come over society. A broad class of university graduates had emerged, and that group of people did not have enough opportunities to take their rightful place [in society] especially with regard to having more freedom to express themselves politically by forming parties and organizations that would give shape to this change and by having a press that had more freedom to depict all this. All these matters were behind the preliminary support that citizens gave the 1969 coup. They were hoping for a better future in which the errors and excesses of the past would be avoided, a future that would lead to a freer and a happier life.

Once more, we are not engaged in a process of evaluating the excesses and the errors of the past administration. These have already been mentioned and they led the people to support the coup. In addition, there were [other] factors: a desire for change, fear, greed, neglect, and the lack of the people's experience with military government. However, the previous account remains useful for any introduction to a discussion of the background of the Libyan citizen and society and the climate that was prevalent in Libya before al-Qadhdhafi's military movement [came to power].

Al-Qadhdhafi's Regime

The support which many of the people gave the coup was used by those who were in charge of the movement to make them more vain and more precipitous in having the destiny of the people determined by the Revolutionary Command Council. This was the military council which was proclaimed on the radio 2 months after the coup.

Despite the existence of this council, no one but al-Qadhdhafi had the right to make a statement or a proclamation or to define a domestic or foreign position.

One of the first actions which may be considered a preliminary step to the imposition of a political form on the country was that "dialogue" which was organized in May 1970 under the name, "A Debate on Revolutionary Thought." More than 300 intellectuals and educated persons were invited to participate in that debate which was headed by al-Qadhdhafi. Many people expressed their opinions on the country's government and its future during that debate.

It later became evident that al-Qadhdafi had convened this debate to "trap" intellectuals, find out their opinions, pigeonhole them and deal with them on that basis. Actually many people who expressed opinions that al-Qadhdhafi did not like were later subjected to imprisonment and persecution.

Ever since that debate the lines and the form of that government which al-Qadhdhafi intended to impose [on the people] became clearer. It was during the debate on revolutionary thought al-Qadhdhafi cried out, "It is our opinion that we do not need to proclaim a constitution. We can make a constitutional proclamation to indicate the fact that there is a Revolutionary Command Council which is empowered by the people to govern the country."

The Revolutionary Command Council had issued a constitutional proclamation giving itself all the legislative, executive and judicial powers. We will deal with this matter subsequently in the second part of this report which deals with legislation.

With regard to al-Qadhdhafi's position on the basic rights which the people had been yearning for and expecting, al-Qadhdhafi announced [the following] in his address on 19 September 1969 in al-Shuhada' [Martyrs'] Square in Tripoli:

"Brothers, after today there are to be no parties. Oh, brothers, the national unity that brings the Libyan people together cannot under any circumstances be subject to fragmentation and to partisanship. After today, there are to be no parties. Under no circumstances whatsoever can the door be opened to parties, under no circumstances whatsoever."

It is evident here that al-Qadhdhafi's emphasis on this matter, a few days after the coup, was designed to prepare the conditions and the climate for the imposition of a military government that was a far cry from a democracy, especially after it became evident that the reason behind the people's support for the coup was their desire to establish a sound political life and to bring an end to all the obstacles that used to exist for organized political action and for the freedom of opinion. Al-Qadhdhafi's emphasis on preventing organized political action precluded the possibility that any political movement or political organization may emerge to which people can make an effective contribution for the purpose of enriching political life [in the country] and developing it toward something better. Al-Qadhdhafi thereby also placed all the controls in his own hands.

It seems that al-Qadhdhafi had made this plan with deliberation so as to escalate the hostility and the attack against any organized political action as the premise groups of people would adopt to express their opinion freely. Therefore, he focused in most of his speeches on repeating his condemnation of parties. In order to discourage any constructive dialogue that might lead to a view of the form the regime might assume, he issued before the debate on revolutionary thought was convened an open threat to those who were to participate in it. This threat was made when the Revolutionary Command Council issued its decree regarding "protecting the revolution." We will review this decree in the second part of this report.

The decree incriminated anyone who engaged in "provocative publicity against the regime;" "aroused hatred and disunity among the classes of the people;" "spread rumors or stories about the political or economic condition in the country;" "spread rumors;" or "took part in a demonstration or a strike."

Al-Qadhdhafi's regime was extremely tyrannical. It launched vicious, successive attacks against parties and against any organized political action before it confronted any party, group or organization, regardless of its size. The regime was setting up the rules and the foundations for establishing its total control on the country's capabilities by means of the fiery speeches that al-Qadhdhafi gave and the threats and promises that he made. These were followed by laws and decrees that established as law what was stated in those speeches. All this was taking place despite the fact that no political party had emerged and no organized political action, no matter how insignificant, had surfaced. All this was done despite the support that was shown by most intellectuals who had political opinions. Al-Qadhdhafi's objective in launching those successive, vicious attacks was to establish the total alienation of those people from the masses and to bar them from any role that would allow them to participate in building the state on new democratic foundations. Al-Qadhdhafi's position, as it turned out later, was an indication of his dissatisfaction with intellectuals and his hatred for them. It also paved the way for the persecution to which they were later subjected by al-Qadhdhafi's regime.

Al-Qadhdhafi soon universalized and wrote into law his thoughts and opinions on the form of the political regime. He summarized those thoughts and opinions in the constitutional proclamation which was an expression of his speeches and his views. He gave the Revolutionary Command Council, that is, himself, all legislative, executive and judicial powers without providing for any supervision over these absolute powers. He had the right to enact laws and decrees and to execute them as he saw fit. He was the one to form special boards of inquiry and emergency courts, and he would so so without legal controls to guide him or guarantees for those who would stand accused in front of these bodies. Soon after that a series of laws and decrees began piling up, day after day.

Al-Qadhdhafi issued a decree forming a public prosecution office which has the functions of investigating any case or any person who may be turned over to it by the Revolutionary Command Council. No common legal measures are to be observed in an investigation or in anyone's detention. This prosecution office is still in existence today.

Al-Qadhdhafi also issued a decree forming the People's Court. It was chaired by a member of the Revolutionary Command Council. An army officer and a police officer were members. At first the court also included a member of the judiciary and a clergyman, but both were later removed from the court.

This People's Court is not subject to any law. It can hear any case against any citizen or citizens brought to it by the prosecution office. It makes the judgement whether the charge that's been made is a crime or not, and it has the power to determine any penalty it deems appropriate. Despite all these unreasonable and abnormal power; despite the fact that al-Qadhdhafi chooses its members--and at the outset most of them were military men but then later all of them were military men who had absolutely nothing to do with the law and made no distinction between a military function and the neutrality and propriety of a judicial function; despite the fact that al-Qadhdhafi controls who is taken to court and what charges are to be brought against him through his control of the public prosecution office; despite all this and as an indication of his unruly desire to control and dominate, al-Qadhdhafi was not satisfied with all this. He retained the power to confirm the verdicts of the People's Court and the right to amend those verdicts by increasing or reducing the sentences. Despite all previous precautions, all of which would inflict heavy penalties on defendants, al-Qadhdhafi feared that the People's Court may sentence a defendant to a penalty that he would consider inadequate. Therefore, he took the precaution of retaining the power to confirm the verdicts of the court. This confirmation was not to be ceremonial. He has never reduced a sentence issued by the People's Court. In fact, his decisions have always been to confirm those sentences or at most to increase the penalty, as we shall see later.

Furthermore, al-Qadhdhafi declared at the first convention of the united free officers that he had made a mistake by not changing some of the sentences to execution. In practical terms, that declaration was significant since al-Qadhdhafi had already eliminated those he wanted to get rid of, and the sentences were of no significance in view of what he himself thought even if these sentences had been handed down by a sham court that was totally subject to him.

Al-Qadhdhafi's Statements

Al-Qadhdhafi's laws and his outrageous decrees were issued while he was making plans to persecute every person or persons who would think of opposing him, of assuming an independent position or of subscribing to an opinion that differed from what he was saying and from the ideas he was repeating to outline the form of the new regime that he wanted to impose because it was suitable to his ambitions. On several occasions he arrested a few citizens and accused them of engaging in party activity. In 1972 at a press conference held at the University of Libya before the enactment of the law that made membership in a party a crime he stated the following. What he said that day along with his speeches and statements were included in a volume published in 1973 by Libya's Ministry of Information as Volume One.

[He was asked]: "You said that anyone who joins a party is a traitor. What do you mean by this statement? Does this mean that the thinking process is to be confined and restricted to one mold only? Please explain this statement."

[Al-Qadhdhafi replied], "Of course, there are to be no parties after today. This is indisputable. At any rate the answer to that question has been clear ever since the day we proclaimed that slogan. But it seems that the person who asked the question belonged to a party for some time and wants to be sure. Now that the revolution has been realized, and all the slogans have been put into effect and implemented, there is no longer any purpose for any party. This means that [anyone who forms a party] is dissatisfied with the regime. This is because when a person becomes involved with a party and proclaims its slogans, his action means that these slogans which are proclaimed by the revolution are inconsistent with his slogans and that he wants to overthrow the new regime. The revolution cannot permit any attempt to overthrow it. It will come down harshly and mercilessly on those who make such an attempt. What do the parties want to accomplish other than freedom, socialism and unity?"

At the same press conference he said, "We do not want parties, and we said anyone who joins a party is a traitor. We do not want someone to form a party for communists, someone else to form a party for nationalists and another to form a party for patriots."

In his statement to university students he said, "If you were to form a party and to become active in it after the revolution, your action means that you are dissatisfied with the revolution and are working against it. This is considered treason. Anyone who works against the revolution of the Libyan people is considered a traitor. Anyone who secretly or openly joins a party after the revolution is considered a traitor. This is as far as the Libyan Arab Republic is concerned. As far as the other Arab countries are concerned, they are free to do as they wish."

In the course of promoting his political party al-Qadhdhafi cautioned that the only organization through which citizens can be politically active or practice their political rights is that of his Socialist Union party.

He said, "Brothers, with the establishment of the Arab Socialist Union in the Libyan Arab Republic, the people have finally eliminated any divisiveness in their ranks. They have thus finally eliminated the swindlers and the pseudo philosphers who are afflicted with the disease of advocating parties. They are advocates of division, and they import childish theories from abroad. Today, by joining the Arab Socialist Union the Libyan people are proving that this nation has actually applied the slogan that this nation coined after the revolution: no parties after today, and anyone who joins a party is a traitor. There are to be no parties within the Socialist Union which brings together farmers, workers, intellectuals, revolutionaries, national capitalists and soldiers.

"Brothers, it is the nation which is the party of significance, and there are to be no parties within the ranks of the nation. There is no place for intellectuals who want to form their own party, and there is no place for any swindler to come and talk down to a class of people and form a party for himself."

Al-Qadhdhafi praised his own party when he said at a press conference in Tripoli on 13 Rabi' al-Awwal 1393 Hegira, "The Socialist Union is the ideal framework. It is the best organization that includes all the forces of the working people."

Soon, however, al-Qadhdhafi destroyed the Socialist Union. Among the reasons for this action was the fact that this formula had failed to win the confidence of the masses. Perhaps more importantly was al-Qadhdhafi's fear of any lingering organization, notwithstanding the fact that that organization was subordinate to him and subject to his will.

It was after the failure and the collapse of the Socialist Union that the trilogy of his Green Book appeared. In that book he stipulated that he who joined a party was a traitor and that a party system, whether one or several parties were involved, constituted a clear case of dictatorship. The Socialist Union which al-Qadhdhafi had promoted extensively, praised lavishly and considered the ideal framework came to an end, and the people's committees emerged. These were later curbed even though they were almost totally subject to al-Qadhdhafi and even though they were considered in the Green Book the foundation of democracy and its final, radical and only solution. Al-Qadhdhafi then came up with the revolutionary committees which are not to be found in the Green Book, and he announced that they were to direct and guide the actions of the people's committees and their applications of the substance of his opinions on democracy, on the economy and on society.

But al-Qadhdhafi's campaign against parties and against the freedom to engage in political activity continued.

"There are to be no parties, no splitting [of the people] and no division [among them]. It is for this reason that membership in parties is considered high treason because it undermines national unity, and we must be careful about the natural national unity of the homogeneous Libyan people."

What one notices here is that these are the statements that al-Qadhdhafi made in 1972 before his opinions on democracy, popular committees and then revolutionary committees were published. It was these opinions that led to discord, disunity, disintegration and persecution. Al-Qadhdhafi stated afterwards that 'Abd-al-Nasir's error lay in the fact that he did not break up the struggle and that he tried to preserve what he called national unity and protect it within the organization of the Socialist Union. Therefore, Nasirism came to an end with his death.

Al-Qadhdhafi also said, "Brothers, we do not need communism because we are more advanced than the communists. We do not need an Islamic party because we are an Islamic nation. The Arab nation carries some weight on the Earth."

In the course of an interview he had with the correspondent of the Beirut magazine, AL-MISA', al-Qadhdhafi said the following:

The correspondent [asked], "What about the decision that has to do with considering a member of a party a traitor?"

Al-Qadhdhafi interrupted me, "What about it?"

I (the correspondent) said, "This is a serious matter. We can understand that you in the Revolutionary Command Council can be opposed to party affiliations, knowing that you took over power as politicians more than as military men. Now, however, the Revolutionary Command Council is announcing that every party member is a traitor, and it goes so far as to say that any political group that opposes the revolution is considered treacherous! Don't you think that this is a form of intellectual terrorism?"

Al-Qadhdhafi replied, "It was parties that fragmented [the unity of] Muslims. Had it not been for parties the great civil strife could have ended. Maybe after 100 years we will need parties, but at this stage we need 100 years without parties."

I, (the correspondent) said, "Let us assume that you arrested a Libyan and accused him of establishing a party or working with a party. Will you enforce the death sentence against him?"

Al-Qadhdhafi replied. "Yes, this was a warning I issued for the first time. Any member of a party to whom the incriminating articles of party affiliation apply--those articles that were issued by the Revolutionary Command Council--will be executed."

This interview was published in the first volume of the colonel's speeches, statements and interviews until 1973. The volume was published by Libya's Ministry of Information.

The Zawarah Speech and the Five Points

Following Israel's criminal act of shooting down a civilian Libyan airplane over Sinai, al-Qadhdhafi reacted harshly to the victims and the innocent citizens who were hurt by Israel's horrifying crimes instead of retaliating against Israel which had committed the crime. He did that to cover up his shameful failure to react appropriately to that crime in which close to 100 Libyan citizens lost their lives and to terrorize the citizens who had asked the government to take appropriate measures against such action instead of making speeches and issuing statements. Citizens had demonstrated and burned the building of the Socialist Union in Benghazi after seeing the bodies of about 50 Libyan citizens, who were victims of the airplane incident, brought to Benghazi Airport. He quickly proclaimed what came to be known the Zawarah address on 12 Rabi' al-Awwal 1393 Hegira (April 1973). In that bloody address he outlined a new stage of viciousness and revealed more clearly the violent, repressive intentions [he was harboring]. In the Zawarah address al-Qadhdhafi proclaimed what have come to be known as the five points. These are:

Repealing the Laws

First, all laws are to be repealed as of the date of the address. Al-Qadhdhafi thus gave himself total freedom to execute, imprison and detain anyone he wishes without the need for laws and controls and trials and measures. Even the harsh laws and decrees that he had issued and imposed on the people according to his wishes--and they were all cruel and harsh--had given him absolute powers and made him prosecutor, judge and executioner without giving defendants any guarantees. Even these laws no longer satisfied his wrath or his propensity to be repressive and cruel. In the Zawarah address al-Qadhdhafi had said, "First of all, all laws that are in effect at present are to be repealed, and the penalties and measures are to be carried out immed.ately."

Detaining Intellectuals

Second, all intellectuals who are educated, whose ideas and opinions are not congruent with those of al-Qadhdhafi and his orders are to be eliminated, arrested and done away with. This point was one of al-Qadhdhafi's most important objectives in the Zawarah address. He found an opportunity to get rid of any possibility that there be an enlightened voice, opinion, or idea that was not automatically subservient and subject to him. He accused intellectuals of everything from being agents to treason, subjugation and atheism to pave the way for their elimination. In the Zawarah address in April 1973 al-Qadhdhafi had said, "The country must be purged of all those who are sick. Anyone who is heard talking about communism, Marxism or atheism will be put in jail. I will issue an order to the minister of the interior to purge any group of those sick people. If I find anyone from the Muslim Brothers or from the Islamic Liberation party, we will put him in jail. Anyone who advocates western thought or capitalism is sick, and will be imprisoned."

One day after the Zawarah address al-Qadhdhafi reiterated what he had said.

"Members of parties will be arrested because the Muslim Brothers do not represent Islam. Likewise, the Islamic Liberation party does not represent Islam, but rather reactionaries. Communists are agents, and all members of parties have connections with circles of western or communist colonialism. Accordingly, I declared that they must be removed. Those who have partisan inclinations or objectives and who are members of parties must be put in jail so they can pay the price of their crime. After that, we will begin treating them: those who go back to their senses will be released from jail and watched until they walk the straight path, but those who are hopeless cases will be punished mercilessly."

Al-Qadhdhafi held a press conference in Tripoli on 13 May 1973, 1 month after the Zawarah address.

At that press conference al-Qadhdhafi affirmed, "The Muslim Brothers and the communists are not advocates of an ideology; they are agents. They are people who get their orders from communist embassies and who give information to communist embassies. They receive money and orders from communist embassies, just like the agents of the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency. These are the communists. The Muslim Brothers receive the same instructions from western embassies and from people living in Europe."

Burning Books

Third, all books that do not conform to al-Qadhdhafi's ideas are to be burned.

"I will burn and tear up all books that are imported and misleading. I will launch a revolution against libraries and universities and everything in print. We will burn all misleading ideas so that all the sickly, the feeble-minded and the beatles can be removed. These are sick people who contracted the disease from the misleading reactionary books of the east and the west, from eastern and western communism and from capitalism. We will burn these books, and we will also burn those who will stand by them."

In the same Zawarah address al-Qadhdhafi said, "O people [of Libya], destroy all the bookstores and the libraries from which the stench of imported ideas, reactionary ideas, capitalist ideas and communist, Jewish ideas emanates."

Terrorizing Civil Servants

Fourth, administrations are to be taken over and civil servants are to be attacked, fired and replaced by those who took over the administrations with al-Qadhdhafi's permission and at his instigation. Al-Qadhdhafi took advantage of the chaos he created and got rid of many of the people he did not want because, in his judgment, they were not carrying out his tyrannical, illegal orders as promptly as he wanted them to, without having discussions or raising questions about their legality. Thus the unruly mobs which al-Qadhdhafi let loose on government administrations, organizations and agencies spread corruption throughout these agencies, striking down, removing from office and imprisoning whomever they chose and then appointing in their place whomever they chose, or rather those ignorant uneducated persons that al-Qadhdhafi chose. They fired university professors, and they even revoked the doctorate degrees of some people whom they labeled "illiterate." Al-Qadhdhafi appointed a male nurse director of a hospital; a janitor, principal of a school. It was in this precipitous, loathsome manner that matters went on in the aftermath of al-Qadhdhafi's Zawarah address.

Al-Qadhdhafi thereby brought about what he had wanted: using people against each other and sowing dissension among them. This was something which political parties and organizations, which al-Qadhdhafi had harshly attacked and denied them permits, would not have thought of doing. Thus the process of stifling political liberties and opposition opinions in the context of [attacking] political parties was not intended to bring about "national unity," "prevent dissension within the same society" or "preserve social peace," as al-Qadhdhafi used to say when he strongly forbad the existence of any political organization. It has been established that these three slogans do not represent his real objective. For he has no concern for society, for its unity and for its cohesiveness. Quite the contrary, his real objective was and still is to sow dissension and hostility among citizens; to create hatred, rancor and disunity among them; and to forestall any cooperation or coordination among them so that he would have a free hand in exercising power and control while citizens remain preoccupied in their own disputes.

Announcements about the people's committees' meetings and adjournments as well as their decisions to fire and hurt people and to appoint administration chiefs and civil servants were made in an unruly, provocative, precipitous manner that did not follow any democratic method. Instead, these decisions followed a method of contention, expulsion and attack. No election was held, nor was there a selection process. Decisions were endorsed and announced without the knowledge of the group that made and sent them. The popular committees were not defined; their members were not known; nor did they follow any clearly defined bylaws. Al-Qadhdhafi endorsed those decisions that suited him, and those decisions were announced and carried out. The decisions that did not appeal to him were ignored and forgotten. However, nobody knew who these people's committees were that made those decisions, and nobody knew who were their members. Such obscure, ambiguous and ill-defined matters allowed al-Qadhdhafi a greater opportunity to do what he wished and to carry out whatever he wanted.

Ever since those moments al-Qadhdhafi has intensified his blatant attacks on political freedoms or rather on basic freedoms.

"Anyone who wants to go ahead with us is welcome, but anyone who stays away will be trampled underfoot." [He said that in] the Zawarah address.

"Walk all over any bourgeois bureaucrat; destroy him and get rid of him forever." [He said that in] an address in Tripoli, 1 day after the Zawarah address.

"There are those who have a doctorate but who are considered illiterate."

"Students can now remove the dean of a college from his position. If the people's committees in any city now wish to remove the chief or the governor from his office, all the laws that stand in their way are suspended. They can remove him; they can put him in prison; they can put him in prison and appoint another chief or another governor."

That statement was made at the press conference held in Tripoli on 10 Rabi' al-Aakhar 1393 Hegira, 13 May 1973 A.D.

Terrorizing Citizens

Fifth, weapons were distributed to a few select individuals in general to strike even more terror in citizens' hearts and also to create another armed power to face the armed forces so as to restrain them.

"I will give weapons to all those who believe in the revolution of the 1st of September, but the weapons will be turned on anyone who is against the people's revolution."

Immediately after al-Qadhdhafi's address in Zawarah an intense campaign of public intelligence was launched against all known intellectuals, writers and men of letters in Libya. They were all arrested [at their places of work] in broadcasting [stations], newspaper [offices] and in their [own] offices. Some of them were older men who were taken away from their mosques and their homes. This was the campaign that included almost 1,000 persons. It was the broadest campaign of arrests after the arrest of Lt Col Musa Ahmad, Lt Col Adam al-Rawwaz and their group of military men. Another group that was called the Fazzan conspiracy group was arrested. Among that group were 'Abd-al-Mawli Daghman, Ma'tuq Adam, Bur Hayl, Nijm and others. We will refer to this in detail [below].

This broad campaign of arrests scared even the civilian leaders of the Socialist Union who found that the people's committees had not left anyone immune to attack, defamation and public denunciation. They found that the revolutionary committees were competing with the Socialist Union in many of its activities. They may have feared that the wave of arbitrary arrests would include them too. Dissatisfaction among the people grew, and the conduct of the popular committees was timidly brought up for discussion in the meeting halls of the Socialist Union congress. This caused al-Qadhdhafi to express his opinion on this campaign. He did that at the general congress on 9 November 1974.

Al-Qadhdhafi then said, "A final observation on [the questions] raised by a number of members who spoke about the police and a few other matters. We have detained some people; they are a small group of Muslim Brothers whose confessions were broadcast on television. We have also detained a few communists and a few people from a group who call themselves the Islamic Liberation army. That group is a very small group. You have all seen their confessions on television. The fact is that after the revolution, and specifically at the Tripoli conference, as far as I remember, between 1969 and 1970, I announced that he who joins a party is a traitor. We were going to forgive and forget the past, and anyone who had formed a party in the past would be praised for his effort and not condemned because he made an effort to save Libya either through Islam or through communism. But after our victory, thanks to God, we said that we wanted to establish an alliance with each other and anyone who would join a party would be a traitor. There is no need for us to divide ourselves into factions and schools. Some people complied with this appeal. Among them was a group of young people of the Ba'th party whom I knew. I could have drawn up lists of their names and of the names of others who were members of parties before the revolution because I've been with that crowd and I tried to find out who their leaders were. They cannot hide themselves from me. The least that we can do is to take their leaders into custody so that we can find out who are the people who make up the rest of the membership. I know much more [about them] than the investigative authorities know. There are people who belong to some party organizations who are not under arrest and who have had no restrictions imposed on them by the Ministry of the Interior. But I know who they are, and the investigation office does not.

"There is also another group with which I am personally familiar. They complied with the appeal and they were convinced [by our argument]. This indicates that they were truthful in their first actions to save the country. But when they realized that the country had been saved, they joined the revolution. I personally have considerable appreciation for them because they are committed.

"Maj al-Khawildi al-Hamidi now has documented evidence about a communist group [of people] who were originally Arab nationalists. They became communists after the command turned communist. Al-Hamidi has authentic and very serious documented evidence that I myself have examined and ascertained. [Among this evidence are] fallacious analyses of the social structure, of the bourgeoisie, and of where aristocracy, feudalism and militarism can be found. These analyses are intended to mislead people. They are nonsense. Then these people conclude that they must destroy the existing society so they can build a society of dictatorship which must do away with the remaining classes. This means that all our efforts would be wasted--those efforts through which we had tried to create a society of homogeneous groups that can solve their problems by themselves peacefully, narrow the differences between people peacefully and recognize the natural differences that God created among people. Had it not been for these differences and these distinctions, life would have ceased."

--A footnote: These opinions are no longer espoused by al-Qadhdhafi after his Third Theory, especially the economic part [of it].

"These groups say that strife is the reason for development, and they say they want an end to the strife. All right, if strife ends, that means that development will cease. I am not talking with them from a dialectal perspective, even though it is possible to refute easily every one of their statements. However, I am saying that their analyses are dangerous; that their analyses have led them to conspire; to collect weapons; to form secret cells; and to refer to each other by numbers [such as] number 15 and 16."

--A footnote: At their trial these groups were not accused of conspiring against the regime or of having weapons, nor was this established. They were accused of violating the law that made membership in a party a crime.

"Of course this is not the time for that. We will not allow it. No country in the world would allow its regime to be subjected to an undercover conspiracy. Such persons are real criminals, at least from my point of view. And I am in power because this power was seized by means of the revolution. A person who wants to do the same is considered opposed to the revolution, and we have to get rid of him. Anyone who stands in the revolution's way, whether he does so on the eve of the 1st of September, on the 8th or on the 90th eve of the revolution must be removed by the revolution. Now when we arrest someone who is against the revolution, he is treated in the same manner that the one who was arrested one evening in 1969, in 1970 or in 1980 was treated. There is no difference between them. You must understand this. Did anyone object to us when we arrested the army officers who were in power on the eve of the revolution? Did anyone say that what we did was a crime, that it was against freedom and that it was a case of dictatorship? No one said that. The outbreak of a revolution requires the removal of those who were previously in control. When we arrest anyone who stands in the revolution's way now, [our actions] are not to be considered anti-freedom or dictatorial or anything. We form alliances on the course of the revolution so we can solve our problems. [Sometimes] we scold and we challenge each other, but we do so within [a framework of] agreement, and we do so in public.

"A person who stands up in a mosque or on a street and arouses sectarianism, factionalism or partisanship or raises doubts about the revolution will be taken into custody. No country in the world would allow something like that."

--A footnote: The public prosecution did not accuse the defendants of partisanship in front of the People's Court which considers cases of instigating sectarianism or factionalism. They were accused and convicted of nothing more than forming a party, regardless of its purpose or its style. This is in accordance with the law that considers affiliation with a party a crime. A party does not have to have sectarian purposes or believe in violence as a means [for achieving one or another of its objectives] in order for membership in it to be a crime. Any association or party that is formed, regardless of its form, its objective or its style is considered criminal.

"The prophet did not allow this. The prophet demolished a mosque, and people then said we will face the Ka'bah and we will operate one minaret whose call to prayer we will follow. When they were questioned [about what they said], they replied, 'We are free to see Islam in a way other than that in which you see it.' We will build a mosque here, and we will talk with people about this matter in the same way you do in the revolution. Then someone else would come and say I want to launch a revolution! The fact that the prophet tore down a mosque is a legally binding precedent and not just a prophetic tradition. The Sunna is what the prophet actually did and is a legally binding precedent. The destruction of that mosque was a legally binding precedent which we are following."

After his theory was published in his Green Book al-Qadhdhafi announced that the prophet, may God bless him and grant him salvation, was merely a messenger and that we did not have to follow his statements or his example, nor was it our duty to do either. He announced the repeal of the noble Prophetic Tradition in its entirety and said that no attention should be paid to it. He also declared that the Holy Koran concerned itself with matters of the hereafter and dealt very little with matters of this life, such as marriage and divorce. This is according to al-Qadhdhafi's curious thinking. See his well-known deviant address whose text is published in the Libyan newspaper, AL-FAJR AL-JADID, 30 Rajab 1398 Hegira, 5 July 1978.

"Sooner or later we will destroy any cell that anyone builds. The truth is that this group whose analyses I read is a very dangerous group."

--A footnote: Al-Qadhdhafi was referring to the analyses that he claimed were written by a partisan group and that he alone had read. No one knows where these documents were published, but it is likely that they consist of a sheaf of handwritten papers found in the possession of one of those who had been arrested. They were probably a summary of a few books as was mentioned in the public prosecution's statements at the trial which did not establish that any group printed or distributed any leaflet. Furthermore, no weapons and conspiracy were mentioned in any indictment.

Al-Qadhdhafi continued his speech and said, "When we announced that anyone who joins a party is a traitor, we gave party members an adequate period of time to turn away from those parties. Some did and some didn't. Finally, we enacted a law that made membership in a party a crime, and we announced a 30-day period of grace for people to renounce their party affiliations. Those people did not come forward.

"We did not do them an injustice; they did themselves an injustice. Whether they are your children, your brothers or your fathers, they did themselves an injustice. This is how we must judge them as long as the law gave them an opportunity [to relent]. The law is made for everyone and applies to anyone who engages in such an action which we accepted as an alternative. If one did not know about the law, that is his business. I will not drag people from their homes and put the law in front of them and tell them this [or that] is forbidden. If a person chooses to ignore a law, that is his choice. He is the one who places himself in prison. In fact, they were the ones who led themselves into arrest; no one led them to prison. Why aren't the people who are here under arrest, and why are those others under arrest? Because they are the ones who accepted this for themselves. They did what we told them was forbidden. Those people have a serious case, and our party affiliation law will be applied to them.

"The point we want to make out of all this is that when the common courts, the prosecution and the police questioned them on the common case, the measures [that were followed] were not proper in accordance with the laws. Although they are members of parties and all the documented evidence against them is unequivocal--statements in their own handwriting and recordings of their voices--the measures by which this evidence was seized were not proper.

"An example of that was stated yesterday by 'Umar al-Hamidi, who, I believe, is a graduate of the College of Law. He said that evidence gathered illegally is not valid evidence. This is a principle of jurisprudence in the law. So although the fact that the criminals committed the crime is established, because the measures that were followed with them were not legal, the common courts may yet find them innocent [and acquit them]. I met with the judges and they proposed this matter to me, saying that we had to establish a state security prosecution and state security courts. Nothing may happen to those who were tried by a common court even though we know they are members of parties and the law that considers membership in parties a crime applies to them. However, the measures that are in front of us violate our laws. [They advised me] to enact a special law to allow us to do these things.

"But I consider state security, state security prosecution and the armed police aspects of terrorism. We began to have a sense of our freedom, and we cannot walk on the right side simply because there is an armed individual who tells us to walk on the right side. We want this terrorist phenomenon to come to an end. The truth is that I still refuse enacting a state security law and creating a state security prosecution and a state security court. I approve only of the People's Court which will continue with us as long as there are questions that require consideration."

--A footnote: Nevertheless, a law establishing a state security prosecution was enacted. It was later called al-Jamahiriyah State Prosecution. The law eliminated all guarantees for citizens. None of its measures or actions for arresting people, searching them or for determining the length of their detention was subject to appeal.

"This is a people's court and not a military court. It is made up of all classes of people."

A footnote: This is not true. The presiding judge on the court is an officer in the army, and so is one of the members of the court. The third member of the court is a police officer. The clergyman and the judge [who sat on the court] were disqualified in all the cases that were brought to court concerning parties and students.

"The People's Court handles cases that pertain to Islamic law, civilian law and positive law. It has a military man and a policeman. It is in fact a people's court, and its deliberations are democratic. It does not have traitors and conspirators as is the case in the Arab countries in front of al-Mandawi's court.

"I think that having special courts and arming the police are tools of repression that convey a form of terror. We rebelled against tools of repression, and the judges agreed with me that special courts and the armed police were tools of repression. [They told me] 'If you do not want these, you must change the criminal procedures law and the civilian penal code.' Therefore, we must make amendments in the procedures law and in the penal code."

A footnote: Numerous intelligence departments and their branches abound in al-Qadhdhafi's terrorist regime in his Jamahiriyah. There are many other special agencies of repression, and these are under the direct command of al-Qadhdhafi's relatives, and among them is Khalifah Ahnish. All of these agencies are killing, imprisoning and torturing citizens without any regard for the law or for human principles.

"The penal code [must stipulate] that any crime committed in society, whether it is a political crime that affects the security of the state or the security of a family, must be looked into by the prosecution, by the court, or by the indictment chamber and our courts. There is no reason for having a common court and an emergency court. This means [that we have] a stable situation." What we are now faced with is correcting this situation [for] those people. If the measures are followed correctly, their destiny will most certainly be execution. That is, they would be executed if the measures of arresting them, searching and imprisoning them had been carried out according to legal principles, but this did not happen. I can of course at any moment turn them over to the People's Court, and, according to the law of the People's Court, I can turn over any case to the People's Court, and the People's Court will issue a death sentence in accordance with that law because execution will be the fate of anyone who forms a party. This is because the People's Court does not apply the law of criminal procedures.

If we were to hold a special military court, they will be executed. If we were to hold a special court, they will still be executed. But as long as these are the procedures, that is, as long as these procedures are erroneous procedures in the eyes of the common courts, these people will be kept somewhere until they get well. This may last 10, 20 or 50 years, each one according to his inclinations."

A footnote: These opinions summarize al-Qadhdhafi's positions on human rights and on his lack of respect for them. A citizen who is innocent in the eyes of the law may still be placed in prison for several years.

"From a legal standpoint, a special court could have been convened, and it could have issued a death sentence. This can happen. But we are facing a situation of this kind with worthless procedures and with people who are implicated. However, I know who they are."

A footnote: The judge himself who is supposed to be above reproach and neutral is subject only to the law and to his conscience. He may not issue a verdict on the basis of personal imformation gathered about the defendant outside the courtroom. But al-Qadhdhafi, who is the adversary, is satisfied with the knowledge that the defendants are traitors! In his opinion, this is the most important piece of evidence, and there is no need after that for further evidence or for any other law. He actually put these strange opinions of his into practice; they are a far cry from law and justice. He applied these opinions to many citizens, and they were placed in prison for many years simply because al-Qadhdhafi thought they should be imprisoned, without any evidence. In fact, some of them were executed because al-Qadhdhafi wanted them executed without any other evidence to warrant that, as we will refer to [below].

"I would not allow them to go out into society again, because we placed our confidence in them before, and we gave them responsibilities. We issued a decree of the Revolutionary Command Council inviting some of them to take part in the constituent committees of the Socialist Union [and] in the alliance agencies. Some people were honest in forming these alliances but [others] were secretly conspiring [against us]. Their contacts with foreign countries were evident. To be a communist means that one's capital is Moscow, one's country is Russia and one's party is the communist party, whether that person is in America, Africa or Asia. Thus the matter about these people must be clear. Amnesty International wrote to me and told me that the Libyan Arab Republic was the only Arab country that was not blacklisted [for human rights violations]."

A footnote: To be honest we must provide an explanation from Amnesty International which absolutely denied having declared that Libya under al-Qadhdhafi's administration had not been blacklisted. Amnesty International also denied that it had praised al-Qadhdhafi's theory. What happened was that the committee's reports on Libya before the revolution hardly mentioned Libya among the countries whose governments deliberately violated human rights. [However], not a single annual report of the reports prepared by the committee [after the revolution] failed to mention al-Qadhdhafi's regime and his position on [human] rights and freedoms as well as his violations of those rights and freedoms.

It is possible to request all the annual reports that have been issued by this international committee ever since the end of the first year of al-Qadhdhafi's regime and until the last report that was issued in 1979. Not a single report failed to condemn al-Qadhdhafi's regime because of the executions, the serious violations, the arbitrary imprisonment and the numerous arrests that have been practiced every day for 10 years. We will deal with these practices against citizens, as groups and as individuals, in the special chapter on practices.

"This is particularly because Libya is a democratic country that does not practice terrorism and repression. Mansur al-Kikhiya was attending the conference, and he was pleased when he gave me the book. He told me, 'Look, because of the grace of God the Libyan Arab Republic after the revolution has become the only country to be removed from the black list. The rest of the Arab countries are all on the black list because they practice tyranny and terror and repress freedoms.'

"Amnesty International told me in a letter that the Libyan Arab Republic was a clean country, and those who wrote the letter talked about the Third Universal Theory, about Islam and about the appeal for freedom for nations. We were advised not to become perverted--and this is the main point--for we heard that there were people under arrest, and we ask that they be pardoned. I wrote them a letter because I am naturally concerned about our international position.

"This point must be clear, regardless of their being our children or our brothers; this is another matter. Western colonialism has taken the Muslim Brothers under its wing because they are opposed to the 23 July Revolution. Since we are an extension of the 23 July Revolution, we have become a party to the case. Here in the Libyan Arab Republic there is a group of Muslim Brothers in jail. We had a conflict with them."

These are selections from al-Qadhdhafi's address which he delivered on the eve of his national congress on 9 November 1974. We printed these extended selections because they provide a clear indication of the backwardness and brutality of al-Qadhdhafi's concepts of human rights and basic human freedoms.

His address was connected with other measures. A new, independent, emergency prosecution [office] was formed in addition to the public prosecution office which is under the command of the Revolutionary Command Council. This new prosecution office was called the Security Prosecution of the Republic. It is now called the Security Prosecution of al-Jamahiriyah despite the apparent unwillingness to accept this suggestion which makes it unlikely that the regime's opponents would stand trial in the common courts.

Before too long al-Qadhdhafi amended the section in the penal code that deals with crimes against the regime. He increased the severity of the penalties in the manner that will be shown in detail in the section of this report which deals with anti-human rights legislation.

Al-Qadhdhafi also recently abolished the position of public prosecutor and public defender. The reason for that was that those who served in those positions observed the law to a certain extent and used it as their frame of reference. They had released a few prisoners who had served the full term to which they had been sentenced by al-Qadhdhafi's courts. But al-Qadhdhafi became extremely upset over this matter. He abolished both positions and returned the former prisoners to jail without any legal or moral basis. He also turned over the functions of these positions to his people's and revolutionary committees which are unruly, mob-like and ignorant. These committees carry out whatever al-Qadhdhafi orders.

Al-Qadhdhafi made a decision that has not been announced, but that he nevertheless carried out: he terminated the role of the Socialist Union. This is because al-Qadhdhafi does not want and does not trust any organization, even if it is under his command. It is also because the Socialist Union failed to win the confidence of the masses. The evidence for that was in the tumultuous demonstrations by the people to express their opposition to the regime's highhanded practices against them while al-Qadhdhafi assumed a posture of languor and indolence in front of the enemy after Israel shot down the civilian Libyan airplane and killed about 100 Libyan citizens. The masses burned the buildings of the Socialist Union, and al-Qadhdhafi came up with a new stratagem to distract the people. [He created] the People's Committees and a council which he called the General People's Congress. It is made up of mayors and of the chairmen of the people's committees and trade unions. The congress has close to 1,500 members who are not elected by means of a secret, organized ballot. The members of the People's Congress are rather announced by various means to ensure that al-Qadhdhafi can always easily choose whom he wants and drop [from membership] anyone he did not want so as to make the congress a subservient puppet subject to his command. This congress meets once a year for almost 3 days at the invitation of al-Qadhdhafi. It is supposed to discuss and determine Libya's affairs in these 3 days!

The enthusiasm al-Qadhdhafi had demonstrated for the Socialist Union, declaring it an ideal framework [for democracy] and a unique experience in the world, and his warnings of imprisonment to any opponent or adversary were put to use again in implementing his new stratagem [of the people's committees]. He threatened opponents with prison and with the harshest of penalties. In his address to that congress on 14 January 1976 he said, "Our regime is the latest experiment in democracy. The revolution will resist all [forms of] folly and chaos."

Al-Qadhdhafi warned everyone against deviating from the new framework which he had proclaimed and formed.

"Such deviation will be considered a violation of the law and an infringement on the regime, on society and on democracy. It would also be a destruction of life."

His address was published on Thursday, 15/1/1976 in the Libyan government's newspaper, AL-JIHAD.

Al-Qadhdhafi did not forget to warn students that demonstrations were forbidden and that anyone who expressed opposition "will be forcefully opposed and his right to go to court and seek restitution will be lost because he violated the law and went along with the law of the jungle and the law of violence. Students who go out into the street and demonstrate must be put on trial."

And so it is that the shabby organizations which only al-Qadhdhafi establishes one after the other according to his interests remain the ideal organizations [representing] the best of democracy despite the fact that they mutually contradict each other. Any opposition to these various organizations that have succeeded each other is always punishable by imprisonment and execution. Al-Qadhdhafi wants the citizen's mind to be a blank page on which he would write every day whatever his fancies and his ambitions might dictate. Then he would come on the following day and wipe out the statements whose authenticity he had affirmed the previous day. In this place he would transcribe new whims and ambitions whose content differed from those of the ones he had written first, even though they may have the same objectives of establishing al-Qadhdhafi's control over the people and their wealth.

And so every day al-Qadhdhafi would wipe out what he wrote on the previous day. All the citizen would have to do is become a submissive, mute tool, with no opinion about what is engraved in his mind. Any desire to question these opinions or to discuss them would subject this citizen to a severe penalty that may go as far as execution.

In the course of al-Qadhdhafi's explanation of his extraordinarily cruel opinion on the fact that a citizen who violates the law loses his right to take his case to court, he said, "If he is attacked, if his home is broken into or if his wife is raped, the revolution will not protect him because he becomes a non-person." This opinion is undoubtedly [an example of] the worst kind of terrorism and dictatorship. There is nothing like it in any country in the world. It is totally antithetical to one of the articles of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. It also contravenes the simplest principles of justice and law. In addition, it runs counter to Islamic law and to other laws as well. It represents the state's destruction of a citizen's right to life and to freedom as well as his family's right to the same with impunity. It sheds his blood, violates his honor and wastes his money with impunity, and it encourages every other individual to ignore the inviolability of this citizen's life, freedom and funds. It is difficult for a balanced human mind to come up with such a punishment, and all this is because a citizen merely wanted to use the mind that God had given him.

Only 3 days after the address in which al-Qadhdhafi expressed that barbaric opinion, the General People's Congress, which al-Qadhdhafi claimed was the highest form of democracy, revealed its nature and its identity and affirmed the fact that it was a mere puppet which al-Qadhdhafi manipulated as he wished. This congress issued a resolution that will disgrace and dishonor its history and the history of al-Qadhdhafi as well.

The resolution stated, "The Congress resolves that the people's democratic experiment which the Libyan Arab Republic is experiencing is capable of solving the problems of the individual and of the community. Society will not accept any departures from this experiment because these would be departures from the will and the authority of the people. Such departures must be resisted and crushed without leniency. An individual or a group that chooses a course other than this sound, democratic course which the people have accepted loses his right to litigation. People who make that choice are the ones who chose the only method with which one can deal with them. They took the struggle out of its democratic context and used a method that is not proper."

See the resolutions of the General People's Congress, 5-18 [sic] January 1976. The booklet is published by the Ministry of Information in Tripoli.

The tyrant al-Qadhdhafi did not stop at shedding the blood, the freedom and the possessions of those who oppsed him and their families. Some time before announcing this brutality of his, he had affirmed that anyone who did not join his people's congresses and the Socialist Union will have no civil rights and will become a non-person. He will be considered missing and non-existent. He also described those who are not registered, if those people did exist, as insane.

"A person who is not registered in the Constituent People's Congress is a non-person. He is missing; he does not exist. He has no civil rights if he is not registered with us. He is considered missing and a non-person. I do not believe that there can be a citizen who is in this situation unless he is insane."

This statement is from al-Qadhdhafi's explanation of the new amendment to the charter of the Arab Socialist Union, 27 April 1975. This explanation was published on page 5 of the Libyan government's newspaper, AL-JIHAD, 17 Rabi' al-Thani, 1395 Hegira, 29 April, 1975 A.D.

Al-Qadhdhafi continued to praise the General People's Congress just as he used to praise the Socialist Union which had met its fate. He considered every other experience and every other demand worthless and reactionary. In his address on 15 January 1976, he said [the following] about freedom of opinion and speech.

"The appeal for a so-called freedom of speech is a reactionary, backward appeal. It is a statement that democratic experiences have transcended. In our practice the people are governing themselves and determining their own destiny; we are practicing this not just talking about it. Anyone who talks about freedom of speech is a reactionary because we have gone beyond this statement by establishing and practicing a democracy of the people that is genuine."

But while al-Qadhdhafi considers his regime to be beyond [discussions about] freedom of speech and engaged in practicing it, he says in the same address, "The statements of a teacher, a group of teachers, a school, an institute or a college can only be heard through their union. No petition is to be accepted from anyone unless that petition is filed through that person's union."

He says, "Statements by an attorney or by attorneys can only be heard through their association. Nothing any student will say will be heeded unless he says it through the Students' Association. Otherwise, [what he says] would be considered destructive to democracy."

The upshot of this is that the citizen is deprived of any intellectual freedom because al-Qadhdhafi can easily control the professional associations and their leaders. Al-Qadhdhafi had also dealt a blow to the Students' Association and imprisoned and tortured its members and other students. Then he executed students in Benghazi University and killed other students. He mistreated professional associations and sent his henchmen who beat up the president of the Libyan Bar Association and burned his office. Al-Qadhdhafi then abolished the legal profession altogether.

The term, "statements," which is used here naturally refers to opinion. However, al-Qadhdhafi considers any opinion other than his to be mere talk.

What al-Qadhdhafi says about his regime is not confined to the regime's suitability to the society he is ruling. Just as he praised the Socialist Union as the sole democratic framework, he states that his political system, the system of the People's Congress, which is the alternative to the Socialist Union, "is the only road to a genuine democracy of the people. The Libyan Arab Republic has thus come up with a practical solution to the problem of democracy and not just a theoretical solution to that problem for all the societies in the world."

As is customary with the so-called General People's Congress, which is always proving itself to be al-Qadhdhafi's submissive tool despite the latter's claims that the congress is the highest power in the country and the highest form of democracy, the congress issued resolutions in which it concurred with everything that al-Qadhdhafi had mentioned in his address of 15 January 1976 and in the addresses that preceded it as well.

"Through their general congress our great people resolve their total commitment, which stems from their free will, to consider the address delivered by the leader of the revolution on the sixth anniversary of the 1st of September Revolution to be the framework for our social change. We are reaffirming our allegiance to the leader of the revolution, [our] brother, Col Mu'ammar al-Qadhdhafi, and we consider this allegiance to be the practical foundation for realizing our goals for freedom, socialism and unity."

The congress also decided the following to implement al-Qadhdhafi's address of 15 January 1976.

A. The duties of unions, associations, leagues and societies are purely professional.

B. The leaders of unions, associations, leagues and societies are the only legal representatives of their members and the only ones who can speak for their professional interests, their causes and their problems.

C. Political activity can only be practiced through the constituent people's congresses and the general congress of the people.

D. No person can join associations, trade unions, leagues and professional societies unless he is a member of one of the constituent people's congresses.

Thus the General People's Congress has established that it is as far as it can be from being able to express the opinions of its members freely or express the opinions of the masses. It proved that it was no more than a puppet which al-Qadhdhafi manipulates as he wishes: it says what he tells it to say and concurs with what he dictates.

The practices and laws that restrain and confine all forms of individual and collective freedom were revealed after less than 2 years in the preparations that were made for his new political system, as manifested in the people's committees which are an alternative to the various forms of the Socialist Union. Following [a situation] in which citizens were forced to register with the Socialist Union, the situation became worse with the people's committees in control of the Libyan mainstream. These are superficial committees made up of a few proteges of the regime and the remaining beneficiaries of the Socialist Union, assisted by investigations and intelligence officers.

These committees created a stifling, gloomy and a tense atmosphere in Libya, spreading a wave of terror, fear and suppression. There were numerous transgressions and several clashes, and all forms of freedom of opinion and thought, even marginal discussions in closed places and family gatherings were outlawed. The rabble prevailed in the country, and the law no longer commanded respect or sway.

There were several provocations and attacks against university students in 1976. The students broke out in wide-ranging demonstrations in Tripoli and Benghazi in which even the army intervened to suppress. People took part in the largest and broadest gathering during which they expressed their utmost rancor and opposition to the regime which relies on terrorizing them daily and suppressing all forms of freedom and human dignity. It was then, in Benghazi that an armed raid operation was carried out. In Tripoli 'Abd-al-Salam Jalud, firing his gun, raided the campus of the university with a group of soldiers who fired their machine guns as they rushed into the campus.

Mu'ammar al-Qadhdhafi delivered a well-known bloodthirsty address at the University of Benghazi. In that address he expressed his strong hatred and resentment for the student public. Ever since that day, 7 April has been considered a historical day: after that day people were killed, and the government revealed its terrorist practices as it did in the aftermath of the 1973 demonstrations after the Libyan civilian airplane was shot down over Sinai by Israel. It was after that that al-Qadhdhafi delivered his historic Zawarah address or the five points in which he threatened the masses with murder, execution and imprisonment. Al-Qadhdhafi deals with any demonstrations, movements, popular desires or expressions, even if they were peaceful and calm, by doling out more harsh measures, oppressive actions, arbitrary measures, violent statements, cruel laws and arrests.

Al-Qadhdhafi handled the 1973 Benghazi demonstrations by delivering the Zawarah address in which he prodded his people's committees to consider the laws in a state of suspension and to act with citizens on that basis: they can kill, imprison and arrest citizens and burn their books. All this was carried out in a mob-like manner that resembled insanity. Some people were killed; books were burned; and hundreds of intellectuals were thrown in jail without any charge and subjected to various forms of torture. The people's committees gave themselves the right to appropriate the people's liberties, their homes and their personal property.

Al-Qadhdhafi used the same method to remedy the situation after the students' demonstrations in the University of Benghazi and in the University of Tripoli. On 7 April 1976 he delivered an address at the University of Benghazi, and that address was followed by executions, arrests, repression and terror.

In his address of 7 april 1976, which was published on the following day in the government newspaper, AL-JIHAD, al-Qadhdhafi told the faculty and the students of Benghazi University, "It is unacceptable to me to have the society where I and my children live ruled by a party or a group of parties." This statement is from al-Qadhdhafi's address to the faculty and students of Benghazi University on 7 Rabi' al-Akhar 1396 Hegira, 7 April 1976 A.D. The address was published the following day on page 2 of the government newspaper, AL-JIHAD.

Thus, university professors and students who become involved in a mere discussion about party affiliation expose themselves to punishment without trial. Al-Qadhhdafi himself suspended his own law.

"The parliamentary experience is nothing at all. It is an operation of deception; it is nonsense. The walls of the university were not built so you can tread over them in the darkness [of ignorance]. The university is rather a hallow place, where you have to tread in the light [of knowledge]. How can a university student write on the walls of the university the way a small child would? The small child who writes on the wall in your home is punished for his action. Anyone who writes on the walls of the university deserves to be punished too because this is folly. I said that democracy lies in government by the people, not in people expressing themselves. Freedom of speech is not democracy." (Ibid)

The walls of the university are inviolable, but the university itself, its mission, its professors and its students are not as important as the walls.

Al-Qadhdhafi added, "A naive student says that we are a military movement. We want to clean your rotting brains. Do you know what the word military [means]? Democracy is in my blood more than it is in yours. You who talk about these things, if you were ruling the people, you would have turned their life into an unbearable hell. What then is this nonsense that you are saying about the military? This student does not deserve to be a student in the university, and he does not deserve to be among us as of this moment. It is the people who are paying for the university out of their budget. If you want the university to be free and the press to be free and the radio to be free, that's fine; pay up. The cost of this university campus is 50 million. Pay the cost of the books and the lectures. Go collect these funds and see the naivete [for yourselves]. We are exposing the naive mentalities that deserve to be crushed and that have no place in our midst in the university or elsewhere. I am still talking about the majority, this existing passive majority which is incapable of getting even with its enemies." (Ibid)

Anyone who expresses an opinion that does not meet with al-Qadhdhafi's approval, even if he is a university professor, has a rotten mind and deserves to be crushed. Al-Qadhdhafi does not want a free university, a free press or a free broadcast [service], and the students have to pay 50 million out of their own pockets if they want the university to be free. Is al-Qadhdhafi paying for the university out of his own private funds so as to determine what he thinks is fit for the university?

Al-Qadhdhafi continued his address, "I am definitely tired. I am especially tired of the university, of the books, of the words that are in [those books] and the association that you formed. If the enemy of the revolution is the one who is leading the students, then you must be a nation of sheep. You should understand where you are now and why you oppose [something]. You are putting into practice things that are quite old and reactionary. I read what you wrote, and these [articles] unfortunately advocate, I mean, indicate illiteracy, naivete superficiality, a lack of knowledge and a lack of awareness of where one's interests lie." (Ibid).

This makes it evident that al-Qadhdhafi does not tolerate another opinion that differs from his own. A person who subscribes to another opinion is a sheep. Because articles written by university professors and students do not glorify al-Qadhdhafi, those people are in his opinion illiterate. He said that much in his address.

"I read the publications that are written by some small fry here at the university. The time has come to cut their hands and chop off their heads. I can have a number of people who are enemies of the revolution executed now because I know I am right. If you want to destroy your interests and the iterests of your families, persist in this whim of yours. Anyone who expresses opposition must be trampled underfoot by the Libyan people. To those who said that 15 students died, [let me tell them], let us assume that they did die; who took them out of the university and into the street? The one who went to Tobruq and told students to demonstrate is known. In whose interests does this idiot think these demonstrations are taking place? The one who went to (Daranah) and prodded [the students] to demonstrate [is also known]. When you cheer in a demonstration against the revolution, you are thereby supporting the Zionist enemy; you are standing alongside the U.S. enemy; and you are supporting reactionaries. You would be putting yourself at the service of Jews and Christians." (Ibid)

Thus in one paragraph al-Qadhdhafi made harsh statements that hurt university professors and students and threatened to cut their hands and chop off their heads. He called them small fry and advocated that they be trampled underfoot and executed. He accused them of being stupid and of working for colonialism, reactionaries and Jews. All this [invective] was due to the fact that students published a leaflet after university students were shot to death by [members of] al-Qadhdhafi's regime.

Al-Qadhdhafi went on to say, "I do not know what a person who opposes the regime seeks and wants. If one were to think of a university student opposing the revolution, such opposition would be an indication of ignorance and backwardness. The tables are turned: those who are here in the university are illiterate, and those who are outside the university are the ones who are educated and cultured. The revolutionary program is in your interests. It is better for you than if we were to force a party on you. Tomorrow we will form a workers' party; we will force it on you; and it will become a dictatorship. It is best for you to be in a people's committee. It is better for you than having us force on you some agency that would act with you in a highhanded manner." (Ibid).

Al-Qadhdhafi continues to affirm that everyone who opposes [the regime] is ignorant, backward and illiterate, even if he were a university professor. His logic states, "Either you let me govern you in my own way or I turn on you someone who will be even more highhanded with you than I am."

Al-Qadhdhafi went on to say, "Here at the university writing on the walls is absolutely forbidden. Writing on the wall means that a policeman must come into the university with a cane in his hand. He would hit you on the fingers and pull your ear as though you were a child. It is forbidden to write and hang posters and leaflets on the walls; it is offensive." (Ibid).

Anyone who writes or hangs posters on the walls of the university is to be punished, unless the statements he writes or the posters he hangs on the walls of the university and elsewhere are filled with expressions that glorify al-Qadhdhafi and contain expressions from his Green Book.

Al-Qadhdhafi added, "What is happening now is that revolutionary committees are being formed in every college. These committees are conducting a purge of the students and the faculty. If students want this to be carried out peacefully, it will be; if not, it will be done with bloodshed. Revolutionary committees must be formed everywhere; their function is to purge the student body and the faculty.

"Those who ran away in fear are the enemies of the revolution. They cannot enter the university, and they have no place there. If there are members of the faculty who are opposed to the revolution, they must be eliminated. Why does a policeman go inside the university to arrest you? He does that because you do not know how to conduct yourself because you are not free. You are rather a slave to your own delusions. Go to your masters, the enemies of the nation." (Ibid).

And here too al-Qadhdhafi hurls more abuse and vilification on university professors and students. Some of those who walked out of the university and marched in the demonstrations were killed. Some of those who stayed behind were expelled by the university or by the revolutionary committees. Those who left the university were considered enemies of the revolution and expelled from it. The university can hold only those who sing the praises of al-Qadhdhafi, glorify him and cheer for him.

A footnote: Wearing his military uniform al-Qadhdhafi rushed into the [lecture] hall along with a large group of military men. The gun he was carrying was visible. All during the hysterical address he delivered, al-Qadhdhafi brandished the cane he was holding in his hand while the military men who were around him kept their fingers on the triggers of their guns. No university official was allowed to stand next to al-Qadhdhafi or behind him. This was an expression of his fear, his dislike and his resentment for university students and faculty.

This uncivilized address was followed by a vicious, hate campaign against the student movement and against culture in general. Al-Qadhdhafi even said in the national congress of his party during a discussion about the people's committees and how they are chosen, "Don't be fooled by a person with a doctorate or an educated person who looks down on you. Trample such people underfoot and crush them." After that a reign of terror spread among the ranks of the people and among those who are educated as well. Most intellectuals, however, were imprisoned; hundreds of them were taken in custody.

Al-Qadhdhafi proclaimed and put into practice mandatory military training without enacting a mandatory conscription law. He used this mandatory training as a means of taming students and intellectuals, to even the score with them and to get rid of all those who can use their knowledge and their thoughts to raise a few questions. Al-Qadhdhafi devoted his efforts to his campaign of bloodthirsty speeches so as to strike more terror and fear in people's hearts.

Thus despite claims that ideal democracy was being practiced--and this is the democracy that al-Qadhdhafi had promised, the democracy that transcended and went beyond freedom of speech--that democracy did not tolerate the students' demonstrations which broke out 5 months after al-Qadhdhafi delivered his address in the universities of Tripoli and Benghazi. Many students lost their lives in these demonstrations. They were killed by the bullets of the tyrannical authority. The Libyan student communities abroad were sympathetic, and there were sit-ins in embassies in every country where Libyan students were. Al-Qadhdhafi delivered his address on 7 April 1976, and numerous selections of it have been published. A picture of the ideal democracy in practice was unveiled and revealed, and a sense of total sadness, pain and misery prevailed throughout the country due to these bloodthirsty practices. However, al-Qadhdhafi whose method has always been offensive and not defensive, using expressions which emphasize crushing, executing and eliminating people, continued his campaign to protect his regime in the name of protecting the revolution. On 19 April 1976 every careful observer was assured of the identity of al-Qadhdhafi's democracy whose foundations he had established at the General People's Congress in January 1976. He said then, "We are the revolution. I want to emphasize this constantly and all the time. We are the revolution. Almost all the Arab revolutions today have been eliminated and have turned into police regimes whose only concern is to fight the masses and to confirm a dictatorial government."

Al-Qadhdhafi then turns to criticize parliamentary, democratic experiments and says, "The fact that no nation in the world has received a real form of power, as is the case in the Libyan Arab Republic, indicates that people are not free. When a party receives power on behalf of the people, such power is false. It involves deceiving the people and [imposing] a dictatorial government on them. All the people are subject to that government while the party rules."

Al-Qadhdhafi then goes back to the attitude of the student movement and says, "Thank God, they were a small, handful of students whose posture was rightist. Their rightist posture proved that they had no interest in the revolution and that they were against the cause of liberating the Arab land of Palestine. They proved that they were enemies of Islam, enemies of the cultural awakening, enemies of farmers, enemies of workers, enemies of the Libyan people, enemies of progress and enemies of Islam. Accordingly, they do in fact deserve to be crushed." This is from al-Qadhdhafi's address on 19 April 1976 which he delivered in Wadi Zamzam.

Thus, students' demonstrations and their opposition to al-Qadhdhafi's shameful violations of basic rights and freedoms in society were turned into non-existent and unfounded charges against them. Major charges were made against them in offensive terms that were actually ridiculous. Because those students carried out demonstrations that were not instigated by the government and were not approved by it beforehand, they have become enemies of everything: of the masses, of Arab unity, of the liberation of Palestine, Islam, civilization, farmers, workers and once again enemies of the Arab nation and of Islamic progress. Al-Qadhdhafi then concludes his [litany] of false charges by saying that the students have actually been convicted, incriminated and crushed.

Al-Qadhdhafi affirmed his lack of respect for his superficial courts and his special emergency courts even before the detained students were taken to court. He issued his verdicts on the detained students before they were put on trial. "The enemies of the revolution have actually been eliminated. The court will issue the death sentence against them, and they will hang from the door of a church. The people have passed judgment everywhere. The people are asking for their execution. We have discovered that the plot which prodded the students was a foreign, colonialist, outside plot." This is from al-Qadhdhafi's address on 19 April 1976.

Thus any form of opposition, even peaceful opposition in democratic regimes, are construed in al-Qadhdhafi's regime as treason; and those who voice such opposition are considered enemies of everything, instigators prodded by an outside, colonialist plot and traitors.

The students to whom al-Qadhdhafi referred in his address were actually sentenced to death, and the sentence was carried out in the same place that was referred to above. Their bodies remained hanging for a whole day, and they were shown to television viewers.

Al-Qadhdhafi then began to turn into a theoretician, a philosopher and then a prophet when he issued his Third Universal Theory in the Green Book. His opinions became not only absolutely indisputable, but they were also read in the same way the Koran was read on radio and television. Selections from his Green Book were relayed every day in Libyan newspapers, and he began to surround himself and his ideas with an aura of divinity and sanctity. Not only has a discussion of those ideas become a crime, but not reading them, not being guided by them, not believing in them and not yielding to them has also become a crime.

Al-Qadhdhafi's Green Book itself may clearly express his blatant violations of basic freedoms. Al-Qadhdhafi divides his book into three sections. In one section he defines his notion of democracy; in the second section he defines his economic "theory;" and in the third part he [defines] social relations. In the first part al-Qadhdhafi violates all the internationally recognized basic freedoms such as the right to speak freely and to have one's opinion, [the right] to demonstrate and [to hold a] political assembly, and the right to exercise freedom of religion and freedom of the press. Al-Qadhdhafi considers all these [rights and freedoms] to have run their course and their tools to be dictatorial and reactionary.

If one can describe al-Qadhdhafi's statements and addresses, one can say that they are always emphasizing the justification of any measure that would thwart freedoms and allow his government anything for the purpose of concentrating all the means and methods of direct and violent control in its hands. However, the Green Book era, or the era of the masses as he likes to describe it, reveals to the inquirer other facts and other angles that round out al-Qadhdhafi's personality. Al-Qadhdhafi has a blind bias for all his opinions which he imposes on people with violence. He tolerates neither a discussion of those opinions nor an opposing opinion. He uses all the methods of the media and tremendous sums of money as well to promote those ideas which constitute comprehensive intellectual terrorism. This blind intellectual fanaticism which al-Qadhdhafi manifests for his opinions indicates narrow horizons, ignorance of the interrelationship between [the branches of] human knowledge, short-sightedness and hostility to individual effort. It is an indication of al-Qadhdhafi's inability to face up to the search for knowledge which can radiate the cultural glow for the development of humanity.

Al-Qadhdhafi lavishes random praise on "his theory" in the course of expounding that theory in the Green Book where no traces of humility can be found. As has already been stated, the Green Book is a required textbook in all the stages of education. It is also recited in the same way the Koran is recited at the beginning and at the end of radio and television broadcasts and before any news bulletin is read. Selections from the Green Book are printed in prominent positions every day on every page of the official newspapers. In fact, all the state's dispatches have selections from the Green Book: "the committees are everywhere;" and "there can be no democracy without people's congresses." This preoccupation with himself is a narcissistic phenomenon that does not respect the cultures, the efforts, opinions or the knowledge of others. Accordingly, it presents a sarcastic portrait of a distorted, adolescent, fanatic mind; it does not extend the horizons of knowledge, nor does it advance any new thought that would impose itself or forge its course by using logic, argument and dialogue.

"It is best to embrace the Green Book; otherwise a red book will be forced on you." This is one of the statements that al-Qadhdhafi made to clergymen and prayer leaders when he met with them in Tripoli in March 1978.

Despite all appearances to the contrary, al-Qadhdhafi lacks confidence in himself. He has a restless, disturbed personality. The circumstances of his birth and the life he lived after his peers moved ahead of him made him somewhat bitter and rancorous, and these feelings affected the course of his life. He tried to overcome them by assuming command and presiding over his classmates who were at least 5 years younger than he was. Because he was older than they were, he began forcing himself and all his opinions on them. He grew up in this atmosphere that led him to attain his ambitions in the military organization.

Since coming to power involved some intelligence, al-Qadhdhafi was taken by unlimited self-admiration. In the first part of the Green Book he says of his opinion of democracy, "No one represents the people; representation is deception." He says, "The party is the dictatorship of the age; it is the modern, democratic method of government." About parties he says, "The purpose of parties is to impose the power of their beliefs on society as a whole; their objective is power [which they seek] in the name of carrying out their programs."

A footnote: This statement may have been one of the means by which al-Qadhdhafi attained power under the guise of saving the Arab nation and implementing a development program. Al-Qadhdhafi increased the fragmentation of the Arab countries, and the development programs of the previous age were better than those of al-Qadhdhafi. Al-Qadhdhafi's foolish ambitions led to the development of hostility between Libya and most of its neighboring and non-neighboring Arab countries.

If we were to review al-Qadhdhafi's ideas in the course of reviewing his violations of basic and political human rights, we would find [the following]:

1. He is opposed to parliamentary and legislative bodies that are elected by means of a free secret ballot, regardless of the soundness and integrity of the method used and the neutrality of the results. This is because al-Qadhdhafi objects to the substance, the identity and the power of a parliamentary body and not to its form or to a few of its flaws which can be remedied. His objection to secret balloting also is due to the fact that forgery [under those circumstances] would be difficult and so would total control of its outcome.

2. He despises partisanship and parties because in his opinion they constitute a contemporary dictatorship.

3. He rejects the principle of a popular referendum regardless of the guarantees, the conditions and the precautions.

4. He does not recognize freedom of the press.

Having destroyed these foundations, al-Qadhdhafi said that in his opinion the way out lay in the establishment of people's committees which would elect their representatives to the People's Congress. A representative of a people's committee would not have the right to make a single statement that he was not told to make by the committee that sent him to the People's Congress. He would not have the right to raise questions or to discuss any new points. The method of selecting this representative must not be secret. This would make it easy for al-Qadhdhafi and his group to control the selection of those representatives, and this is what usually happens. Furthermore, the revolutionary committees--which are non-existent in the Green Book, which contains the radical and the final solution to all the problems of the human race--are the committees that advise and guide the masses in selecting their proper representative to the congress. This is from al-Qadhdhafi's address to the revolutionary committees in December 1978.

Al-Qadhdhafi knows that today [the task of] abolishing a parliamentary body, overruling the representatives of the people and having all the people come together in the old style of the Greeks to govern themselves has become impossible. "It is indisputable and incontestable that direct democracy, if it becomes a reality, is the ideal method. But no matter how small the population is, the people cannot be brought together at once to discuss, consider and decide their policy. Therefore, nations have turned away from direct democracy and replaced it with numerous theories of government such as parliamentary bodies and party blocs." This is from the first chapter of the Green Book on solving the problem of democracy.

Al-Qadhdhafi is thereby acknowledging the fact that direct government for all the people is merely a glorious idea that is quite far from the world of reality. What then is the solution?

Al-Qadhdhafi does not offer a solution, but he begins his answer by endorsing a decisive government as though that endorsement were a resolution of the military Revolutionary Command Council which has already produced the charter and decreed the Socialist Union. Al-Qadhdhafi says, "The Green Book promises to guide all nations to the path of direct democracy according to a wonderful and a practical system." This is from the first chapter of the Green Book.

Al-Qadhdhafi thus did not begin to explain his alternative theory after having attacked parliament, parties, the free press, a referendum and free secret elections. Instead, he began by approving an ultimate [form of] government before presenting his theory. He may have done that to arouse interest, and he may have done that to arouse fear also, especially since al-Qadhdhafi acknowledges that direct democracy is impossible. "Whereas no two sane people disagree on the notion that direct democracy is the ideal democracy, although its application is impossible, and whereas the Third Universal Theory offers us a realistic experience of direct democracy, then the problem of direct democracy in the world has been solved." Even after this absolute judgment which comes in al-Qadhdhafi's theory book two pages before the end of the book, al-Qadhdhafi does not reveal this extraordinary theory which he--in all humility--describes by using all the adjectives that Muslims use to describe the Holy Koran, the last book to be considered [the source of] guidance for all humanity just as the noble prophet is the last of God's messengers. Al-Qadhdhafi used all these adjectives to describe the Green Book, "the guide for humanity." Al-Qadhdhafi, "the revolutionary thinker" and the "teacher commander" presents his theory in the last two pages of his book. Afterwards the theory became a decree according to which the country has been governed. "There is only one method and one theory for democracy. It lies in the people's congresses and in the people's committees." (Ibid)

"First, the people are to be divided into constituent people's congresses, and each congress is to select a committee to lead it. The regional non-constituent people's congresses are formed from all the committees. Then the masses of these constituent people's congresses choose administrative people's committees to replace government administrations. All the facilities of society would thus be run by people's committees, and the people's committees that run these facilities become responsible for them in front of the constituent people's congresses which dictate policy to them and monitor their implementation of this policy."

Al-Qadhdhafi's review of democracy in his book comes to an end. He has considered these few lines to be the greatest idea in history since the French Revolution--[he said that in] his address to clergymen in March 1978. He considered his words to be the guiding light for humanity, and the "ultimate" solution for democracy in the world. "The problem of running the government is thereby evidently solved; the tools of dictatorship are brought to an end; the people become the means of government; and the riddle of democracy in the world is thereby solved." (Ibid) Afterwards al-Qadhdhafi turned from being a mere guardian of democracy--which is the description that was given to 'Abd-al-Nasir--to a philosopher making fun of 'Abd-al-Nasir himself. "It is the state of alliance in society that brought about the end of Nasirism with the death of 'Abd-al-Nasir."

The constitutional proclamation expired and another proclamation was made in its place on 2 March 1977. It was called by al-Qadhdhafi "the Proclamation of Establishing the People's Power." He put his theory into practice, not through upgrading the congresses by secret balloting but rather by calling for persons whose "revolutionary" attributes can be trusted. Those people would choose their counterparts in every region, and what later came to be called the General People's Congress was formed. It announced the establishment of the people's power and "affirmed the course of the advancing revolution under the leadership of the revolutionary leader and the teacher commander, Col Mu'ammar al-Qadhdhafi." (From the Proclamation of the People's Power, 2 March 1977).

The congress adopted a resolution to put into practice the opinion presented by al-Qadhdhafi in his book which claims to have solved the problem of democracy in the world and changed the name of the country to that of Jamahiriyah. We will deal with this event in the third part of this report, the part on practices.

The third resolution or the third proclamation of the People's Congress at its meeting of 2 March 1977 was "the resolution of the General People's Congress to select the revolutionary thinker and the teacher commander, Col Mu'ammar al-Qadhdhafi secretary general of the People's Congress." (from the Libyan newspaper, AL-FAJR AL-JADID [The new Dawn], 3 March 1977).

The fourth resolution was that of appointing members of the General People's Congress. After the congress decided to elect al-Qadhdhafi secretary general of the congress, it decided to elect members for this secretariat which was to consist of the remaining members of the Revolutionary Command Council: Jalud, al-Khuwayldi, al-Kharubi and Yunis.

Al-Qadhdhafi proceeded on this course that he had chosen--a twisted and a temperamental method of political action, unrestricted by regulatory measures or regulatory laws that would restrict his measures or his conduct or stop him at some point. Any studious researcher would discover under scrutiny that this theory, which al-Qadhdhafi has presented, is not the outcome of thought, but it is rather the product of his need for evasive theories, laced with terror, about the causes that call for democrcy. These causes have often placed him on a collision course with the masses and with students.

Al-Qadhdhafi's criticism of parliament is not new; he criticized it even before he brought forth his theory in 1977. By referring to the method he used and the statements he made before he advanced his theory, it becomes evident that he did not think of setting up any parliamentary elections, regardless of their form, even among the members of the Socialist Union as 'Abd-al-Nasir used to do.

Al-Qadhdhafi's hostility to parties is also well known and has been reviewed. The review spans his 1969 Tripoli address and the law that was issued in 1972. We have already referred to that law, and we will review its articles in the second part of this report.

With regard to freedom of the press, al-Qadhdhafi abolished the national press and established the Government Press Organization. We touched upon his address to students on 7 April 1976.

Regarding the referendum, he does not want nor does he think of letting himself be tested in front of the people, even if that were under the supervision of his officers. Perhaps this is because he either despises or fears the opinion of the people.

Thus the theory was formulated to establish a set method and an existing policy; it was not the result of a theoretical and an intellectual effort. The best indication of this lies in al-Qadhdhafi's sarcastic remarks with which he concludes his theory. These remarks will help those who are deceived by hollow words. "This is true democracy in theory. In practice, it is always the powerful who rule." (The Green Book, Part One).

This is the brief and terse conclusion of al-Qadhdhafi's statements which we tried to list here so they can serve as a reference for those who are seeking power [and who wish] to find out the extent of the violations of al-Qadhdhafi's government of the simplest rules of human rights and basic freedoms in Libya.

In this chapter of the report and through what has been reviewed we wish to emphasize the following:

First, al-Qadhdhafi's hostility for freedoms began on 1 September 1969, the date that brought him to power by military means.

Second, al-Qadhdhafi has declared his hostility to basic and political freedoms in the speeches which have been reviewed, from September 1969 until this date. Accordingly, his theory in his Green Book serves his policy of controlling, terrorizing, dominating and repressing people. He abolished human and individual rights to establish party organizations and to exercise freedom in individual or collective political belief, violating thereby the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

Third, al-Qadhdahfi's domestic and foreign policy has been temperamental. Inside the country he established the Socialist Union, adopted the charter, the people's committees, the five points of the Zawarah address and then the Green Book and the revolutionary committees. All this, however, intensified his hostility to basic and political freedoms, to the formation and organization of political organizations, to peaceful political opposition, parliament, careful control by the people and to a binding constitution. [It has also intensified his hostility to] a judicial authority and to other guarantees against a ruler violating the rights of a society and of individuals, dominating them and using them as tools which he would create and terminate at will. Al-Qadhdhafi's foreign policy, despite daily shifts and position changes--from an advocate of unity to an advocate of regionalism, of tribalism and narrow family interests; from a U.S. supporter to an enemy of the Russians and an opponent of the liberation organization; from a partner in a relationship of unity with Egypt to blatant hostility toward Egypt whether it fought or not--did not change, and his hostility to democracy and to the course of basic freedoms remained unchanged. This is the only stance among al-Qadhdhafi's vacillations in thought, policy and institutions that has remained firm. Its extremism, fanaticism and terror increase every day. It is a posture characterized by the repression of individuals and groups [as is evident] in his speeches, statements, theories, laws, decrees, legislation and daily practices against our people, as we will see in the two following parts of this report.

Mu'ammar's statements, laws and practices in the 10 years of his reign intensify the terror, repression, wholesale killing and the psychological destruction of society every day. They strip the citizens of their spirit of national ambition, and they reinforce his autocracy and his domination.

If there is any freedom for al-Qadhdhafi to talk about, it is his absolute freedom to thwart the rights of Libyan citizens and to violate their basic and political freedoms.

[Article: "Arab Economic Progress In 1980; the Oil-Producing Countries Account For 82 Percent Of Arab GNP and Have a $105 Billion Surplus"]

[Text] According to a recent report released by the Secretariat General of the Council of Arab Economic Unity the overall balance of trade of the Arab countries showed a $90 billion surplus in 1980, compared with $56 billion in 1979 and $22 billion in 1978.

Most of the surplus is concentrated in the Arab oil-producing countries which in 1980 had an estimated $105 billion surplus, compared with $66.6 billion in 1979.

The balance of trade deficit of the [non]-oil-producing Arab countries amounted to about $15 billion in 1980, compared with $10.6 billion in 1979.

The report indicated that the relative weight of the GNP's of the oil-producing Arab countries to the GNP of the Arab Nation as a whole rose from 71.6 percent in 1978 to about 76 percent in 1979, and to approximately 82 percent in 1980. This growth reflects the emergence of the Arab oil countries as an important influence in Arab and international affairs.

Trade

The report reviewed the Arab trade situation and noted the decreasing proportion of inter-Arab trade as a part of total foreign trade with the non-Arab world. This reflects the tenuousness of inter-Arab economic ties.

According to the statistics the value of Arab exports to Arab countries was only 6 percent of total exports in 1980.

Oil revenues comprised about 88 percent of the value of Arab exports in 1980.

Agricultural Production

The report confirmed that Arab agricultural production has decreased in comparison with world production levels. Arab grain yields has fallen to 1.1 tons per hectare while the average world yield is 1.9 tons per hectare.

With regard to wheat, average yield in the Arab World is 1 ton per hectare while the average worldwide yield is 1.7 tons.

The report gave an estimated Arab shortfall of all grains amounting to about 13.6 million tons, mostly wheat, in 1980. This shortfall is expected to amount to about 19.2 million tons by the year 2000.

Industry

The report noted that consumer industries comprised more than 50 percent of all Arab manufacturing industries, while intermediate industries make up 25 to 30 percent. Production industries make up only 5 to 15 percent.

The Arab share of worldwide industrial output is only 0.5 percent, while industrial goods account for 65 percent of all Arab imports.

DETAILS OF 5-YEAR ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT PLAN REVEALED

Dubai AL-BAYAN in Arabic 1 Oct 81 p 3

[Article by 'Ali Ibrahim: "An Open Discussion About a Secret Arab Economic Document, Part 2, Grain Elevators To Stockpile Imported Grain; $1.5 Billion In Military Industries"]

[Text] A joint Arab contracting organization is needed to implement $9.1 billion in construction.

A projected $6.3 billion first Arab economic plan to achieve food security.

According to recent statistics the amount of assistance and loans provided by the well-to-do Arab countries to the developing countries during the 1970's was about $30 billion.

During an interview with AL-BAYAN held in Tunis Dr 'Abd-al-Muhsin Zalzalah, deputy secretary general of the Arab League for economic affairs, said that this fact shows that the proposed investments for the first 5-year plan for joint Arab economic work, 1981-1985, which amount to $21.5 billion--of which only $12 billion is actually needed for financing--do not constitute an overly ambitious, impractical or unrealistic figure.

The proposed plan, the first part of which AL-BAYAN published in a previous installment, concentrates on projects for Arab food security and establishing as strategic stockpile of food in view of the dangerous situation currently facing the Arab countries in their dependence on foreign countries to ensure food, and the threat this poses even to their freedom and political independence.

The plan gives top priority to the military industries insofar as proposed industrialization projects are concerned. In today's installment the distribution of the plan's investments by sector and country is given.

The final estimated distribution of the plan's investments is as follows:

$6.3 billion--29 percent of the total--for food security.

$7.3 billion--34 percent--for industrialization, including food industries related to achieving food security.

$8 billion for the various other sectors.

Investments in Industry

The investments allocated for industry include $1 billion for geological and mineral surveys; $605 million for mining industries; $167.6 million for food industries; $445 million for chemical industries; $200 million for petroleum industries; $294 million for non-mineral raw materials industries; $2.938 billion for mineral and technological industries; $120 million for electronics industries; $1.5 billion for military industries; $190.4 million for industrial research and training.

Transport, Communications and Stockpiling

Investments of $5,933,600,000 have been allocated for the transport, communications and stockpiling sector. About 30 percent will be used toward the achievement of food security by establishing warehouses to hold Arab food stockpiles.

This sector has projects which include $2.181 billion--36.8 percent--for land transport; $950 million--16 percent--for railroads; $389 million--6.6 percent--for maritime transport; $500 million--8.4 percent--for air transport; $150 million--2.5 percent--for wire and wireless communications; $1.763,600,000--29.7 percent--for warehouses for strategic food stockpiling; $139 [sic] for research.

Services

Ten percent of the plan's investments--$2.358 billion--has been allocated for the services sector. Within this sector 80.3 percent of the investments will be for basic education projects and projects for eliminating illiteracy; $49.1 million will go for establishing a Palestinian university;, and $290 million will be spent on health services.

Water and Electricity

Investments in the area of water and electricity amount to $1,010,200,000, which is 4.1 percent of the plan's total. Of this, $200 million will go towards building an electric generating station in Democratic Yemen and linking it with northern Yemen. The remainder will be allocated towards linking the electricity networks among neighboring countries in the Arabian Peninsula and in North Africa.

It will be seen that the proposed plan allocates a greater share--11 percent--to industrialization than the amount originally allocated in the proposal submitted to the ministers of foreign affairs and economy in 1980. This is to better serve the goals of scientific research and technological development.

The Military Industries

The proposed plan makes note of compliance with the terms of a document on strategy for joint Arab economic activity. The military industries have been given top priority for industrialization, followed by industries peripheral to the military, and by the rest of the primary and technological industries requiring industrialization, including the transport industry.

The plan affirms the importance of the agricultural industries in view of their connection with food security. It also affirms the importance of the building materials and construction industries by virtue of their connection with implementation of the projects required for development.

The plan makes note of the fact that local plans are mostly concerned with the petrochemical and building materials industries. Therefore it emphasizes strengthening the other sectors, beginning with mining, to broaden the resources base.

The transport, communications and stockpiling sector owes its high share to the goal that has been set for building grain elevators capacious enough to ensure a strategic stockpiling of the principal grains, particularly wheat and corn, in view of the fact that this stockpile will form the primary basis for Arab food security.

The proposed plan included the construction sector within those sectors devoted to the production of commodities, and which also include agriculture, industry and electricity.

An Arab Contracting Organization

The proposal affirms that a joint Arab effort to invest a total of $21.5 billion requires the establishment of a joint Arab contracting organization to implement the projects. It noted that one of the most important advantages of the completeness of the planning was that the size and scope of the construction work has become clear.

For example, of the $6 billion to be invested in the transport, communications and stockpiling sector, $4 billion will go towards construction work, primarily in building roads and bridges.

According to estimates given in the plan, the construction sector--which, the plan emphasizes, is number one as far as production goes, since it is responsible for implementing investments which in time will exceed $9.1 billion--will, during the 5 years of the plan, purchase $5.5 billion worth of Arab products for its construction needs.

Therefore the plan calls for the establishment of a pan-Arab contracting organization which will require an investment of $488 million. The plan also calls for establishing joint Arab consulting agencies.

Some of the plan's studies also showed the need for establishing a joint Arab company to market the products of the technological industries in the Arab countries. This will require an estimated investment of $10 million in view of the limited market for Arab technological products which in many cases leads to unutilized production potential.

Food Security

The plan is particularly concerned with food security and Arab agricultural development. It noted that the Arab World has vast expanses of arable land--about 236 million hectares--of which only one-fifth--46.4 million hectares--is being put to use. It noted that it is possible to increase the area under cultivation fourfold, by 190 million hectares.

The plan also made note of the fact that 20 percent of the cultivated land can be made to increase its yield because it depends on permanent water sources. The other 80 percent is dependent on rain, and thus has low yields and high transport [costs].

With regard to water, 475.7 billion cubic meters could be utilized annually, but only 297.5 billion actually are.

What Is Required For Implementation

In its conclusion, the plan states several points which must be taken into account before it can be implemented. These are as follows:

That the matter of strengthening the resources of the pan-Arab and local finance organizations be considered to ensure the requisite investments.

That an initial agreement be made for dividing the additional allocations among those organizations.

That an agreement be reached on unified principles with regard to the terms for financing every kind of project to make financing accessible to the borrower nations.

In view of the fact that the amount allocated for local plans by the nations with a deficit may exceed local cash resources in the initial phase of the plan, consideration must be made for strengthening the ability of the financing agencies responsible for supporting the balance of payments of the Arab countries to cover the sum of $2 billion, in addition to the allocations necessary for the local plans themselves.

The plan contains proposals that can be included within the Decade for Arab Development which will be financed by five Arab Gulf States: the UAE, Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Qatar and Iraq.

Implementation requires devising annual programs of implementation to mobilize resources, and a rigorous system for annual planning and follow-up.

'BAKHTAR' HITS 'DEUTSHE WELLE' APPOINTMENT OF AMIN ASSOCIATE

LD122122 Kabul BAKHTAR in English 0442 GMT 12 Nov 81

[Text] Kabul, 11 Nov (BAKHTAR)--The recent appointment of Qudos Tandar, a close associate of Hafizollah Amin, as the head of radio broadcasts of Deutsche Welle is yet another proof of the fact that the position of Amin's tyrannical regime and true continuing support to Afghan counter-revolution are parts of a single imperialist plot to overthrow the revolutionary power in the DRA, writes a political observer of BAKHTAR news agency.

The commentary notes that the significance of this appointment is more than that of a routine appointment of some [word indistinct]. Firstly, the post of the in-charge of radio broadcasts in Deutsche Welle is an official government post in the Federal Republic of Germany while the said person was sometimes ago a high-ranking official in the government of Amin and also one of his close associates.

Secondly, as disclosed by the general head of the external services of Deutsche Welle radio, verifications had been obtained prior to Qudos Tandar's appointment, from the middle eastern radio programme service, the intelligence service of the FRG and the officials of the Embassy of FRG in Kabul.

Waht was so attractive here in this man who wore the appearance of an overzealous revolutionary that caused Deutsche Welle to see eye to eye with him? The commentary provides an answer to this question by quoting Qodos Tandar himself.

Speaking to the reactionary daily RHEINISCHER MERCUR, he said: "I am a fit man for this job because after the victory of the April revolution Deutsche Welle recommended to me to go to Afghanistan.... Later after the new phase of the revolution it assisted me in fleeing from Afghanistan. I can prove these assertions with documents." This shows (?how) a man is sent immediately after the revolution to Afghanistan, finds a place in a sensitive spot in the social circles of Hafizollah Amin and on completion of his mission is called back again to his imperialist shelter.

The commentator observes that appointment of this accomplice of Amin to this responsible post in the Deutsche Welle radio which broadcasts day in and day out falsehoods against all progressive states including revolutionary Afghanistan prove that the essence of the misdeeds of Amin and his clique (?was) akin to the present-day actions of counter-revolutionaries pitted against the DRA. Both originated from the same source, that is the CIA and other such devilish apparatuses of imperialism.

AFGHAN PAPER ON CIA PLOTS

LD180941 Kabul BAKHTAR in English 0418 GMT 18 Nov 81

[Text] Kabul, 17 Nov (BAKHTAR)--The DAILY HEWAD, in an editorial captioned, "The CIA Intervention in Our Country is Doomed to Failure," writes:

"The people of Afghanistan forming a united and monolithic force are standing in the fortress on [word indistinct] the homeland and national democratic revolution all [word indistinct] one voice and loudly condemn the CIA intervention in the internal affairs of our country."

The paper says "our people have a firm and unshakable belief that with the victory of the April revolution especially its new revolutionary phase the destiny of our people and our homeland has passed over to the millions of the toiling masses of the society who are the real masters and owners of the country. Now Afghanistan is put on the path of progress and development and we are building with the help and cooperation of each other a society where there would be no exploitation, no poverty and deprivations or oppression and repression."

But, the world devouring imperialism which is basically opposed to the welfare and well-being of the masses is afraid of progress and the rising power of the masses. It is because, under such conditions they can no longer exploit and plunder the wealth of these countries, they oppose any progressive changes and social revolutions and want to create obstacles in the way of progress and developments which endanger their interests.

This explains the reasons why the national and democratic April revolution which transferred the powers of the toiling people of Afghanistan ran into strong opposition from these imperialist circles and reactionary quarters supported by the American imperialism.

The paper continues: "As the power of the people is invincible and nothing can resist the will of the nation and prevent realising the aims of the people. Thus, each time that the world devouring American imperialism has endeavoured to encroach upon the inalienable rights of the people of Afghanistan, through the use of hirelings, it has not only failed in realising its dirty aims and designs, but, it has exposed its vicious schemes and interventionist plans against Afghanistan which are contrary to the United Nations charter and run counter to all international laws.

Citing the example the paper points out to the recent exposure of the disgraceful acts of CIA against revolution in Afghanistan which was brought to light a few days ago as a result of the confessions made by a sold-out agent of imperialism which was published in the mass media of the country.

By recruiting these sold out agents, the imperialists on one hand intend to wage a slanderous campaign against the DRA Government and against our tested friends and want to tarnish their image among the people, and on the other hand to collect informations which serve the interests of the enemy of the revolution and use it against our people and our lawful government when occasion arises.

The paper concludes by saying, that as our revolution is irreversible and its social bases are strengthening day by day, the internal and external enemies will never be able to translate their dirty aims into practice against Afghanistan as today the people, party and the state being all united work and struggle for achieving a definite aim.

KARACHI COMMENTATOR ON SOLUTION FOR AFGHAN ISSUE

BK080724 Karachi Domestic Service in English 1715 GMT 7 Nov 81

[M. A. Qadri commentary]

[Text] Horrifying news continues to come from Afghanistan where resistance from scantily armed but stouthearted freedom fighters is being met with ferocious reprisals by Karmal forces backed to the hilt by the sophisticated Soviet weapons and advisers. The latest in the series is that the Soviet airplanes and six helicopter gunships bombed five villages in Hera Province causing severe damage to the villages and killing or injuring a number of innocent people. Apparently this was in retaliation of an earlier attack by Muslim Mujahideens against the forces in the area in which 2 Soviet tanks were destroyed and 22 of Russian armymen were killed and 3 Mujahideens lost their lives. And this is not one solitary instance. In recent weeks Soviet forces have also indulged in heavy bombing in areas around other provincial headquarters like Qandahar, Qonduz, Faryab and places in Paktia Province. Bombing also occurred in areas around the capital Kabul. Very obviously the indiscriminate bombings seem to be aimed at totally wiping out the freedom fighters around these provincial headquarters.

According to reports Soviet advisers fear that with the advent of winter the freedom fighters would encircle these cities and set up their operations. True, the ferocious bombing will perhaps inflict some damage to the lives and property of Afghans; true, these will in all likelihood become still more intensified in the weeks and months ahead in a desperate bid to cow down and silence the nationalist opposition. But do the Russians, who have inducted a huge army to prop up puppet regime set up by them in Afghanistan, or the puppet Karmal administration honestly feel that they will never be able to put down resistance by the people determined to remain free? Can they ever hope to achieve any measure of success, howsoever crude and cruel the methods they may employ?

The Karmal regime and the Kremlin would be, therefore, well advised to crease to be curt in the matter and do what Pakistan and most other well-meaning nations of the world have been advising them to do so. The first steps should be that the Soviet troops effect a total unconditional withdrawal from the soil of Afghanistan. Simultaneously the Afghans should be (?obliged) for their birthright to choose the form of government and the way of life they like. Also guaranteed should be the right of the refugees now sheltering in Pakistan in millions to go back to their homes in honor and dignity. This will pave the way to a political settlement which on their admission is what the Russians as well as the Karmal regime seems to be seeking.

The sooner they perceive the realities of the situation and act accordingly, the better it would be for themselves and also for all concerned with the preservation of peace in the region and the world as a whole. It is regrettable that they should ignore the snowballing opposition to whatever the Karmal regime, supported by Soviet troops, has been and is doing in Afghanistan. Do not they get the message, that is coming to them in loud and clear terms, that the conscience of the world will not and never tolerate penetration at the fag-end of the 20th [century] of deeds that used to be frowned upon even in the 18th century? No wonder even a small state like Maldives (?agrees) with the view in the matter held by Pakistan and would like the Afghan people's problem to be settled in a manner as suggested by Pakistan. No wonder the Iranians insist on total withdrawal of Russian troops as a precondition to any political settlement that might follow.

What excuse if any can the Russians give to arguing that they are agreeing to do so if their apprehension of being replaces by troops of the west is met with an arrangement that would allow only an Islamic peace force to fill in the gap until final solution. The Iranian suggestion should induce rethinking among the Russians.

MUSAVI ON AFGHAN PEACE FORCE--Tehran, 10 Nov (AFP)--An Iranian plan on Afghanistan, unveiled last month, calls for replacement of Soviet troops with an Islamic peacekeeping force and election of a constituent assembly made up of "the independent Afghan clergy and experts," Deputy Foreign Minister Mahmad Azizi said today. The plan, elaborated last month by then-Foreign Minister Mir Hoseyn Musavi, who is now prime minister, would have "a council of 30 religious fighters from the Muslim world" elect the constituent assembly, Mr Azizi said at a news conference. The peacekeeping force would include troops from Iran, Pakistan and "another country that has expressed its open opposition to world imperialism led by America and zionism," Mr Azizi added. Two principles must be satisfied for such a plan to succeed, Mr Azizi said. First, the Soviet forces must withdraw unconditionally from Afghanistan, and second, the Afghan people must have the right to determine their future. The constituent assembly would have four main tasks: to nominate a council to command the Islamic force and the Afghan army; to organize general elections for a national assembly; to form a revolutionary council for Afghanistan's executive affairs; to ensure the application of laws during a transitory period. SOLDIERS DEFECT TO PAKISTAN--Peshawar, 11 Nov (PARS)--About 21 Afghani soldiers accompanying a brigadier commander have sought refuge in Pakistan from the excessive violence they have suffered from the Afghani regime. This is the largest group of Afghani military personnel which has so far defected to Pakistan. According to reliable sources the same group carried out a large quantity of military weapons and ammunition. According to the same report, the brigadier commander has said he and his accompanies [as received] could not contenance the outrageous violence of the Babrak Karmal Government which they said was but the servant of the U.S.S.R. and therefore they had fled Afghanistan. ANTI-PERSONNEL MINES USED AGAINST REBELS--Peshawar, Pakistan, 12 Nov (AFP)--Large numbers of anti-personnel mines have been dropped from helicopters on the paths that Afghan insurgents use on their way to Pakistan, Afghan rebel sources said here today. They said that the mines had been spotted in the Afghan provinces of Lowgar, Paktia, Nangarhar and Konarha, the latter three mountain areas bordering on Pakistan. Such mines, the sources said, had already been used against insurgents in the summer of 1980. No bigger than the palm of a hand, they have enough explosive to sever limbs of those stepping on them. In Peshawar hospital at the time, more than 70 victims had to undergo amputations. Last year's mines, the rebel sources said, were round, while this year's are oval and have fins. They look like fish and can be spotted more easily than the former type, one resistance leader reported. He said however that he had heard of only one victim during a two-day trek through one of the mined areas. [Text] [BK130225 Hong Kong AFP in English 0126 GMT 13 Nov 81]

AUTUMN SOWING--Kabul, 4 Nov (BAKHTAR)--Autumn sowing in the DRA continues in full swing. From the beginning of the campaign, on 6 September until the 22d of October 1981, considerable quantities of fertilizers and improved seeds, worth over AFS. Nineteen million have been distributed to the members of the agricultural cooperatives as well as to the individual farmers in Nangarhar Province. This year the autumn campaign indicates an increase of 75 percent in the amount of fertilizer and a rise of 3 percent in the quantity of the improved seeds compared iwth the corresponding period of the last year. Insecticides worth more than AFS 300,000 have also been distributed to the farmers and live-stock breeders of that province. [Text] [LD050632 Kabul BAKHTAR in English 0432 GMT 5 Nov 81]

CITRUS FRUITS INTO USSR--Kabul, 8 Nov (BAKHTAR)--The harvesting of citrus fruits has begun in the Nangarhar Valley farm development project since last week. The yield is predicted to be about 8,500 tons, which accords with the pre-set up plan. Six thousand tons of the product will be exported to the Soviet Union, at a price of 1,907,000 dollars on the basis of an agreement concluded between the two countries. SETTLEMENT QUESTIONS, ARAB-ISRAELI STRUGGLE DISCUSSED

Beirut AL-SAFIR in Arabic 5, 6, 7, 8 Sep 81

[Interview with Muhammad Hasanayn Haykal by Dr Majdi Hamad; in Cairo; date not specified; previously published in AL-MUSTAQBAL AL-'ARABI]

[5 Sep 81 p 11]

[Text] Neutralizing America Is a Warlike Phrase

In its recent September issue AL-MUSTAQBAL AL-'ARABI published a lengthy interview with Muhammad Hasanayn Haykal, the former editor-in-chief of AL-AHRAM and a personal friend of President Jamal 'Abd-al-Nasir. The interview was conducted by Dr Majdi Hamad, representative of Arab unity studies in Cairo. In the aftermath of news that Haykal is being questioned following his arrest in Egypt by al-Sadat's regime AL-SAFIR begins publishing the interviews today; they will be published in four installments.

Here is the first installment.

[Question] I believe that the July Revolution in Egypt preceded the emergence of two principal approaches to Israel on the Arab scene. The first one of them was that which was led by 'Abd-al-Nasir. That approach preferred to concentrate the attack in the Arab region, on Britian first and then on the United States. The nation's effort would then be devoted to the confrontation with Israel after genuine Arab independence is realized. The second approach was that which was led by Nuri al-Sa'id in Iraq who called for the importance of "cooperating" with the west, and especially with the United States, against the Soviet Union, in the hope that such cooperation would bring about some cooperation between the west and the Arab countries against Israel.

I also believe that a few of those who opposed from the outset the phrase, "neutralizing the United States," did so because they thought it would take us once again to the same position we were in before the outbreak of the 23 July Revolution.

We may now actually notice that the real focus of the confrontation, between Egypt and Israel at least, had shifted moments before the Egyptian-Israeli settlement. In fact, "the nature of the struggle" itself had changed. Israel, one of the parties to the confrontation, had been within the framework of "the world's colonialist entity," and the other party, the Arabs, was affiliated with the World Liberation Movement against colonialist domination. Now, however, the two parties are pursuing the struggle together and are striving for a settlement within the framework of the "world-wide capitalist movement."

A warning was also issued at that time that the price of separating Israel and the United States--although in sum this line of logic cannot be faulted--may involve giving up Egypt's traditional allies, the companions of the 23 July Revolution, in the Arab homeland and Egypt's friends on the international scene, especially the Soviet Union.

Can you think of any other way a settlement can be achieved based on the notion of "neutralizing the United States" which can confront all these anticipated effects?

[Answer] I believe that this question is based on assumptions I did not make when I brought up for general discussion the notion of "neutralizing the United States." You are here talking about the emergence of two main approaches to Israel in the Arab area. The first one was led by Nuri al-Sa'id, and the second was led by Jamal 'Abd-al-Nasir. I believe that accurate definitions here are very important. Nuri al-Sa'id was not cooperating with the west, and 'Abd-al-Nasir's case cannot easily be described as a case of "hostility" to the west. However, the situation can be described as follows:

--Nuri al-Sa'id was not calling for cooperation with the west; he was asking the Arab nation to join the western camp. This meant that he wanted the Arab nation to become an integrated part of the west and to merge with it.

--'Abd-al-Nasir, however, used to declare his hostility to the western phenomenon of colonialism, but he absolutely did not declare his hostility to the west. In fact, he had no objections to "cooperation" with the west.

The foregoing formulation of the question signifies that the only options that are available are those of hostility or subordination and that in their relations with the west, other countries would either have to rally around subordination or assume the posture of an enemy. I do believe, however, that there is another way other than this polarization. This other way is the one that 'Abd-al-Nasir utilized. It is the way of the independent movement or the movement that acts from a position of independence.

Therefore, when I brought up for public discussion the notion of "neutralizing the United States," I was actually referring to some of the experiences of the Arab struggle before the 23 July Revolution. To elaborate on that, [let me say that] 'Abd-al-Nasir had followed this course in the past and had achieved his objective. 'Abd-al-Nasir had proposed the principle of cooperating with the United States immediately after the revolution. He had utilized the United States in the process of getting the British out of Egypt. At that time the United States was the principal advocate for a policy of alliances, but, it did not join the Baghdad Pact, at least not publicly, because 'Abd-al-Nasir had concentrated his efforts on the United States. He had done so especially by using Saudi Arabia whose historical struggles with the Hashemite family and importance for the United States enabled it to place restrictions on U.S. action. Thus, the United States did not join the alliances that were formed. This was always a source of irritation in the west, because the United States had been an advocate of alliances, but had joined none of them after they were formed. This was simply due to the fact that 'Abd-al-Nasir succeeded in the battle of partially neutralizing the United States, as far as pacts were concerned.

Defining concepts is likewise extremely important in this regard. I was basically referring to the concept of "neutralizing" and not to that of "neutrality."

Neutrality is a posture chosen voluntarily by a state. The United States will not choose a neutral position between the Arabs and Israel because it takes sides with Israel.

Neutralizing a country, however, is a process by which a country imposes a posture on other countries above and beyond the matter of a mere choice. It prescribes that posture as a matter of necessity.

I believe that the problem of some sectors in the Arab homeland manifests itself in a fondness for oversimplification and for the dichotomous logic of seeing things in terms of black and white or in terms of either hostility or subordination. A few Arab theoreticians are still inclined to reject the independent position or the independent movement which is the essence of the non-alignment [policy]. This means that one does not have a pre-determined position that is included in another's position or that takes sides with it. In each case one abides by one's principles.

It was from this posture, for example, that 'Abd-al-Nasir stood against the United States in Santo Domingo, in Chile, in Cuba, etc.

It was from the same posture that he opposed Soviet intervention in Czechoslovakia. This posture then is not a predetermined one, but [it is rather a posture that is based] on firm principles, and it is in the light of those principles that we can take independent action.

Furthermore, we must take the nature of the current world order into consideration. Under this order, unless countries take charge of their crises and try to solve them by taking independent action, these crises will become subject to international polarization. Thus if a country definitely assumes a cooperative posture with the Soviet Union and a hostile posture toward the United States, such a stance signifies that its crisis is "out of its hands." This crisis then becomes related to the polarization and the strife between the two superpowers, and that country loses control over its own crisis. However, what is important here is [to determine] how independent, balanced action with the two superpowers can be achieved.

Let us go back once again to the experiences of national struggle. This time [the experiences] are from Vietnam. A few Arab thinkers claim that the people of Vietnam provided a model for resisting U.S. colonialism. The Vietnamese people, however, believe that in their dealings with the United States they put into practice the notion of "neutralization."

The objective of the Vietnamese people was to unify [their country] and overthrow Thieu's regime in the south. The only way they could manage to overthrow Thieu's regime was to "neutralize the United States." Thus, they began taking action along this road. The outcome of the action they took may be summarized by saying that the basic demand of the Vietnamese Revolution was achieved. That consisted of placing restrictions on the use of U.S. force and also on the U.S. Congress. The Vietnamese people let their tragedy speak for itself, and they presented their case on the largest scale in U.S. society. They also made themselves accessible to all the agencies of the media, and they were thus able to achieve their objective through various methods.

The first of these objectives was that of correcting the U.S. strategic idea with regard to U.S. presence [in] the Pacific Ocean. And here we mention the roles played by U.S. leaders such as Fulbright and Walter Lippmann who declared that the security of the United States could not be achieved by a military presence of any kind on the shores of Asia. [They said] that the most the United States could allow itself was to stand facing the shores of Asia. This is because the United States in Asia was not a "land country" but rather a "sea and air country."

The second one of these objectives was that of mobilizing public opinion in the United States itself against the war. This would result from the outcome of the broad debate over U.S. involvement in Vietnam, and it would be in addition to the effect of world public opinion.

The Vietnamese people thus succeeded in placing restrictions inside the United States itself on the possibility that the United States may escalate the violence beyond a certain limit. Therefore, if we were to imagine that the United States deliberately escalated the violence beyond that limit and placed its forces in a battle of victory or defeat and not in a political battle, the picture of the war in Vietnam would have been different. However, the revolutionary Vietnamese command succeeded in its battle "to neutralize the United States." It placed restrictions that in most cases came from within U.S. society, on the possibility that the United States may intervene or become involved militarily in Vietnam.

This means that the outcome of the Vietnam war was determined first inside the United States and then afterwards in Vietnam. This is due to the Vietnamese Revolution's awareness of what it wanted.

--It defined its principal enemy as the Thieu regime since it was considered the obstacle to Vietnamese unity. The principal problem here was manifested in the fact that this regime, for numerous reasons that have to do with its erroneous views, with strategy or with dread, invited the intervention by the United States and the broad scale war.

--The Vietnamese Revolution then defined its principal objective as "neutralizing the United States." This meant that it would try to place restrictions inside the United States on the possibility that U.S. military intervention in the war in Vietnam would continue or escalate. As has been stated, this was carried out by influencing U.S. public opinion. [The campaign to influence public opinion] was accompanied by the admirable steadfastness of the Vietnamese people and a tremendous amount of sacrifices. People spoke up in the United States, and there were, for example, the hearing committees which were chaired by Fulbright and the [articles] that Lippmann wrote. These were decisive in bringing about this change in public opinion.

--After that the leadership of the Vietnamese Revolution had to convince the United States in practical terms that the United States could not hope to achieve a military victory by means of its troops which were on the coast of Asia in the heart of Vietnam. The model [action] for achieving that was the attack on Tibet. That attack was a limited military operation whose costs were extremely high from a military standpoint. What is significant is that its objective was not to achieve a military victory but rather to prove to the political leaders in th United States, to the U.S. Congress and to the press and public opinion in the United States that the Vietnamese Revolution can exist inside Saigon, even at a very high human cost. They thus achieved a significant political objective and persuaded the United States that the Thieu regime had disintegrated from the inside and that the United States would not be able to prevent its complete overthrow.

--After all that the leadership of the Vietnamese Revolution turned to negotiations with the United States until a specific agreement between both parties was reached. It is important to note here that the leadership of the revolution did everything in its power to facilitate the U.S. withdrawal from Vietnam because the set objective was to get this U.S. military force out of Vietnam and ultimately not to have a confrontation with it. This leadership complied with Kissinger's request and did not launch a major attack against South Vietnam immediately after the disengagement and the departure of the U.S. forces. However, some time later the attack by General Giap was carried out and South Vietnam was overrun.

This experience from Vietnam in "neutralizing the United States" is in fact exactly what I had in mind in the course of the Arab-Israeli struggle.

I said more than once that there is a big difference between neutrality and neutralization. The United States cannot be neutral. I would imagine that the primary objective of neutralizing the United States would be the attempt to keep its harmful and violent influence away from the strife and struggle in the Arab area and away from our battle with Israel. Although this process is extremely difficult, there is no alternative to it, [and it is to be attempted] with all the means available for applying pressure on the United States.

As I have already indicated we too faced the same experience before the Vietnamese Revolution. In fact, our experience was on a small scale, and it happened in the midst of the battle over the Baghdad Pact. The leadership of the Egyptian Revolution was able, through the royal family in Saudi Arabia and through the oil countries that were then merely emirates still looking for their identity, to prevent the United States from joining the Baghdad Pact even though it was the one that had come up with the idea. This was not because the Egyptian leadership had set out to fight the United States, but rather because it exercised on the United States modes of pressure and influence until it was able to place restrictions on its conduct regarding this matter.

In this sense I believe that the objective of "neutralizing the United States" in our struggle with Israel is still proper and a attainable. One must notice that there is a major difference between neutralizing the United States and succumbing to it. The objective of neutralizing the United States is [to establish] an independent policy whose objective is to utilize all political and economic means--and sometimes violence if that is necessary--to restrict the power of U.S. support for Israel and to make the costs of that support extremely high. This would force the United States to reduce its ties with Israel--and I am not saying break its ties with Israel, for this is something the United States cannot and will not do, and we cannot bring it about either. In fact, I believe that some of this has taken place and is actually taking place unintentionally as far as the United States is concerned. It has also taken place to a large extent as far as Western Europe is concerned.

--A partial neutralization of the United States, especially in the period that preceded the "initiative," was actually achieved. During that period the Arab homeland began to collect its will and to get a handle on its problems through numerous means. Among these are the role of oil and of Arab funds. Furthermore, traditional friendships were utilized to apply pressure on the United States. As a result of all that a new group of variables began to present themselves. Among those, for example are [the following]:

--Israel actually wanted to go to the Geneva Conference. The whole world was waiting for this conference to convene. Even former U.S. President Carter thought that the Palestinians had to be represented at the Geneva Conference.

--The United States began to see that Israel was hurting its interests, in the strict sense of the term, especially in the Arab oil areas. Hence, after his meetings with a number of Arab leaders, President Carter began talking about the need to have a homeland for the Palestinians. This was between April and June of 1977.

--As far as western Europe is concerned, I believe that we have actually succeeded in neutralizing western Europe, at least with regard to the Palestinian people. Let us look at the attitude of Israel's traditional allies today, especially West Germany and France.

I believe that 'Abd-al-Nasir did in fact succeed in "neutralizing France" in the period that followed the June 1967 war. De Gaulle's position during that period was not clear. Nevertheless, 'Abd-al-Nasir started out by saying that even if De Gaulle's position was unclear, even if there were grey areas in it, and even if these grey areas do not reflect whole political truths, we would have to make up a clear position for De Gaulle. That would be tantamount to a bridge to western Europe that would enable us to go out of the confines of polarization. At the outset France's role regarding the Arab-Israeli struggle began as mere "nods" from De Gaulle. We in Egypt overestimated these nods at that time. In time, however, the number of these nods increased and led to a shift not only in France's position, but also in the position of western Europe. There was at least some sympathy now. In other countries a discussion about the need for taking Palestinian rights into consideration began.

Therefore I believe that there are still areas which are open for independent action on our part, especially with the United States, either through political pressure, economic pressure or, if we can do it, by force. We can thus force the United States to reduce its commitments to Israel, or we can at least make sure that the United States does not back Israel all the way.

Those who are saying that our battle with Israel is a battle with the United States are, on the one hand, burdening us with a bigger battle than we can fight. On the other hand, the solution for such a problem requires that we rely fully and without reservations on the other superpower in the world, the Soviet Union. This means that we would be putting our crisis in a pile of cases that are being disputed by the two superpowers and making that crisis subject to a comprehensive settlement between them. The starting point in the idea of "neutralizing the United States" is manifested in the fact that we would assume control of our own crisis and deal with the two superpowers. One of them is actually assuming the posture of a friend, and we must keep it as a friend. And the other one actually assumed the posture of an enemy, and we have to dislodge it from its position as the enemy to a less hostile position. For example we have to make it shift to an antagonist posture and then make it shift again to an adversary posture, and so on.

The foregoing signifies that we must see the numerous grey areas in the U.S. position. U.S. interests and Israeli interests may actually be congruous, but they are not identical. Therefore, we have to determine the "extent of the incompatibility" between them. We have to move in on the United States and to intensify this incompatibility, not so as to separate Israel from the United States, because this is impossible, but rather to reduce the United States' willingness to go with Israel all the way.

I totally reject and oppose the notion of "exclusiveness" which some people in the Arab homeland are promoting. This notion would have us deal with one international party only on the basis of the premise that one of the two superpowers must be a friend, and the other must be an antagonist. If we were to allow our crisis to become so polarized under the current world order, we would be relegating it to a distant fate in the balances between the two superpowers whose actions we do not control. However, if we were to assume control over our crisis, we would have to deal with the two parties on whom the present world order depends. This is especially true of a sensitive area like the Arab area which is geographically very close to the Soviet Union and economically in the heart of western Europe and the west. In view of this situation there must be numerous shades of light and grey in our international action, and we must stay away from the dichotomous logic of black and white.

I find myself here compelled to recall the experiences of the July Revolution once again. Some people in the Arab homeland sometimes attribute to the July Revolution actions that it did not do. Others cling to its most recent position or to one of its positions and state that this was the position of the July Revolution. In this instance I accept the judgment of the July Revolution and its leader, Jamal 'Abd-al-Nasir.

As I have already mentioned 'Abd-al-Nasir set out to use the United States to oppose the British occupation. We must acknowledge that a large part of the pressure that was applied to Britian to terminate its occupation [of Egypt] came from the United States. In addition, there was the Egyptian Resistance, the canal and the emergence of the national regime in revolutionary Egypt as well as the actions of the Arab homeland around Egypt. 'Abd-al-Nasir had also neutralized the United States somewhat in the battle over the Baghdad Pact.

Then came another period around the early sixties during which the United States resorted to the use of extreme violence in the 1967 aggression. The United States was most certainly a party to the aggression. 'Abd-al-Nasir was therefore inclined to intensify to the utmost his campaign against the United States. He even tried at some point to present the United States and Israel as one and the same thing. But this was done in the context of a specific political action. Afterwards 'Abd-al-Nasir began to classify matters and to determine the shades and areas of grey. When he visited Moscow secretly in January 1970, his objective was to shift the battle from a local balance to a universal balance. This was due to the fact that the local balance of power--with the military support that Israel was receiving from the United States--had shifted in Israel's favor, and this shift was giving Israel greater freedom of action from a military standpoint. The Soviet Union was well aware of 'Abd-al-Nasir's objective and, therefore, accepted his point of view and adopted a set of "top priority strategic resolutions" regarding the form and magnitude of Soviet military aid to Egypt. But there were three conditions.

The first was that the Soviet Union would inform the United States of its resolutions.

The second was that we had to resume the dialogue with the United States.

And the third was that we were not to begin fighting any armed battles with Israel while Soviet experts were in Egypt. Brezhnev's condition here was absolute when he turned to 'Abd-al-Nasir and said, "Mr President, Soviet experts must return to their country at least 6 months before a decision to become engaged in a battle with Israel is made."

All these conditions are understandable because relations between the two superpowers cannot tolerate misrepresentation. Also the utilization of any one of the two superpowers must be carefully, clearly and unequivocally calculated. It was evident to both 'Abd-al-Nasir and the Soviet leadership that Soviet presence in Egypt would make the United States sense some danger. It would therefore begin a process of applying pressure to get the Soviet experts out of Egypt, and it would offer something to get them out.

The Soviet Union came to Egypt after these strategic decisions were made with the knowledge that 'Abd-al-Nasir was engaged in a maneuver with the United States. It came to Egypt with the knowledge that 'Abd-al-Nasir was upgrading the crisis from a local crisis to a universal one. It was therefore asking that this maneuver be carefully calculated so that it would not be embarrassed by some miscalculation.

Let us consider here the sequence of events in that period.

--The Soviet Union informed the United States.

--Then Joseph Sisco came to Egypt.

--After that 'Abd-al-Nasir sent his appeal to Nixon on 1 May.

--Nixon's reply came in the form of the Rogers' initiative.

--'Abd-al-Nasir then accepted the Rogers' initiative while we were attending the Tripoli meetings.

--When 'Abd-al-Nasir went after that to the Soviet Union, he had actually accepted the initiative. When Brezhnev asked him, "How can you accept this initiative with the U.S. flag on it?" meaning that the initiative should have been the product of both superpowers and not just one of them, 'Abd-al-Nasir replied that he had accepted the initiative "because it carried the U.S. flag." His objective in fact was to neutralize the United States in one form or another.

[Text] The "Metal Fatigue" Phenomenon in the Arab Nation

The second installment of the interview with Muhammad Hasanayn Haykal which AL-MUSTAQBAL AL-'ARABI Magazine published follows.

[Question] But the group that criticized from the outset the notion of "neutralizing the United States" was expressing as a part of its views the opinion that pursuit of this course would have only "one outcome" and that that would be to succumb to the United States. Don't you think that this is what has actually happened now?

[Answer] This is not true at all. Let me draw a simple analogy here. If I were to tell you that the road that would take you to your destination would require you to cross a certain street, and if while you were crossing that street you were struck by a car, would you tell me that I misled you because you had been struck by a car?

I reject the notion which states that all of history consists of conspiracies even though it is also true that a set of factors did help the expansion which occurred in the opposite direction. But I believe that the objective of "neutralizing the United States" will remain relevant as long as the Arab-Israeli struggle continues and as long as the Arab area remains an area of contention between the two superpowers.

And here we must understand that the nature of international politics and the strategy of managing struggles require each party to make an effort to minimize the costs of the struggle on the one hand and to maximize its gains on the other. This is exactly what the United States did when it found a certain climate in the area after the October 1973 war and even before that date.

On the one hand, it was a climate of Arab conflicts.

On the other hand, it was a climate in which the Arab bourgeoisie was growing.

And, thirdly, it was a climate in which the Soviet Union was wavering.

It was in this climate that the United States began intensifying its efforts to maximize profits and minimize losses. It was in the same climate that Anwar al-Sadat began making his decisive strategic choice. But this is another matter that has nothing to do with the notion of neutralizing the United States.

What happened was tantamount to a shift that was produced by a variety of regional and world-wide circumstances, but primarily by a variety of social circumstances within the Arab homeland. These circumstances manifested themselves in what happened after the 1973 October war when the power of the Arab bourgeoisie and the power of traditional Arab sectors grew to the point that they had the ability to "come up with" a tremendous amount of petro-dollars to cover up and even completely inundate all the conflicts that prevailed in the Arab homeland. If the flood of black gold did cover up these conflicts, this was not related to the notion of neutralizing the United States.

I caution here against the danger of confusing symptoms with causes, coincidences, incidents and facts and against the attempt to derive a certain "mode" from this mishmash. I believe that historical incidents show that there is not a single dynamic process [in operation], but that there are rather several dynamic processes operating simultaneously. The relationship between them may not be evident, but if a variety of dynamic processes were to converge so as to lead one to succumb to the United States, we ought to reinforce these dynamic processes and analyze them. We would then find them to be unrelated to the notion of neutralizing the United States.

Let me tell you quite clearly that the Egyptian leadership was not striving "to neutralize the United States." The disaster that actually took place was the fact that it was the Soviet Union that was neutralized. All the powers of pressure were applied to get the Soviet Union politically and militarily out [of the area]. Certain powers in the Arab homeland and a new set of factors on the Arab scene helped accomplish this. Chief among those new factors was the increasing growth of the Arab bourgeoisie's powers of corruption.

[Question] This is exactly what I was trying to get to. I was trying to determine the point at which the error began. What I mean is that if the principle of neutralizing the United States is not fundamentally rejected and if it is in agreement with the current principles of international policy, where then did the error in applying this principle begin, the error that ultimately led [us] to succumb to the United States?

[Answer] When you talk about "an error," you imply that the error began at a certain point as one proceeded on the course of "neutralizing the United States." I do not believe this is a sound portrayal of the situation because there was not one course, that of neutralizing the United States, which we were pursuing. Accordingly, we cannot look for the point at which the deviation began, that deviation which led us to succumb to the United States. I believe that there was a variety of routes or courses that ran parallel to the course of neutralizing the United States. These courses were not related, at least not directly, to the course of neutralizing the United States. It is possible here to list the following:

First, there was a course of social conflicts in the Arab homeland. In the context of this course there were notable developments among which, for example, were [the following]:

1. Broad sectors [of the population] yearned for a kind of dream democracy.

2. There was a return to liberal ideas which sought to assert themselves for reasons that had to do with the failure in the socialist bloc.

3. A variety of values from consumer societies began invading the Arab homeland.

4. Numerous sectors in the Arab homeland now had the power "to buy" all this: they had the power to talk about liberal societies, to prescribe new modes of consumption and to change the value systems.

This course was not related to that of neutralizing the United States.

Second, the course of Arab-Soviet relations. And here emerges the sharp crisis which the Soviet Union faced after Arab victory in the 1973 October war was achieved with the help of Soviet weapons.

This course was not related to that of neutralizing the United States.

We ought to consider these three courses--the course of neutralizing the United States, that of social development in the Arab homeland and that of relations with the Soviet Union--on the basis of the fact that they are parallel, even though there is a definite relationship between them. This is simply due to the fact that no battle or strife is determined by one course. All battles are complex, and all strife consists of a variety of interrelated, separate, parallel and unrelated courses, etc.

Therefore if you are wondering about "the point at which the error began" and if you are trying to locate where that point occurred on the course of neutralizing the United States because we are seeing today that the United States is being succumbed to these days, I would have to disagree with you. The error occurred on "another course" that is not related to that of neutralizing the United States. It is basically related to the nature of the social choices that are prevalent today in the Arab homeland. Today the forces that are capable of making effective social choices in the Arab homeland are no longer those of the workers, farmers or revolutionaries. The power to make choices has shifted from one side to another.

[Question] But weren't all these parallel courses evident when the notion of neutralizing the United States was proposed?

[Answer] Let us assume that they were evident at the time. However, I do assume that in every policy when each choice is defined, one usually finds a variety of risks. One may find oneself compelled to accept certain risks provided that these are calculated risks. Therefore I repeat, if we assume that the courses were evident, management of the strife would still depend on you.

For example, if we were to focus on the course of neutralizing the United States while keeping an eye on the other parallel courses, and then if we were to try to utilize Saudi Arabia's power in the process of neutralizing the United States--as the Egyptian leadership did after the July Revolution in the battle over the Baghdad Pact--it would be possible to achieve practical results along this course.

But what happened was something else. A variety of circumstances and developments emerged in the Arab homeland, and these gave Saudi Arabia the opportunity to use others and to utilize their capabilities along all these parallel lines, instead of others using Saudi Arabia and its capabilities.

The power of oil and petro-dollars gave certain social forces in the Arab homeland, and chiefly Saudi Arabia, the power to utilize the national forces which had utilized Saudi Arabia in the past to neutralize the United States. However, the picture has changed because of weakness, because of the leaders' inability and because of the tremendous overflow of black gold.

[Question] How in your opinion did the responsible leaders of the Arab nation become so divided on the method of dealing with the Zionist entity that all the components of the Arab view of the Arab-Israeli struggle are almost being dismissed?

If we are saying that something good may come out of the harm that befell us, it may appear now that the harm which befell the Arabs and their causes as a result of Egypt's departure from the Arab rank is so great that this adage in our case can be refuted. In your opinion why didn't Egypt's departure or its expulsion from the Arab ranks lead to the required awakening of the other Arabs? Why haven't those Arabs discovered yet the proper method for bringing Egypt back? Why haven't they even discovered a sound method for stopping the Arab position from faltering on more than one scene of confrontation with Israel and with other than Israel?

[Answer] Let me first refer to the business about something good may come out of something harmful. There is no doubt that if you were now to consider briefly what was happening throughout the Arab region, you would imagine that there was no hope in anything. But I believe that there are numerous benefits from the setback that we are experiencing now. The basis of this lies in the fact that among 'Abd-al-Nasir's accomplishments and also among the problems that he left behind is the fact that he made strategic choices that were far more advanced than the awareness of the masses was at that time. His leadership of those masses had pulled them behind him. Therefore, the doubts and the gaps lingered. Some people asked, for example, "Is Egypt Arab or not? What does Egypt have to do with Israel?" These questions have now been exaggerated. 'Abd-al-Nasir made his choices on the basis of the power of his leadership. These were truthful choices that were historically correct. But what happened is that 'Abd-al-Nasir made choices, carried them through and the masses followed him. But the masses followed "him" and not "his choices." On the margin of this picture the masses fought for these choices not because they were convinced [of their validity] but because 'Abd-al-Nasir was. Inasmuch as 'Abd-al-Nasir expressed the hopes of these masses, they backed up his movement and accepted his choices, but they still had some questions.

During the setback that we are now experiencing we must notice that besides its risks--and its risks are undoubtedly extremely difficult--there are [nevertheless] positive, "beneficial" signs. Increasingly numerous sectors of the Egyptian masses are beginning to examine themselves. I believe that what we failed to affirm to these masses by persuasive means, will actually be affirmed by the circumstances we are experiencing today, under the influence of the existing conflict in the substance of their choices. We may [even] say under the influence of [the notion that]:

"If God wanted to promote a lost virtue, He would give the envious a wagging tongue;

"If a fire had not burned around that branch, its fragrance would never have been known."

Today, numerous sectors in Egypt are questioning the feasibility of "peace" with Israel--this phrase that has been on the horizon for 3 years and was supported by the masses because there was a deficiency in their consciousness. A variety of illusions have crept into this deficiency, especially in 'Abd-al-Nasir's absence. There are also questions about the feasibility of the open-door policy. This policy was tried, and the doors were opened wide, but where are the results? There are also questions about what happened after Egypt was isolated from the Arab world. There are questions about how such an isolation can take place when Egypt has close to 2 million [of its citizens] working in the Arab homeland. There are real Egyptian interests in the Arab homeland, not to mention the linguistic, cultural, historical and religious ties and relations between the peoples of a single nation. These ties and relations existed in the past and will exist in the future. Therefore I am saying that despite everything around us now, some good may come out of this harm.

As to why Egypt's expulsion or its departure from the Arab rank did not lead to the required awakening of the other Arabs, I believe that this fact can be explained by several factors.

First, the Arab national objective is no longer determined by the effect of new and revived shocks and choices in the Arab region, especially on the part of Egypt and Saudi Arabia.

Second, as a result of numerous factors the Arab nation appears to have been afflicted with a phenomenon [that is analogous to] that of metal fatigue.

Third, the makeup of the regimes that govern in the Arab countries is reflected on the inclinations of the Arab classes that are governed.

Fourth, the nature of the Egyptian role in the Arab homeland, at least since the early part of this century, has been a mixture of a modernizing role and a unifying role.

In my opinion these four factors are responsible for the fact that the required awakening among Arab leaders did not materialize. What is important is that we consider the interreaction and interrelationship between these factors because they do in fact exist. Let us consider what each one of these factors means.

First, the loss of the national Arab objective.

Let me first remind you that the notion of Arab nationalism was still a scheme. Ever since the beginning of the present century the Arab homeland had three basic choices that were available to it.

1. There was the idea of the succession or the Islamic League.

2. There was the idea of Arabism or the Arab League.

3. There was the idea of independent nationalism for each one of the countries.

The contest between these choices was not settled once and for all by setting alternatives for each one of them. Hence, the notion of nationalism was proposed as one among other alternatives. As I said, it was still a scheme. Then came the shock of the different route which the Egyptian leadership chose to pursue since 1974. In fact, to be fair, this shock began with the Israeli attack in 1967. To elaborate on this, [let me say that] the 1967 shock made it incumbent on the masses to question everything because the circumstances of a shock usually raise a few questions.

Thus, in the climate of 1967 the notion of nationalism was discussed and questioned; the social idea was discussed and questioned; and the notion of non-alignment was discussed and questioned.

This meant that there were in fact discussions and questions about everything since the shock of 1967. It was in the midst of the fog, the investigations and the inquiries that the first disengagement [agreement] of 1974 came about. I consider this the beginning of everything that is happening now. It was here that all the trends began to manifest themselves because the Egyptian leadership had chosen a different road. What is important is that when the 1967 shock came about and when the shock of the different road that the Egyptian leadership took was felt, the idea of nationalism was still alive and well.

Consider the Arab homeland after 1974 and see how the active forces are conducting themselves in it. Five years ago I wrote a series of articles about the "Saudi era." Some people were surprised then, but let them look today, 5 years after these articles were written. Are we not in fact living today in the wake of the "Saudi era?" There is a very simple reason for that: the notion of "revolution" has been dismissed or shelved, and the notion of "wealth" is the notion that is prevailing today. A discussion about wealth means a direct discussion about Saudi Arabia.

And here we notice that Saudi Arabia did not adopt the notion of nationalism, but instead set out to make another choice that was much more difficult than that of nationalism. It did not even go back to the idea of the succession or the Islamic League because even when the Ottoman Empire was calling for an Islamic league, what it had in mind was the Middle East area. Saudi Arabia, however, was talking about the idea of "religion" as a whole. Thus we find ourselves with this idea facing numerous risks. Among them are [the following]:

--We are falling in a bottomless ocean, and we don't even have the oars that can help us cross that ocean [to safety].

When we talk about the Islamic world or Islamic unity we are leaving behind our entity which is defined and going to another that is not.

--I cannot see on the horizon the possibility for common security or for a common market between the Arab area and Indonesia or Malaysia.

If the discussion about the scheme of pan-Arab nationalism were a dream, it is an achievable dream for two principal considerations.

First, there is a real, practical foundation for this plan which manifests itself in the same language, the same culture, the same geography and the same history. Besides, the possibility for a first-rate economic unity and security unity does exist.

Second, in addition to the fact that this plan has a real, practical foundation, it represents a specific objective. That objective is attainable, and with our effort we can promote it.

Inasmuch as a discussion of the Islamic idea led us into areas that were way above our heads because they were beyond our power; because they did not represent a specific objective; and because they did not have a real, practical foundation, the emphasis on the Islamic idea has diffused Arab power.

Therefore I admit that I cannot understand all this emphasis that is being placed on the idea of "Islamic action" and I cannot understand the activity that we are seeing in the Islamic world. Briefly, this Saudi choice means that what is "most important" will not be emphasized so that "what is important" can be. In the final analysis this means that Arab energies will be wasted in a number of secondary areas.

Let us recall here the experience of the 23 July Revolution. 'Abd-al-Nasir did in fact speak about the idea of the three circles: the Arab circle, the Islamic circle and the African circle. But the principal circle there was the Arab circle. That was the one in which the Arabs would be able to come into their own. The remaining circles were supporting circles. It is true that we have interests and responsibilities in the African circles, and it is true that we have interests and ties with the Islamic world, but all this comes in the context of moral responsibilities and moral support. The Arab homeland, however, is the area where the Arabs can come into their own. Therefore, talking about another outside circle having precedence over the Arab circle is a basic error because it means shifting what is primary and what is secondary and vice versa.

Second, the metal fatigue phenomenon in the Arab nation.

I believe that at a certain stage of their historical development nations may suffer from what is called the metal fatigue phenomenon. I believe that this diagnosis applies now to the Arab nation. What is implied by this phenomenon? First, in order to understand its significance with regard to what has happened and what is happening in the Arab nation, [let me say that] sometimes an accident happens to an airplane and it's said that there can only be one reason for that accident. They call that metal fatigue. In this case it is not easy either to see or to observe how metal becomes fatigued. But something suddenly disturbs the makeup and the composition of the metal, and then at a certain instant and under a certain pressure, the metal cracks and the accident occurs.

It seems to me that this idea can be used to explain in part the situation which we are trying to grasp. I believe that the Arab nation has been afflicted with some kind of "metal fatigue" because of the long period of struggle that it has experienced and the "revolutionary tension" that usually accompanies such a struggle. Besides, the Arab nation has had different shocks, such as the 1967 shock, the departure of 'Abd-al-Nasir from the scene, the shock of the leadership's "different choice" and other various different shocks as well.

Aside from everything that has been said, the Arab nation--in the absence of leaders that can direct and unify it--found itself faced with a situation that was unclear, uncohesive and undefined, both as far as its direction and its identity were concerned. It [sometimes] seems to me that we need to define our identity.

Third, the makeup of the Arab regimes that are in power and the classes that are governed.

It's been said, along with what has already been stated, that the Arab nation has become a model of what the dominant forces of the world are seeking in other areas. The Arab area has almost become a "marketplace" for them.

In the first part of this interview I referred to the kind of elite groups that surround those who are in power in the Arab homeland. In most of the Arab countries these elite groups are made up of a group of oil company representatives, weapons merchants and foreign intelligence. Along with them would be people who are related to those in power in one way or another. Those people are also related to international oil and weapons companies and to international agencies as well.

Let us consider the Arab homeland from the inside. We will find that each country is being subjected to an unlimited amount of obfuscation. Each country is isolated from its neighbor, and each country is concentrating all the means of control [it has at its disposal] on its masses. Each country is using television, radio and the press to control the masses. What these agencies [of the media] cannot do, the agencies of repression and security do. Consequently, because the masses do not wish to have a confrontation with the agencies of repression, they have become "hooked" on television and radio programs which have a numbing effect on them. It's as though they were in a daze. These masses who were to be kept out of the picture chose instead to remain in their daze. This is because if they were to be forced out of the picture, they would have to have a conflict with the agencies of repression. Their "daze" is a kind of escape.

I am prepared to understand something like this happening in the United States because U.S. society is compartmentalized; that is, it is a society of small units. The U.S. citizen spends half his day working and then rushes home where he has all the luxuries [of modern life]. He closes the door to his home where he remains until the following day. It is in his home that the U.S. citizen spends the rest of his day "glued" in front of the television and the video [screen].

We now have all these phenomena without any of the justifications for them and without the industrial base that created them and made them tolerable in the United States--although I happen to believe that these phenomena are absolutely intolerable. Thus there are now in the Arab homeland crowds of people who are lost. Ultimately, if one were to look for them, one would not be able to find them.

Lenin said, "Those who are responsible for political action have to go to the masses in the places where they live and work." Yesterday one could find large crowds of people in the factories, in the universities and in the streets and one could have mobilized these crowds. Today, however, one cannot go to those places and find the crowds because they are not there any more. Today, the crowds are scattered; they are basically preoccupied with the football games and with the television serials.

Let us shift to another circle and let us ask [the following question]: What are the means that would help these masses acquire a sense of what is around them today? Is it not curious that the Arab homeland in its entirety is receiving its political directions, its news and its information--not to mention its restricted press, its penetrated television and its food problems--basically from three [sic] foreign stations? These are:

1. The British Broadcasting station. [The BBC] is funded directly by British intelligence. The British Ministry of Foreign Affairs gives the directions for the programs, but the appropriations come from intelligence.

2. The Voice of America, and it needs no identification.

Are not these the forces that are directing all Arab public opinion? This means that this public opinion has no confidence in what is around it. This public is leading a life style of consumerism which is very alien to its stage of development. Even when the people have a moment of truth, they turn to these agencies to receive their news and information.

If we were to consider all the rising regimes in the Third World today, [we would find that], on the one hand, they were based on local repressive regimes and, on the other hand, on an elite that is related to the repressive regimes. Thirdly, we would find them based on regimes that are immoderate or repressive inside the country.

This is more true of the Arab homeland than elsewhere. I am not worried, for example, because we are not building heavy industries or new dams in Egypt, but I am extremely worried basically about something much more serious than that. I am worried about the set of values that were planted in the fifties and the sixties. These have been inundated by a sweeping wave whose purpose is to drown them altogether.

[Text] No Imminent Settlement with Israel Is Possible

This is the third installment of the interview with Muhammad Hasanayn Haykal which AL-MUSTAQBAL AL-'ARABI Magazine published.

Fourth, the Nature of Egypt's Role in the Arab Homeland

I believe that as we look for a way to make up for Egypt's departure or expulsion [from the Arab rank] we must define the nature, the history and the function of Egypt's role in the Arab homeland.

And here we can observe that ever since the beginning of the present century, the Arab homeland has turned to Egypt, even before 'Abd-al-Nasir and even before it assumed its nationalistic trend. And here we can also notice that Egypt, through its philosophers, its literary figures, its poets, its writers, its singers, its composers and its actors, played a leading cultural role. In fact, Egypt has always played two principal roles in the area. The first was that of overseer of the modernization process, and the second was that of unifier.

When this key role--the role of modernizer and that of unifier--disappears, no one imagines that a replacement can be easily found. Historical experiences do not indicate that there can be an automatic replacement for such cases. This is because the process which we are facing is neither chemical nor mechanical.

Furthermore, the country that was playing these two roles is one third of the Arab nation. Because of its location in the center of the Arab nation, it is one third of that nation. It is the country that was modernizing and unifying the Arab world. If this role follows that country outside the Arab ranks, one is then faced with a real problem and one then needs a long time to make arrangements for replacements.

However, we ought to become aware of another error which I noticed in our views and in the views of others. Some of us here in Egypt say that we are the leaders of the Arab homeland and that without Egypt the Arab homeland is without leadership. This is a mistake because this line of thought confuses the notion of leadership with that of the presidency, even though I concede that there is no presidency in political action.

One can become a leader through other people's recognition of one's leadership, and not as a result of one's own claim. At the same time, one can become a president or a king by virtue of the constitution.

Therefore, there is no leadership in the history of nations, and there is no nation that has been in a position of leadership throughout its history. A nation can become a leader inasmuch as it speaks for others. If it loses its ability to speak for others, it immediately loses its ability or its right to lead because, briefly, a leader is he whose concerns go beyond his personal interests to express the interests of others. If a person can speak for an entire country, he can lead that country. Leadership ends when a leader loses his ability to speak for others. The same principle applies to countries. In this case the loss of the ability to speak for others keeps a country within its natural proportions or restores it to its natural proportions. Leadership then is not a visible process, and it is related to the performance of a specific role.

Hence arises the difficult problem of the replacement. In the first part of this interview I referred to the fact that there is a possible replacement in the Arab area but that we must take into consideration the fact that we are talking from the standpoint of geopolitical factors. From this standpoint we are saying that Syria and Iraq are possible replacements. But even as we say that we have a basic reservation. This replacement process is not automatic; it is a geopolitical alternative, and it has been presented. But this does not mean that it is automatic and that it has begun performing its role. It will perform its role only after it passes, after it mobilizes [forces] and after it polarizes [others], and not before.

I do not want to say that the picture is very grim, but it is evident to us that the period during which the Arab homeland has depended on Egypt, ever since the early part of this century, amounts to 70 years, whereas the period of time which the Arab homeland has found itself without Egypt--since the initiative and perhaps since Camp David--comes to 3 or 4 years. This is because there were some sectors after the initiative that still entertained hopes on the basis of what had happened. They based these hopes on the belief that the initiative itself may have been too daring, but Anwar al-Sadat's address to the Knesset at least was within Arab commitments. After the Camp David accords, however, they discovered that the situation was quite different.

What is important is that Egypt, on whom the Arabs had relied for 70 years, can be neither recovered nor replaced in 3 years. Furthermore, Arab reliance on Egypt goes back a long time; it even antedates the Ottoman invasion, when during a period of Arab fragmentation Egypt undertook the responsibility of the Crusades as an Arab or an Arab-Islamic responsibility. What is important [here] is that Egypt assumed a responsibility that was much greater than its borders. After the establishment of the Ottoman Empire Egypt continued to play a certain cultural role. It even played a certain legal role, with regard to interpretations, analyses and individual interpretations of religion. Although the entire age was one of decline, Egypt did play a role at a time where there were no entities in the Arab homeland. Saudi Arabia, for example, was merely the Emirate of al-Hijaz, and it used to rely on the kingdom of Egypt. Therefore, I believe that the matter will need more time than we believe.

After reviewing these four factors which explain why the "required awakening" in the Arab homeland did not occur, it is of interest to me to caution that, despite the phenomena that we are seeing now, things have a power unto themselves. When one has certain capabilities, these capabilities will prescribe a certain kind of influence. Some of this influence goes beyond the scope of one's plans. Let us cite a few examples.

--There is, for example, the role of Arab wealth which was unsought by its owners. This wealth gave the Arab homeland a kind of power. Even if this power is somewhat tainted today by the manner in which Arab wealth is used, the feeling that there is a certain capability still lingers.

The whole world, for example, was affected by the October war, or at least by the scene in the first few days of that war, and by the role of oil, the Arab unity and the coordinated Arab effort that accompanied that war. Miracles appeared in that historic moment which even Gen (Andre Bouvier) described as representing a message to the future, in spite of everything that happened afterwards. [He described that moment] as a message addressed to the future; it meant that the Arabs were capable: they were capable technologically; they were capable financially; and they were capable politically and militarily. One day they will be capable. This message is in itself an important message. Therefore, if one were to look today at the newspapers of the world, one would find that there is some kind of interest in the Arab homeland. There may not be enough respect, but there is at least a measure of dread.

--There is, for example, the role played by the Arab oil surplus funds in the Arab oil countries and even in the Arab countries that do not produce oil. These surplus funds have led to a kind of forced development that may not have been deliberate. This development followed the expansion in education, in the construction of roads and communications systems and in the construction of hospitals. This development also helped countries embark on programs "to catch up with technology."

If one were to consider the number of Arab students in foreign universities today, one would be facing a capability of some consequence. It is true that some of those will be influenced by foreign values and some of them will be lured by brain drain operations. But if one were to consider the number of those students and if political boundaries were lifted from the map, one would find that they constitute a capability of some significance.

Tied to this also on a technological level is the fact that these funds gave some of us the capability to purchase technology and gave rise to an awareness of technology as well.

Let me pause here as we talk about technology and Arab development and ponder the operation of the Iraqi nuclear reactor which Israel destroyed.

Israel attacked and launched a war in 1967 because an Egyptian infantry soldier had entered Sinai, and it had tried to prevent him from doing his duty.

Today by bombing the Iraqi reactor Israel tried to prevent an Arab scientist from conducting research in the nuclear field. The fact is that I believe that what is more important than the nuclear reactor itself is the nuclear college which is located next to it. It has the capability of teaching 600 young Arab men nuclear technology. This is the capability that Israel will always try to thwart.

Therefore, I think that one should have known that Israel would bomb that reactor and any Arab reactor in fact because we ought to know that Israel would not allow us to advance technologically, [that is], if we enable Israel to prevent us. When Gen (Bouvier) said that what happened in the 1973 October war was tantamount to a message addressed to the future, I was immediately reminded of the choices that 'Abd-al-Nasir set out to take in this technological area. When 'Abd-al-Nasir tried to go into the field of manufacturing missiles, airplanes and the technology of nuclear reactors, he would always say that he was not interested in the nuclear bomb or in missiles. He was primarily interested in having Arab cadres that were competent in the technology of missiles, in the technology of airplanes and in nuclear technology because we could not afford to lag behind in this area. Then 'Abd-al-Nasir was gone.

Today, someone else is here to carry out [what 'Abd-al-Nasir had started]. And here we must call attention to the fact that there is a technological power thrust in the Arab area, and there is sometimes a responsible awareness of the requirements of technology. The simplest example of this is the fact that Saddam Husayn--whether or not one agrees with him on other matters--has promised to establish a nuclear college that can educate 600 young Arab men, to make this college available to the Arab homeland and to bring together all Arab cadres [who specialize] in nuclear science. This is a positive action. I believe that an Arab nuclear project must be a national project in which all Arabs would participate. However, in the absence of "all Arabs," we must appreciate the efforts of any Arab country that attempts this by itself.

The final point [I want to make] about the matter of bombing the Iraqi reactor is my observation that people are somewhat "dazzled" by the precision and execution of the Israelis. Actually, I do not think that what happened was in any way miraculous. For when a certain command concentrates on a specific and a limited objective; when it devotes all its capabilities to achieve that objective--conducting daily exercises on how that objective can be achieved--when that objective becomes the objective of the state and the people, even if they do not know it, the accurate implementation of that task is by no means astounding, especially when the preparation, the mobilization, the concentration and the training for it lasts close to a year and a half.

I believe quite the opposite that we in Egypt--and also in Syria--did realize a miracle in the 1973 October war. This is not due to the fact that we are in an age of miracles, but rather because from 1967 till 1973 the capabilities of the Egyptian people have all been devoted to [the objective of] crossing that difficult water barrier and conquering all the fortifications and barriers behind it. Therefore, the whole world was astounded on 6 October 1973 because on the morning of that day there were five Egyptian divisions on the western bank of the Suez Canal. On the morning of the following day the five divisions were on the eastern bank of the canal, and the Bar-Lev line had fallen. Therefore, I firmly believe that the crossing, as a limited objective; the plan to achieve that objective; and the achievement of that objective were much more astounding than the operation of bombing the Iraqi reactor. The only value of the reactor bombing operation lies in the fact that Israel assumed the initiative. This is what we must focus on because when we in Egypt and in Syria took the initiative and decided to cross [the canal], we succeeded.

Therefore I say that regardless of everything that is negative in the Arab world today, there are "positive" resources in store. At a certain moment this quantity of resources will assume a discretionary quality. However, no one can say precisely when this will happen.

But I can affirm here the importance of the growing awareness in Egypt and the vigilance that is taking place in Egypt about everything that has happened and is happening. I can also refer to the same phenomenon in the entire Arab homeland. Let us consider, for example, the statement that is prevalent today about the fact that Egypt's departure [from the Arab ranks] represents a major loss for the Arab nation. This statement is extremely important because for a long time Egypt's role had been taken for granted in what was occasionally an unjustifiable and a provocative manner. When Israel, for example, turned its aggressive operations against Egypt and assassinated a number of German missiles scientists who were in Egypt, the Arabs did not pay enough attention to that. Even when Egypt announced its missiles construction program and actually launched a number of its missiles in the skies of Cairo, some people in the Arab homeland unfortunately believed that the operation was merely ceremonial. When Egypt entered into the field of nuclear reactors and tried to pave the way to the formation of an Arab cadre of nuclear scientists, the Arabs did not become aware of this at the time.

But consider today what happened after Israel bombed the Iraqi nuclear reactor. I believe that Egypt and the entire Arab homeland are becoming aware of what is happening, and I believe that there is an increasing awareness which has not been evident before. There is also a sense of the present, the past and the future and an awareness of the connection between them. Therefore I am saying that numerous signs throughout the Arab homeland indicate that there are positive resources in store and that these will ultimately lead to the creation of a substantive change.

[Question] What in your opinion are the components of the imminent settlement with Israel, and how can it be achieved?

[Answer] Let me tell you very briefly and clearly that first, no solution with Israel is possible or imminent. In this regard, I concur with Ben Gurion when he said, "There is one piece of land which cannot be divided. It will either belong to the Israelis or to the Palestinians. There can be no compromise over this matter." Several months ago Arthur Miller was here in Cairo. He sat with me in front of Prince Sadr al-Din Khan and asked me the same question, "What is your opinion of the solution to the struggle with Israel?" He found my reply surprising. I told him, "Unfortunately, I find myself very much inclined to agree with Ben Gurion's words. There is one piece of land which cannot be divided and cannot have two owners. It can either belong to the Israelis or to the Palestinians."

As far as I am concerned, I would say that it belongs to the Palestinians, and it cannot belong to anyone else. I think that in some cases we become "timid" when we express ourselves and do not make our true beliefs known. I imagine that at least we ought to be able to tell each other what we believe; it is not necessary to say it to the whole world. On this basis I would say that we ought to realize that there is no imminent peace with Israel and that there is no peace at all.

When the Egyptian leadership chose this settlement with Israel, it defended its choice on grounds of realism beyond which there can be nothing else. But I find myself not quite convinced by this realism because it can lead us very far away from history and from reality. I believe there are two positions and that both are wrong.

--To speak about reality and forget historical fact [is wrong].

--To speak about historical fact and forget reality [is also wrong].

Thus we ought not to speak about reality and ignore historical fact. In our case the historical fact was stated by Ben Gurion. We were not the ones who said that this land cannot be divided. What is curious is that we cannot see in front of us what Menahem Begin sees. A short time ago Begin met a European friend of his, the same man I recently met in London. During the lengthy conversation that took place between the two men, one of the phenomena that Begin focused on most, as I found out from my European friend, was that of Israeli youth who had lost their vision of the Zionist dream.

I therefore believe that no matter what we do, Israel will not agree to peace with us. It cannot endure peace. It cannot endure peace, and it cannot endure war forever. Accordingly, everything it is doing now with Egypt boils down to being a "daily scheme."

Zionist elements came into Palestine under the momentum of a certain idea. Numerous forces in the world helped them until they established a state. Then they discovered that that state cannot exist within the boundaries established by the UN partitioning resolution. Therefore, they took land beyond the 1948 borders, that is the truce lines. However, they were not able to live within those borders, so they expanded to the 1967 borders. At the height of their victory in 1967 it was evident to them that their victory was a hollow victory.

I believe, therefore, that Israel discovered the real crisis of its existence after its aggression in June 1967. The Israeli military had then achieved the utmost that could be achieved in military victories. However, Israelis discovered that states are not formed by military [might]. A nation-state must have certain components in order to exist. In Israel these components do not exist: there is no nation-state where 90 languages are spoken; there is no nation state which consists in fact of 50 nations and 50 nationalities. If Israel is trying to make up for that by spreading the Zionist dream and the idea of the melting pot, [it will find that] this melting pot needs a social, educational, cultural and political framework, and none of this exists.

I will not talk to you about emigration from Israel which now exceeds immigration to Israel. But there is another more indicative phenomenon, and I will rely on the verdict of statistics which are available from the offices of the state of New York. Among the matters that these statistics indicate is that more than half a million Israelis obtained work permits and settled in New York. This means that the dream has been lost. Israel may from time to time engage in spectacular actions such as bombing Lebanon, raiding Damascus or bombing the Iraqi reactor, but the response to all this is simple: not even the strike of 1967 achieved for Israel what it had been seeking.

Let us consider the matter from another perspective. What can Egypt realistically offer Israel more than it has already offered it? I do not believe that there is more to be offered. But even that, which was a great deal, cannot give Israel a minimum measure of reassurance.

I claim even more than that. Even if all the countries were to recognize it, Israel will find itself compelled to set up a barbed wire fence around itself so it would not blend and fade in its surroundings. Israel is being threatened: first, inside the country the Israelis are being attenuated by the Palestinian Arabs; and second, the Arab world around them is threatening [to dilute their power]. Is it not strange that a country like Israel is still unable to determine what it will do with the land? Israel wants the land for security reasons, but it fears being consumed by it. The Israelis will never be able to decide on that matter because they do not have a nation-state.

A number of Israeli leaders are perceiving this crisis and refer to it. I recently saw a book by Herzog, director of Israeli intelligence and former Israeli ambassador to the United Nations in which he raises poignant questions about the future of Israel. I believe that these questions are now being raised vehemently inside Israel.

Regardless of what the Israelis themselves are saying, we must at least understand and define what we want. I cannot imagine that peace with Israel is possible. However, this does not mean that there will be an immediate war with Israel and that it will last forever.

And here I will go back to 'Abd-al-Nasir's strategy, and I believe it was correct. That strategy manifested itself in ignoring this situation. We know that Israel will always try to force itself on the situation from time to time. Therefore, we must always be prepared. This means that we are not required to settle or solve Israel's situation today in any way, but we are required to know that there can be no solution "with Israel." This does not mean that the alternative is immediate war. The Israelis are trying to gain time, but they do not know why. We, however, know why we are trying to gain time. The purpose of 'Abd-al-Nasir's strategy in gaining time was to build and develop the Arab nation, to impart a qualitative value to it and to sit and wait. Waiting can indeed become a general national and pan-Arab policy.

Is it not strange, for example, that the United States of America, after Chiang Kai Chek's regime collapsed in China, continued for almost one quarter of a century to deny the existence of the People's Republic of China? For the United States "all" of China consisted of that terrain which was limited to Taiwan. This means that some nations will occasionally ignore facts, even the facts of geography, at certain moments [in their history].

Why aren't we trying to concentrate on building the components of our own Arab power, since there is no imminent peace with Israel?

I wonder, does anyone believe that Israel will give up Jerusalem?

Does anyone believe that Israel will get out of the West Bank?

I recall that when 'Abd-al-Nasir accepted Resolution 242 and called us for a meeting to discuss the matter, some of us were worried about the articles of the resolution. 'Abd-al-Nasir told those people, "We will fight to have this resolution implemented." And this was true.

When I told Arthur Miller that and when I told him that I concurred with Ben Gurion and Menahem Begin and [thought] that Israel would not willingly give up Jerusalem or the West Bank, Miller's amazement was evident in his reply: "Are you talking about war?"

Then he went on to add, "You are then talking about a nuclear war!"

This is logical and understandable. If this land cannot be divided and if it can belong either to the Israelis or the Palestinians, then one of them must give it up. But which one? The party that can claim geography and history will control the land. Therefore, I believe that ultimately the Arab homeland surrounding Israel will hold sway, and this land will belong to no one other than the Arab. This means that Israel cannot force its wishes on the Arab homeland forever.

Ultimately, there is the danger of war, and this war can lead us to "the moment of nuclear truth." I am not saying that nuclear weapons would be used, but [I am saying that] unless there is an "Arab nuclear deterrent," we will simply find that an Israeli nuclear "weapon of extortion" will be used to impose Israel's wishes on us by striking nuclear terror in people's hearts.

I do not think that a settlement with Israel is possible or imminent.

I do, however, think that there is a possible Arab strategy and an imminent Arab strategy. If we were to achieve some settlement one of these days--although this settlement will be extremely lengthy and I think it will be one-sided, that is, it will be guaranteed by an Arab strategy--Israel will always try to provoke us and drag us into a conflict with it so it can dissipate our strength. But Israel must not succeed in this endeavor, and we ought to be prepared.

We should refer here to the experience of China and the United States, from another angle this time. When the United States used to resort to numerous means to provoke China in an attempt to drag it into a confrontation, China used to do no more than issue these well-known "warnings." China would not be moved because it was concerned with the process of building the country and building the components of its own strength--chief among which was the nuclear bomb--so it can realize its basic security guarantees. Therefore, it was not provoked.

[Text] Conditions for Overcoming the Camp David Incident

This is the fourth and the final installment of the interview with Muhammad Hasanayn Haykal, which was in the new issue of AL-MUSTAQBAL AL-'ARABI Magazine.

[Question] The recent Arab Summit Conference in Amman confirmed that the Arab countries which attended the conference affirmed that Resolution 242 was no longer suitable as the basis for solving the crisis in the Middle East. The conference also absolutely rejected the Camp David accords and the outcome of these accords.

What do you believe is the alternative to the directions which the Egyptian leadership is taking? And here we also ask how can the Camp David "incident" and the treaty be made to yield to supreme Arab interests?

What alternatives do Syria and the PLO have?

[Answer] First of all, as far as Egypt is concerned, I do not believe that the Camp David incident can be made to yield to supreme Arab interests. And here I go back once again to the notion of reality versus history and the conflict between them. I maintain that reality does not conflict with history and that history does not deny facts or reality.

The problem of the Camp David accords and their outcome is the fact that in the view of their proponents, the accords represent a realistic view which states that this is what is possible. I think that this is not enough. One cannot squander the past, the future, the possibilities and capabilities of history as well as the short and long term considerations of power on the grounds of realism. Therefore, the accords are intractable.

Let me ask, what do the Camp David Accords and the Egyptian-Israeli treaty mean? Their significance may be summarized in two basic points.

First, Sinai, with certain security conditions. Sinai was never a problem because Israel had no historical or religious claims to Sinai; it was only asking for security guarantees. Israel has taken 10 times more guarantees than it had been asking for. Accordingly, it met its objectives and then some.

Second, an ambiguous agreement that is called Palestinian autonomy. That agreement is meaningless and will not be implemented by anyone. I pray God that Egypt will not try to implement it.

[Question] If we accept in general [the notion] that "the incident" cannot be invalidated, a thinking man would continue to play his role whether he is faced with a negative incident or a positive one. If we look at the situation from this perspective, how can this incident be harnessed to serve the goals of Arab nationalism?

[Answer] This is true, but if you confront me with an incident that conflicts with history, I cannot take it into consideration. I would have to circumvent it because I cannot comprehend it as a historical incident. It is an incident that occurred in history, but nothing can be built on it. It is an incident one can circumvent but cannot build on. This is true of all incidents that conflict with history. However, they must be overcome. But [if you ask me] how did this happen, this is another matter.

[Question] This other matter is in fact the substance of my question. How can this incident be overcome?

[Answer] I think that in order to circumvent this incident, we must make the Arab homeland a capable power again, a power whose countries can think together and take action together.

But I admit that in the absence of Egypt this is the situation that we are facing. Let us go back once again to the notion of "metal fatigue." I actually believe that the Arab nation--for numerous economic, social, security, political, promotional and international, etc. reasons--is in a state of "metal fatigue." Although there are numerous positive phenomena and signs in the Arab homeland, there does not seem to be anyone who can overcome the state of "metal fatigue" at the present time. Would it have been possible for Israel, as it experienced the critical throes of looking for its identity and all the problems from which it is suffering to achieve all this? Would it have been possible for Israel to achieve "peace" with Egypt, its largest [Arab] neighbor? This is indeed greater than a dream. [It would not have been possible] had not the Arabs been in the state they are in.

Therefore if you are asking me about what is "possible" in this regard, my response would be as follows: the Arab homeland must be capable of overcoming the present moment, but, unfortunately, it cannot. It cannot do that, and the matter is not only related to Egypt's departure or its ouster [from Arab ranks]. However, let us consider the remaining forces that are active in the Arab homeland.

--Saudi Arabia has focused its strategic choice on an Islamic direction.

--Iraq and Syria, between the two of them, could have replaced Egypt as a base. However, Iraq is preoccupied with its war with Iran.

--The Arab Maghreb is far away.

Accordingly, there is nothing in front of you, in front of others and in front of me--and we are all in a position to think and not in a position of power, that is, we have ideas only and no information--but to sit and think, analyze and encourage the accumulation of resources while we wait for the day in which this store of resources will turn into a new creative force that would assume a discretionary power which can produce its effects.

When and where [would this happen]? Actually I don't know, but what I am talking about is the logic of historical development. Naturally, this does not mean that there are surprises or that we will wait for coincidences to occur. What is actually happening is that there are new positive factors on the Arab scene. As a result of their interaction and their quantitative fermentation, these factors will some day lead to a substantive change.

[Question] Let me refer to another point that has to do with what is happening between Egypt and Israel. Some of us think that behind the Arabs' rejection of a settlement lies a certain fear that Israel would control the entire area because it is technologically advanced and because of the evident inequality between it and the Arab countries in this area. In addition, it is an extension of a world-wide system of domination and exploitation that is led by the United States.

In case of a settlement, do you believe that there is actual danger that Israel will sweep the Arab area?

[Answer] The matter of Israel sweeping the Arab area deserves some thought. I firmly believe that Israel cannot sweep anything, not even technologically.

Tell me, what is the technological miracle in Israel? The principal part of its weaponry--its airplanes--is imported from abroad. Israel is indisputably an advance country, but its level of progress is not higher than that of the countries of eastern Europe. However, ultimately, what is the economic foundation of that progress? What is [its] social and political foundation?

Tell me, what is the average per capita income in Israel? It is about 1,000 dollars a year, isn't it? But what is each individual's share of foreign aid and contributions?

There is indeed more progress in Israel than there is in the Arab homeland. But Israel is not advanced [in everything] absolutely. Its progress is limited. Even the matter of the nuclear bomb which the Israelis have been able to achieve does not at all represent a technological miracle.

India, for example, which is a Third World country has a nuclear bomb.

Part of the Israeli nuclear bomb was stolen and not imported.

Israel has ready-made scientists, and it has the capability of bringing advanced scientists. Israel, for example, had the capability of bringing Edward (Miller) to Israel for 1 year. He is the father of the hydrogen bomb. Egypt or Iraq, however, cannot get him for 1 week.

Therefore I also reject the claim that Egypt will be swept economically by Israel. This will not happen unless we allow it to happen. Let us ask, what can Egypt import from Israel? Israel's exports consist basically of citrus fruits, cut diamonds, [the products of] chemical industries and weapons. What will we import from Israel? Israel does not have raw materials.

Let us also consider the matter of agricultural land. I wonder about the agricultural miracle that Israel achieved. It is true that the Israelis applied modern methods of irrigation to the land, but I claim that the reclamation of the agricultural land in al-Tahrir Province by the 23 July Revolution is no less miraculous than all the reclamation which took place in Israel.

Tell me, what is this "civilization" that Israel can bring or represent? What is the story that is being promoted about Israel being the harbinger of civilization? I can understand, for example, the claim that major colonialist countries made about what they called the white man's burden in Africa. But can Israel claim to carry the white man's burden in the Arab region? Will Israel assume the responsibility of civilizing Egypt, Saudi Arabia, etc.?

Israel itself is made up of 3 million Jews. About 2 million of them are eastern Jews. And here we ask what will be the difference between the Iraqi Jew, the Egyptian Jew or the Moroccan Jew, who immigrated to Israel, and the non-Jewish Iraqi, Egyptian or Moroccan citizen? [The former] will remain an Iraqi Jew, an Egyptian Jew or a Moroccan Jew. He may be more aware than the non-Jewish Iraqi, Egyptian or Moroccan. But that will be the only difference: no more and no less. With regard to the rest of Israel's population, and they are about 1 million who came from eastern Europe, they operate to a certain extent on a more scientific system. What is important is that when they came to the area and attacked us, Arab societies were still primitive and tribal. Hence the gap between us and them began to appear evident, but this gap is now being breached in any case.

I believe above all that, on the one hand, we must describe the state, the entity and the aspirations of the state of Israel; on the other hand, we must describe our objectives. People in Israel are declaring a number of things they will not do.

--They will not return to the pre-5 June 1967 borders.

--They will not return east Jerusalem to the Arabs.

--They will not return the West Bank and Gaza to Arab sovereignty.

--They will not recognize the PLO, etc.

But what are we saying in return? I can understand that there be a certain "logic" behind the claim that is being made in Israel about a security zone and having a historical claim to the area, no matter how false that claim is. Therefore, I believe that we need "to rationalize" what we want, at least among ourselves. We are demanding rights that were taken from us by force. This is true, but this is not enough. It is also not enough to add to that that Israel is a bridgehead and that it is a so-called state. All this is not enough even though it is true. We have to determine precisely the magnitude and the nature of the Israeli challenge, and we have to estimate its duration and its capacity. After that we are to determine what our strategy will be to meet this challenge.

Second, with regard to Syria and the PLO:

Let me tell you unequivocally that unfortunately there can be no strategy by virtue of logic in Egypt's absence, on the one hand, and in the absence of an alternative power base on the other. However, there can only be tactics, and tactics without a strategy are no more than evasive action taken merely for the sake of survival, no more and no less.

Consequently, the matter for Syria and for the PLO may be summarized as follows: in the absence of an Arab strategy and in the absence of capable power bases, Syria and the PLO cannot have a strategy; they can only engage in tactics whose only purpose is survival.

Let us consider the subject of the PLO in particular. The organization did not have a strategy at any time in the past. But it could not have helped that because the Palestinian Revolution does not have access to the land of its homeland, and all its people are under Israeli occupation. Therefore, it is living in a state of siege.

--The siege of Arab disputes.

--The siege of Arab agreements.

--The siege of Arab conflicts.

The leaders of this revolution undoubtedly have their excuse. This situation in whose grip they find themselves does not diminish their worth. Quite the contrary, I believe that they are facing the most difficult situation a national revolution had to confront. The Palestinian Revolution is compelled to maneuver, to take action and to protect itself in a siege of agreements and disputes between local and international powers.

In the absence of an Arab strategy and in the absence of alternative Arab power bases, Syria does not have many choices. It can only engage in evasive maneuvers to avoid a worse situation and to survive.

We are waiting for the action of history, and I hope we are waiting for Godot. I am referring to Samuel Becket.

CLANDESTINE ON EX-KHOMEYNI SUPPORTER REMARKS

NC051610 (Clandestine) Voice of Iran in Persian 1805 GMT 4 Nov 81

[Unattributed commentary]

[Excerpts] Oh people of Iran! The crimes of Khomeyni's regime have surpassed the limits of savagery and barbarianism. Oh nation of Iran: the group killings and inhuman tortures by the founders of the Islamic Republic and (?of the) murderers in Iran are unprecedented in any era in any place of the world--both in the dark days of repression in the middle ages and in the death camps of Hitler's Germany.

Oh compatriots! The savage behavior of the bloodthirsty Tehran leaders with the people of our country is a behavior not shown by any occupation force toward people in occupied territories. These are facts known by everyone. But one more person to unveil these crimes is Mr 'Ali Reza'i, a person whose wife and children and he himself were considered as symbols and heroes of the Islamic Republic.

Mr Reza'i, who has fled to Paris, spoke to France-Soir about the horrific crimes being committed by Khomeyni's hellish regime every day and hour. The information given by Mr Reza' is not new or complete, as he--because of his closeness with the Mojahedine-e Khalq and the clerical regime's anger over this--had been in hiding for some time. Nevertheless, his remarks give a small picture of what is happening to the suffering Iranian people in the oppressive atmosphere of the Islamic Republic and open the eyes of each and every Iranian and (?freedom-seeker).

We want to believe that the reason that made Mr Resa'i open his mouth to speak of the realities was not merely the fact that he was threatened and harassed by his former friends who had deprived him of the opportunity to (?live) and act in Iran. Like millions of Iranians and millions of freedom-seekers of the world, we want to accept that if in the past Mr Reza'i and people who thought like him approved, for any reason, the crimes--committed by Khomeyni's Islamic Republic from the very first day of its inception and which intensified with each passing day, now that these crimes have reached such a degree of savagery--are opening the eyes and awakening the conscience of Khomeyni's former friends and of the once eulogized heroes of the Islamic Republic.

We hope that Mr Reza'i is saying these things not for political reasons and differences of views, but for humanitarian reasons. There may have been many who, for a long time, did not see the hidden nature of Khomeyni and of his followers and could not see their criminal plots to overthrow those with rational thought and to destroy

Iran; people who, despite the warning cries of alert combatants, continued to encourage Khomeyni. But those who do not speak up now that the satan in (?human disguise)--who promised the rule of justice and a free society but instead took the scythe of death into his hand and started cutting down men, women, the old, the young and children who did not submit to his wants--has been disgraced, now those who do not reveal these crimes will be committing an unforgivable sin. They will be considered as partners in the regime's crimes and will be punished for this.

It is very painful for Mr Reza'i to confess that he has lost four young and zealous children in a path that has led to the establishment of the most despotic regime recorded by history. Despite all the propaganda by the murderous clergymen, it is very (?interesting) to hear him say that if in the past a few hundred were executed--during the era of Khomeyni's rule of Islam thousands and thousands have fallen victime to his bloodthirsty executioners.

Mr Reza'i is not the first person to reveal part of the unbelievable crimes committed by the clerical regime, and he won't be the last to do so. Anyone who is around the traitors and murderers ruling Iran and who has the least bit of humanity and respect, anyone who has not sold his soul and conscience to the devil is dutybound not to close his eyes to the crimes witnessed each day and should try to reveal them. If he does not, he will be a partner in the crimes of Khomeyni's antipopular regime.

CLANDESTINE ON WHY IRAN COMMUNISTS OPPOSE NRMI

NC141651 (Clandestine) Radio Iran in Persian to Iran 1330 GMT 14 Nov 81

[Station talk]

[Text] In our previous programs we discussed in detail the various (?objectives of the communists) in our homeland and clarified that the difference between these groups is only in the endorsement of or opposition to Khomeyni's regime and that this too is expedient and (?something which their master wants). Apart from this, the views of the communist groups and parties in Iran, such as the Tudeh Party, the Feda'iyan-e Khalq, the Mojahedin-e Khalq, the Kurdish Democratic Party, the Peykar group and the Komeleh and a number of the groups on all domestic and foreign matters are the same, and all of them express the same opinion which their social-imperialist master expresses. A look at the publications of these groups and a comparison of articles with the propaganda policy of the mass media of Soviet social-imperialism proves ORU point. One of the points on which all the communist groups agree is the opposition of all of them to the national resistance movement of Iran [NRMI] and with its leader, Shapur Bakhtiar.

Looking at the reasons for the opposition by the communist groups to the NRMI reveals, to a large extent, the anti-Iranian nature of these groups. What are we saying which is opposed by the communists? We oppose any type of imperialism, namely western imperialism led by the United States and eastern social-imperialism led by the Soviet Union. We say that Iran should be independent and not aligned to any one of the two superpowers--the United States or the Soviet Union. But the communist groups oppose this opinion of ours, because they consider only the United States to be imperialists and they say that "we should unite with the Soviet Union to fight against U.S. imperialism." We leave the judgment of these two differing opinions to you, our dear listeners.

The other reason why the communists oppose us is that we say that, in Iran's future rule, all political parties and groups, including the communists and even our own opponents, should be free to express their views. We say that the press should be free and that there should be (?no repression). But the communists, who are affiliated to the foreigner and who know that in a free atmosphere and a democratic society they can never gain the rule, want freedom only for those who agree with them. In other words, they believe in the same freedom which the clergy believe in.

Another point on which the foreign affiliated communists disagree with the NRMI is our stress on the preservation of the Iranian identity and our support for Iranian culture. This, of course, is not (?favorable) to those people who want to lead Iran to the society of nations living behind the iron curtain.

In (?their enmity) with the NRMI, the united forces of communism have not refrained, nor do they refrain, from aiming any kinds of insults. For instance, despite our emphasis on (?the establishment) of social justice in Iran and Dr Shapur Bakhtiar's emphasis on his belief in socialism and democracy, they say that the NRMI wants the return of the elements of the past regime's corruption and of the capitalists of the (?country's industries). While, despite our opposition to any type of imperialist domination in the region and our emphasis on the preservation of Iran's independence vis-a-vis eastern and western imperialism headed by the Soviet Union and the United States, the communist gentlemen accuse us of supporting the United States.

Another one of the fabrications [words indistinct] by the communists concerning the NRMI is that they tell their supporters that the NRMI is pursuing a (?chauvinistic) policy and opposes the autonomy of the Iranian people. We have repeatedly said and point out again that not only do we not oppose the autonomy of all Iranian (?races) that have [word indistinct] specialties, but we consider this the right of all of the people of Iran. (?Decreasing the role) of the central government in the affairs of provinces and districts and the transferring of these affairs to the people of the various parts of the country are among the points in the NRMI program. Now, how the NRMI and its leader Shapur Bakhtiar can oppose the autonomy of the (?Iranian races) is a question the answer to which the communists probably know.

CLANDESTINE ON PRO-MOSCOW GROUPS' 'SHAM WAR'

NC121634 (Clandestine) Radio Iran in Persian to Iran 1330 GMT 12 Nov 81

[Unattributed commentary: "The Sham War Between the Tudeh Party and Other Pro-Moscow Groups"]

[Excerpts] [Passage omitted including indistinct portion] some time ago we spoke to our dear listeners about the Sham War between the Tudeh Party and other pro-Moscow communist groups and we clarified that the Russians are not counting only on the Tudeh Party in their wish to infiltrate our country. The Tudeh Party has been kept only to mislead ordinary people and to keep hidden the aligned characteristic of the other communist groups. In other words, other pro-Soviet groups (?are feigning a duel) with the Tudeh Party to hide their own affiliation with the Soviet Union from the people, while the aims of all of them are the same--to take our Iran behind the iron curtain.

As an example, ask the leaders of the Tudeh Party, Mojahedin-e Khalq, the Kurdish Democratic Party [KDP], the Peykar group, the Komeleh and the Feda'iyan'e Khalq what they think about the Soviet agression in Afghanistan and about the military occupation of this nonaligned country by the Red Army. All of these gentlemen, who pretend to have great differences, will say that the Red Army has gone to Afghanistan at the request of the Afghan people themselves to defend Babrak Karmal's auspicious revolution against imperialist attacks. Of course, none of them say anything about how Barbrak Karmal came to power and about the fact that 3 days after the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan, this traitor was brought [words indistinct] to Kabul. Nor do they explain which one of Afghanistan's neighbors--Iran or Pakistan--was the imperialist power that intended to attack Afghanistan. If we ask the leaders of the Tudeh Party, the Mojahedin-e Khalq, the KDP, the Feda'iyan-e Khalq, the Peykar group and the Komeleh what they think about the Afghan Mujahedin who are fighting in bare feet and with a (?piece of dried bread as nourishment) against the occupiers of their homeland, all of them will reply in unison that the Afghan Mujahedin are a group of brigands who have been armed by U.S. and Chinese imperialism in order to threaten Babrak Karmal's revolution.

Under the label of fighting against U.S. imperialism for almost (?3) years now the Red Army has been downing napalm bombs on the heads of these barefoot people and is burning their villages. If the members of the Tudeh Party do not understand what this type of crushing means, the leaders of the KDP and Komeleh should be able to understand it because they have seen the bombing of villages in Kordestan by Khomeyni's clique. The same calamity that was brought on the Kurdish compatriots is being brought by the Russians on the people of Afghanistan but on a [word indistinct] scale. So, how can the leaders of the KDP and the Komeleh join in unison with the Tudeh Party and radio Moscow and call the Afghan Mujahedin "brigands" and (?condemn) their national struggle? This is a (?raffling) question.

Let us leave the Afghan problem about which some of the clergymen have been talking like radio Moscow during recent months. We ask the leaders of the Tudeh Party, the Mojahedin-e Khalq, the KDP, the Komeleh, the Peykar group and the Feda'iyan about their opinion on the workers' insurrection in Poland and about the free unions there. These gentlemen have previously given us their opinion in their publications, organs and radios. Their answer is the same as that given by radio Moscow. To "defend workers and toilers," it is their opinion that the insurrection of the Polish workers and unions against the oppression of the Communist Party is a plot hatched by western imperialism, as everywhere else all the workers in communist countries are living in paradise--of course behind the iron curtain!

Finally, we ask the leaders of all the communist parties in Iran and all those who believe in Marxism-Leninism and Islamic-Marxism, and who are doing their best to show that they have great differences among them, what they think about the life of the people in the Asian colonies of the Soviet Union. Undoubtedly, all of them will speak like radio Moscow about the fruits that the Great October Revolution has brought to the people of Azerbaijan, Armenia, Georgia and for the persophones in [words indistinct], Bokhara and Tadzhikstan. We are not (?assuming) this. They have previously said so and have written it in their publications.

(?The only point on which these gentlemen pretend to differ) is the endorsement of rejection of Ayatollah Khomeyni's Islamic Republic. (?Moscow) has ordered the Tudeh Party and the Feda'iyan to endorse it and the others to oppose it--and this sham war of course (?only services the interests) of Soviet social-imperialisms, if we (?look beyond these orders to endorse or oppose) [words indistinct].

What is important to them is to deceive the people, to draw them behind the iron curtain and to open the way for the great bear toward the Persian Gulf. Of no importance whatsoever for these [words indistinct] are freedom, democracy, our (?national identity), national sovereignty and cultural identity. The united (?forces) of communism are (?exercising demagogy) and are exploiting all the weak points of our kept-in-ignorance society (?in order to further their objectives). We will continue this discussion in our future talks.

MKO TERRORIST ACTS AGAINST GOVERNMENT FORCES REVIEWED

Assassinations Listed

Tehran KAYHAN INTERNATIONAL in English 4 Nov 81 p 2

[Text]

TEHRAN, Nov. 3 (Kayhan Int'l) — These are the "popular" activities of a group which under the guise of supporting the masses, have gathered a number of youths around themselves, and stain every day their hands with the blood of the bravest and dearest children of these heroic masses:

Massacre of Revolutionary Guards Members of the Basij (mobilized forces) and the Revolutionary Committees:

The Munafiqeen assume the killing of the Guards, members of the Basij and Revolutioary committees, as a religious duty and attack them even during sleep. For example the MKO's terrorists recently attacked 14 member guards of the Basij in Gha'em Shahr (Northern Iran) and opened fire on them when they were asleep, and as a result 8 of the guards were wounded and 6 were martyred.

From June 15 up to Sept. 27, 91 Revolutionary Guards and members of the Basij and Islamic Revolutionary Committee were martyred by the counterrevolutionary groups. The following is part of the chronology of their crimes in this connection.

1. In an armed raid in Tehran the MKO members martyred 14 Revolutionary Guards.
2. In an attack launched by the Munafiqeen upon Revolutioary Guards on July 24, twelve members of the IRGC and Basij were martyred.
3. In a brutal armed attack carried out by the Munafiqeen on the 8th Committee of Tehran, a worker who was also a member of the Basij was martyred (Ettela'at, July 26).
4. Three members of the Basij were martyred by the Munafiqeen on Aug. 18.
5. A Revolutionary Guard called Ebrahim Afshari, who had just returned from the war front to visit his family was martyred in Shahrara, Tehran.
6. Two Guards were shot dead by the MKO's terrorists, riding a motorcycle (Ettela'at, Aug. 31).
7. The Munafiqeen martyred a member of the Basij with grenade, in Langerud (Kayhan, Sept. 1)
8. A bomb explosion at the Training Center of the IRGC in Mashad (Northeastern Iran) took the lives of two Revolutionary Guards
9 A Revolutionary Guard was martyred in Tehran by the Munafiqeen on Sept. 29.

D The Assassination of the Army Personnel by the Munafiqeen.

1. An army officer called Kiomars Karami was assassinated in Tehran by the MKO's terrorists on Sept. 11.
2. A non-commissioned officer called Mehdi Shaghaghian was martyred in Shiraz on Sept. 9 by the Munafiqeen.
3. The MKO's terrorists martyred an army non-commissioned officer in Tehran on Sept. 9.

Massacre of the Members of Construction Jihad, Revolutionary Courts, the Martyr Foundation and Other Revolutionary Organs:

From June 15 up to Sept. 27, 14 members of the revolutionary foundations of the country were martyred by the Munafiqeen.

1. The MKO's terrorists martyred an official of Tehran's Martyr Foundation, called Mazandarani, on June 21.
2. The Munafiqeen martyred two members of the Construction Jihad in Sanandaj (Western Iran) on July 16.
3. The Deputy Prosecutor General of the Islamic Revolutionary Court of Tabriz was assassinated and martyred by the Munafiqeen (Ettela'at, July 30).
4. The Head of the Martyr Foundation of Behbahan, Hojjatoleslam Bekhradian, was assassinated by the MKO's terrorists on Aug. 3.
5. The Imam's representative in the Construction Jihad of the Anzali Port (Northern Iran) was martyred by the counterrevolutionary Munafiqeen on Sept. 1.
6. A member of the Construction Jihed of Bojnurd Township was attacked and martyred by the Munafiqeen (Ettela'at, Sept. 9).

Bombings Reported

Tehran KAYHAN INTERNATIONAL in English 5 Nov 81 p 2

[Text]

TEHRAN, Nov. 4 (Kayhan Int'l.) — In previous issues you read the statistics of the "popular" massacres of people by the Munafiqeen (members of the MIO).

In this issue and in the next one which will be the last part of this series, you will be familiarized with another part of the hysteric activities of these "partisans" of the masses.

During their "historic" and "heroic" operations the Munafiqeen succeeded in destroying many buildings of the "reactionaries" such as mosques, bookshops, hospitals, pharmacies, blood transfusion centers, the building of the martyr foundation and the war victims as well as the houses and shops of ordinary people. They managed to burn a large number of "reactionary" books such as the Quran and Nahjul Balagha as well as numerous "Falangist" agents including suckling babies and ...!

Now let us review the fifth part of the bulletin of services of the partisans of the masses. Again it is mentioned that these figures are incomplete and restricted to three months (June 15 to Sept. 27) therefore they do not encompass the whole of the crimes committed by the Munafiqeen. However, the volume of their crimes after that period has not been less than their "popular" services during those three months.

E. The massacre of the officials and statesmen of the Islamic Republic of Iran: The outstanding example of these massacre is the calamity of bombing the IRP office in Tehran which ended in the martyrdom of 73 aides of the Imam including Ayatollah Behshti.

The bombing of the Prime Ministry office which took the lives of our president and prime minister and the assassination of the pious scholar, Ayatollah Madani, are among the other conspicuous crimes of the MKO in this connection.

From June 15 up to Sept. 27, over 92 state officials were martyred by the Munafiqeen.

They think that by assassinating the dignitaries they can undermine the pillars of the Islamic Republic. However, they are blind to the fact that with the martyrdom of Islamic personalities, their red line does not end but the number of their followers will increase and their way will further be perpetuated.

F. Hurting and Beating Innocent People: As a result of their armed attacks and bombing the Munafiqeen, these false "friends" of the masses wounded and hurt a total number of 498 Muslim people, from June 15 to Sept. 27.

Examples of such bombings are the explosion at the railroad station of Qom, the explosion at a shopping mall in Kermanshah and bombing on Pasteur street which left 84 injured.

G- Raiding Private and Public places:

In pursuing their struggle against the Islamic Republic of Iran, the Munafiqeen have not refrained from any inhuman action.

It is not known that for serving which masses they set fire to the houses of innocent people!? Or in Compliance with which creed do they set ablaze the mosques, the places of worship? Do they receive any benefit from these actions other than the contentment of their foreign masters and the rage and hatred of the Muslim people of Iran?

From June 15 upto Sept. 27, the Munafiqeen carried out 146 raids on the public and private places and property examples of which are as follows:

1. Bomb explosion at the railroad station of Qom on June 23 which resulted in severe human and material casualties.

2. The explosion of a concussion bomb at the Swiss Air Office in Tehran on June 28.

3. Setting fire to the library of the Al-Hadi mosque in Tehran as a result of which numerous copies of Quran and Nahjul Balagha were burned (Kayhan, July 9).

4. Apart from the building of the "Vahdat" Islamic Center was set on fire by the counterrevolutionary Munafiqeen (Ettela'at, July 11).

5. The bookshop of Imam Reza Mosque was set ablaze by the MKO's terrorists (Kayhan July 15).

6. A concussion grenade was hurled at the building of the Pars News Agency by the counterrevolutionary Munafiqeen (Ettela'at, July 16).

7. For the second time the Munafiqeen set fire to the library of the Al-Hadi Mosque with a Molotov cocktail on July 14.

8. The mercenaries of the U.S., while supported by the German Police, raided the Hamburg Mosque and tore copies of Quran (Ettela'at, July 21).

9. An automobile belonging to the martyr foundation of Lahijan (Northern Iran) was set ablaze by the Munafiqeen (Ettela'at, July 25).

10. A bomb explosion in front of a hospital in Shiraz (Ettela'at, July 25).

11. A grenade was thrown at the building of the Blood Transfusion Organization in Tehran (Ettela'at, July 25)

12. A pipe bomb was hurled into a girls' high school in Tehran and caused some damage (Ettela'at, July 28)

13. A bomb explosion at a military hospital left damages. (Kayhna, July 26).

14. The counterrevolutionaries bombed the Sahebul Zaman Mosque in Tehran (Kayhan, JULY 27).

15. A shop on the Jomhuri street in Tehran was set afire by the Munafiqeen (Ettela'at Aug. 5).

16. The counterrevolutionaries set fire to the shop of a man called Ali Akbar Pahlevani (Ettela'at, Aug. 8).

17. The Munafiqeen set 5 shops ablaze in Sari (Ettela'at, Aug. 10).

18. A molotov Cocktail, hurled by the Munafiqeen at a pharmacy in Mashad, caused some damages (Kayhan, Aug. 23).

19. Due to the Munafiqeen's attack on a beverage- producing factory in Orumieh, various parts of this factory were damaged (Kayhan, Aug. 24).

20. The counterrevolutionaries set fire to a carpet shop in Shiravan (Ettela'at, Aug. 24).

FUNDAMENTALIST DYNAMISM, STRATEGY EVALUATED

London IRAN PRESS SERVICE in English No 42,16 Oct 81 pp 5-7

[Text] By an Iranian writer who questions the source of the fanatics' dynamism and the validity of an Islamic movement.

How much longer will it be before the West realises the truth about Islamic fundamentalism and the threat it presents to the world order? That was the question which many Middle Easterners who do not view their own Muslim faith with fanaticism were asking last weekend after the assassination of Anwar Sadat.

Sadat was murdered solely because he was serving Western rather than anti-Western interests, it is pointed out. The guiding principle of Islamic fundamentalism is only superficially a return to the Islam of medieval times or that at present practised in countries where medieval ideas hold sway--the real aim is to destroy the Western world's order, its domination of the Middle East in particular, and its influence throughout the rest of the world.

The West's mistake is in failing to understand the real character of Islamic fundamentalism, believing it is a desire to return to some spiritual paradise where all men were happy. It is identified with the hankerings of so many jaded Westerners for some more primitive, carefree way of life and some spiritual justification for doing away with material things.

Nothing could be more mistaken. Islamic fundamentalism, like the socialist revolutions, is fired by hate. With Muslims this is the hate of colonisers who have followed up their physical domination of the Muslim world with technological and psychological domination. With the working class revolutions the spur was hatred of the ruling classes who had for so long oppressed them. Just as the socialist revolutions obliterated the bourgeois groups who made the domination of the ruling classes possible through their skills and services, so those in the Middle East who serve the West must be wiped out to remove the colonisers' agents.

The socialist revolutions drew their inspiration from Western ideas and were organised by planners with Western culture and minds. The first successful Islamic revolution, that in Iran, was partially carried out by Muslim fanatics, who were able to understand the minds of the mass of Iranians and rouse the fanaticism that was necessary for the majority of Muslims to go into action in a way Western logic or simple political philosophy could not. But the revolution was planned by Western minds, marxists and other leftists who, once they acquired the cooperation of the mullahs to reach the people, overthrew the Shah's system with an efficiency and speed which no solely Muslim opposition group could have achieved.

The leftist Mojahedin-e-Khalq activists and their comrades had been hard at work trying to obtain public support for their fight against the Shah for many years, with no success at all. It was only when Khomeini and his fanatical mullahs moved in that the Iranian public took any notice of the opposition. All earlier political movements in Iran had been confined to skirmishing among the ruling class.

The efforts of Bani-Sadr, Yazdi and his so-called liberal colleagues to organize a Western-style socialist society in Iran never even took off and were doomed to failure from the day the extremist clergy decided they were going to decide the future of the country. They knew Iranians and their thought processes, and Bani-Sadr's long years away had misled him into thinking his people thought differently than they did. He was soon a pathetic, hopeless figure who, neither true Westerner nor genuine Muslim, lost his Western logic under strain and began to pursue suicidal policies that assured his doom.

In Egypt, Saudi Arabia and other parts of the Middle East, and then Muslim areas of the Far East, similar uprisings are planned by the fanatics of the left and the Islamic extremists, who have proved in Iran that in the short run, their interests are identical. And as far as the majority of them are concerned, even if only some of them realise it, in the long run, too.

For, as has happened in the West, the young people of the present Islamic world are looking forward ultimately to a secular society, but one free of Western domination. They hope it will be the non-Western world which dominates the West, and Western people can learn just what it is like to spend centuries as the underdogs, humiliated by cultural and social stagnation, shamed by the unthinking arrogance of the newly dominant alien culture and military strength. It is the deep resentment over this that gives the "Islamic revival" its real motivation for the young, not a desire to go back to a society regulated by the Qoran.

Ironically, it was the failure of the Christian West to subdue the Muslims that sparked off the soul searching that led to cultural renaissance in the West. But the Muslims, left at first to themselves, and then conquered and made the dependents of the infidels, were left to stagnate. The alternative to stagnation was adoption of Western ways and abandonment of the tenets of religion, which had not been replaced by more pragmatic philosphies as in the resurgent parts of the world.

The tragedy was that the Qoran was merely one more politico-religious manifesto. Islam's early thinkers were mostly children of older cultures like the Persian and Greek. While the Arab occupation revived Persia's own culture the Arabs had no true culture of their own. They absorbed as much as they could of others, but as the pressures of those superior cultures grew so the Arabs constantly withdrew into the proscribed world laid down by a book and a prophet who knew nothing of the greater world outside primitive Arabia.

As a philosophical and even practical guide for everyday life that book, like the Bible and similar works, has its values. As a set of regulations for living it is often a preposterous anachronism. It is perhaps the prime condemnation of Islam as a genuine philosophy that its adherents depend almost solely on one book for their inspiration and that primarily Persian and to a lesser degree other cultures have made up most of what is seen as Arab culture today.

The idea that any higher entity would be concerned with how we wash ourselves and what we eat may seem absurd to a rational Western mind. But it is the kind of limitation of thinking that provides fertile ground for those who seek to sew hatred of opposing creeds or ways of life. And that, the enemies of the West have realised, is where their greatest chance today lies.

The West's dependence on oil for its economies, its degeneracy, hastened by the slaughter of the cream of its manhood in wars fought by two successive generations, the confusion of people in Western societies, this exacerbated by second-rate leadership thrown up by obsolete democratic systems--all these factors have given those who look for a completely new order of things a great opportunity. Best of all, the creation of Israel in the heart of the Muslim world, with the failure of the West to prevent he killing and oppression of the Palestinian Arabs, has made a whole generation of young Arabs anxious for vengeance.

And these same forces know that Islam, once its fanaticism has been exhausted and the West has been brought to its knees, will be no match for more pragmatic cultural and social ideas. For the moment that fanaticism is directed to weakening the West, except in Afghanistan, where the West's own cynical fomenting of it in a futile bid to prevent inevitable change ironically only serves to fan the flame of the same dangerous fire throughout the Middle East.

If Western leaders recognise these factors they will at least perhaps be able to make the decline of their liberal societies a less painful process for their citizens than it must be if they don't try to combat something they are helping to make inevitable.

IRANIAN MEDIA REACTION TO 'BRIGHT STAR' MANEUVERS

[Editorial Report] GF161105 Iranian regional radio stations covered by Gulf Bureau--Ahvaz, Mashhad and Shiraz Domestic Services--have not been to carry any reports concerning the bright star military maneuvers or commentaries on the subject with one exception: During its 1500 GMT newscast on 14 November, Shiraz Domestic Service carried a report on remarks made by the Estahbanat Friday Imam during prayers on 13 November. The Imam denounced the maneuvers saying, "They cannot terrorize Muslims."

Tehran International Service in Urdu at 1415 GMT on 7 November cited an AP dispatch designating the maneuvers an "exercise symbolizing support for U.S. agents and U.S. interests." A foreign ministry statement reported by PARS was carried on the 10 November URDU broadcast and a commentary on 11 November mainly dealing with the multinational forces proposed for Sinai also made several references to the rapid deployment force and "U.S. presence in the Persian Gulf, which are parts of U.S. policy of hegemony." On 12 November an unattributed commentary on the maneuvers was carried in Urdu discussing the extent of the operation and citing "revolutionary struggle by the Muslims of participating countries inspired by the Iranian revolution" as one of the reasons. The commentary also referred to the foreign ministry statement on bright star. A factual report on the arrival of military equipment in Alexandria was also included in the 12 November Urdu program. The station has not made any further mention of the exercises to date.

Zahedan International Service in Urdu at 1530 GMT on 11 November carried its first report noting the arrival of U.S. equipment in Alexandria to be used in bright star, which is a "joint exercise of the United States and its henchmen." The program also included a commentary on Egyptian President Mubarak's views on Saudi Prince Fahd's eight-point plan outlined in an interview with a Kuwaiti paper and U.S. naval exercises off the Egyptian shores. A commentary was carried during the 12 November broadcast discussing U.S. policy and reaction to "the success of the Islamic Revolution in Iran. The United States aims to prevent Islamic revolutions in the region," it noted. The last reference to the maneuvers was a factual report in the 14 November broadcast on arrival of U.S. arms in Egypt.

Tehran International Service in Arabic began to carry reports and commentaries on the bright star maneuvers on 7 November. During its 0700 GMT newscast on that day, the station quoted a Libyan official as criticizing U.S.-Sudanese maneuvers along the Sudan-Chad border. At 0900 and 1100 GMT it quoted an AP report that the U.S. exercises in Egypt, Sudan, Oman and Somalia are the biggest ever of their kind in the Middle East.

During its 0400 GMT newscast on 8 November, Tehran Arabic quoted Libyan leader Mu'ammar al-Qadhdhafi as calling on the Arabs to protest the U.S. forces. At 1730 GMT it quoted the English language newspaper Kuwait TIMES as warning that the U.S. military exercises would make the area subject to the conflicts of the superpowers. It added that this situation will not serve the interests of the countries in the area but that they would safeguard U.S. interests in Egypt and the region.

On 9 November Tehran Arabic quoted news agencies on the arrival of U.S. troops in Egypt. During its 0900, 1100 and 1230 GMT newscasts. The radio reported that more U.S. troops have arrived in Egypt to participate in the maneuvers. The radio noted that the bright star exercises involve about 4,000 U.S. military personnel.

During its newscasts on 10 November, Tehran's Arabic service continued to report on the maneuvers. At 0400, 0700 and 2000 GMT, the radio quoted news agencies on the arrival of U.S. troops in Egypt. At 0700 GMT the station reported that Libyans had demonstrated to protest the exercises. At 0900 GMT the station carried the Iranian foreign ministry statement denouncing bright star (LD101014). At 1100, 1230 and 1430 GMT the radio carried the full text of the foreign ministry statement on the exercises. It also carried a report on Iranian cabinet's meeting (LD101154) in which various issues, including the bright star exercises, were discussed.

In its 0400 GMT newscast on 11 November, the station quoted news agency reports on the arrival of 4,000 U.S. paratroopers in Egypt. The station did not carry any further reports that day.

On 12 November the station reported that the PDRY issued a statement condemning the U.S. exercises. This report was carried at 1100, 1230 and 1430 GMT. At 2000 GMT it reported that Iranian revolutionary organizations and institutions issued statements condemning the U.S. maneuvers in the region (GF130712).

At 0400 GMT on 13 November, Tehran Arabic repeated the report on the condemnation of U.S. maneuvers in the region by revolutionary organizations. At 1730 GMT the radio quoted the Syrian newspaper al-Ba'th as saying that the bright star exercises are meant to occupy the area and that they would "turn the region into a hell."

On 14 November the station again quoted al-Ba'th during its 0400 newscast. In its 2000 GMT newscast, the radio quoted Prime Minister Musavi's interview on the maneuvers. (LD142050).

On 15 November the radio reported that the Libyan oil workers union had issued a statement denouncing the U.S. maneuvers. The report was carried during the 1100 GMT newscast. The radio did not carry further reports during later newscasts. At 1730 GMT on the same day, however, Tehran Arabic carried an unattributed commentary (FG151335) assailing the maneuvers and regretting that the current decade will be characterized in history as one of "surrender and defeat." The radio pointed out that the "reckless maneuvers" that began on 14 November "mark the beginning of a new kind of colonialism and new alliances in the region."

BORDER TRANSIT VISAS REFUSED--According to the Central News Unit, the Public Relations Office of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs issued the following announcement. According to information received, the Pakistani Government has recently stopped issuing transit visas on the Iran-Pakistan border, and does not issue visas under any circumstances. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs informs those who wish to leave via the Iran-Pakistan border that they should obtain visas for Pakistan before leaving the country, so that they do not encounter difficulties at the border. CLANDESTINE QUOTES EXILE PAPER--The London-based Iran POST has revealed that the clerical regime has started guerrilla and terrorist training of more than 2,000 of its men in the Chehel Derakht [as heard--presumably Chehel Dockhtaran] garrison in Shahrud. Iran POST writes that the training of this group is undertaken by a number of Syrian, Palestinian and Libyan experts in terrorist activities and guerrilla warfare. KDP UNITY WITH RAJAVI, BANI-SADR--In a letter, the text of which was published by (Sa'id Badal) in Paris, secretary general of the Kurdish Democratic Party [KDP] 'Abdorrahman Qasemlu has announced the KDP's adherence to the resistance council of Abolhasan Bani-Sadr and Mas'ud Rajavi. This decision by 'Abdorrahman Qasemlu has perplexed political sources, since, when Abolhasan Bani-Sadr was the President of Khomeyni's regime, the KDP repeatedly condemned him for bombing (?areas) in Kordestan and called him the person responsible for the killing of thousands of Kurds. This decision by Qasemlu will definitely meet with the strong and negative reaction of several combatant Kurdish organizations that are fighting against Khomeyni's regime and will isolate him further. [Text] [NC071411 (Clandestine) Radio Iran in Persian to Iran 1330 GMT 7 Nov 81]

BAZARGAN ALLY IN EVIN PRISON--It has been said in Tehran that 'Ali Ardalan, [name indistinct] deputy in the Mullah's Islamic assembly and who is a very close ally of Mehdi Bazargan, has been in Evin Prison in Tehran for over 2 months. Ardalan, who was the finance minister in the first government appointed by Khomeyni, is the only minister from Bazargan's interim government to have been jailed. Circles close to Ardalan's family say that he is kept in adverse conditions and that his physical condition is extremely poor. [Text] [GF080630 (Clandestine) Radio Iran in Persian 0330 GMT 8 Nov 81]

TUDEH PARTY HEAD REPORTED--Following a number of contradictory reports concerning an attempt on the life of Tudeh Party Secretary General Nureddin Kianuri published recently, it has been reported in Frankfurt that he has been transported to Europe for medical care. Our correspondent's report indicates that Kianuri's exact location is not clear. However, there is a strong possibility that he has been taken to the GDR via a European country. According to one intelligence officer of the regime of Mullahs, Kianuri was the subject of an assassination attempt about 2 weeks ago, which left him gravely wounded. Even though Tudeh Party officials have maintained complete silence on the subject, Kianuri's absence during the past 17 days from party sessions lends credibility to the reported assassination attempt. COUNTERREVOLUTIONARY BASE IN GORGAN DISCOVERED--The central new unit reports that the public relations office of the central headquarters of the Islamic revolution guards corps announced that on Friday, 6 November, the guards brothers in Gorgan discovered an operational and supply center of Ranjbaran, a blasphemous grouplet. Reports received indicate that in this operation one of the counterrevolutionaries was killed, two were wounded and two others were arrested. The same report says that 18 G3 firearms, a box of grenades, three colts, 5,000 rounds of G3 ammunition, a number of tear-gas bombs, a radio set and a large quantity of ammunition, clothing and documents on plans to attack the guards corps base and other places were discovered. VISITING IRANIANS' EXIT DENIAL--In its latest issue the ETTELA'AT newspaper has listed the conditions for leaving the country, thus confirming the intensification of the regime's oppressive policies of oppression in denying the people free travel abroad. By virtue of the new regulations, people will be unable to leave the country even for urgent medical reasons. According to the voice of Iran correspondent's report, the clerical regime has decided against granting Iranians, residing in 11 foreign countries who travel to Iran for a short period, permission to leave the country. Quoting offiical sources of the clerical foreign ministry, the voice of Iran correspondent has reported that the 11 countries in question are as follows: Kuwait, Dubayy, Pakistan, Iraq, France, Egypt, Jordan, Turkey, the United Arab Emirates, Italy and Bahrain. According to this report, even the return of Iranians with official permanent residence permits in those countries, and who have been given permission to return by Khomeyni's embassies in these countries, will be denied. EXECUTION OF MONARCHISTS IN IRAN--A voice of Iran correspondent reports from Isfahan that last week 11 further monarchists, who are struggling for the establishment of legal constitutional monarchy system in our country, were executed by Khomeyni's savage hirelings in Isfahan. Our correspondent adds that the fundamentalist Tehran leaders--who are terrified with the daily-increasing expansion of the struggles of the large number of supporters of the constitution and constitutional monarchy--send several of them every (?few days) to the firing squads but they refrain from publishing reports on the execution of monarchists so as to avoid both drawing the people's attention to this and turning public opinion against these undeniable realities. CAUSE OF C-130 CRASH--On the 40th day after a number of the armed forces' commanders and a group of the regime's lackeys were killed in a crash of an armed forces C-130 transport plane, it was heard in Tehran that a soldier on board the aircraft was responsible for the explosion. Our correspondent, quoting a very well-informed source, reports that a soldier of the Iranian army who was carrying a number of grenades set off the grenades near the cockpit, which caused the C-130 to crash and 5 armed forces and revolution guard commanders and over 100 others to be killed. The brave Iranian soldier was sacrificed. The regime's authorities have not yet announced the cause of the crash. [Text] [GF090938 (Clandestine) Voice of Iran in Persian 0330 GMT 9 Nov 81]

NEW MOVEMENT FORMED--The organization of Azarbayjanis living abroad has announced its formation in a statement, which also says that the only way for Iran to be liberated is the quick overthrow of the usurper and illegal regime of Khomeyni and its replacement by a constitutional monarchy. In its first announcement the organization states: it is now clear to everyone that the cruel and arbitrary regime of the so-called Islamic Republic can give nothing to Iran except a divided homeland, civil war, destruction of Iranian standing and honor abroad, misery, backwardness and destruction of the basis of the nation's economy, culture and civilization. The first statement of the organization of Azarbayjanis living abroad stresses that under such circumstances the duty of all patriotic Iranian women and men is to rise in order to overthrow this decadent regime and wrest Iran out of the claws of the enemies and the murderers by igniting the flame of resistance. The statement adds that in the battle for the liberation of the homeland all patriotic individuals and organizations of the great Iranian nation will do all that they can. However, the zealots of Azarbayjan, who during the course of history have been the guardians of this holy land and the guardians of independence and the national integrity of Iran, feel a deeper duty toward their self-sacrificing forefathers and the future generations of the homeland. The statement also stresses that the great and holy and important document of our nation, the constitution of Iran, is the result of the sacrifice of Iranian people and especially the zealous women and men of Azarbayjan. In its first statement, the new nationalist movement has also announced its aims, which include emphasis on the overthrow of the criminal usurper regime of Khomeyni and its replacement by a government of law and order and on the basis a constitutional monarachy, which is the only way for Iran to be liberated. MINISTRY OF INTERIOR OFFICIAL APPOINTED--In his exalted name. Brother Engineer Mir-Salim, in accordance with this order you are hereby appointed to the post of deputy minister and political and social undersecretary at the ministry of interior. In view of the importance of the country's security, in addition to political and social affairs please take steps to establish the position of deputy minister of law enforcement. The supervision of this deputy ministry will also be entrusted to your excellency. I hope that by the grace of God and under the leadership of the Imam of the Islamic nation, you will be successful and will be supported in serving the honorable Iranian nation. With greetings and thanks, Seyyed Kamaloddin Musavi, minister of interior. BANI-SADR, RAJAVI MONEY TRANSFER--More details have been published on how foreign exchange was transferred abroad by Bani-Sadr and Rajavi from the country. It was revealed in Paris that Abolhasan Bani-Sadr, the regime's fugitive president, has transferred 130 million francs from the huge amounts he has taken from Iran to the branch of Societe General Bank of France in the Paris suburb where he lives. Abolhasan Bani-Sadr and Mas'ud Rajavi, the fugitive leader of the Mojahedin-e Khalq organization, are now living in a large villa in Auvers-sur-oise near Paris. According to this report, the amount of 100 million [as heard] francs is only part of the large amounts which Bani-Sadr transferred abroad during his presidency and through his friend 'Ali Reza Nowbari, the dismissed Central Bank of Iran Governor. This report states that Mas'ud Rajavi has transferred millions of tumans in foreign exchange to French and Swiss banks. These amounts were robbed, in the first days of Khomeyni's revolution, from the Pahlavi foundation offices and from a company called Khalij-e Markazi in Tehran by a number of Mojahedin-e Khalq members and were then transferred abroad in the form of foreign exchange. In addition, guerrillas of the Mojahedin-e Khalq organization robbed millions of rials in several bank robberies in Tehran and other parts of the country. These amounts have been turned into dollars, pounds and francs and transferred abroad by Mas'ud Rajavi. The report concludes by saying that Bani-Sadr and Rajavi furnish the heavy and costly expenditures of their propaganda from these monies that have been plundered from the Iranian nation. FUNERAL FOR AYATOLLAH TABATABA'I--Tehran, 16 Nov (PARS News Agency)--The funeral of the late Ayatollah Seyyed Mohammad Hussein Tabataba'i was held in the Holy City of Qom today. Ayatollah Tabataba'i died on Sunday as a result of uremia and lung infection at the age of 78. A day of national mourning was announced today on this occasion. A number of leading religious figures including Ayatollah Golpaygani, Ayatollah Najafi Mara'shi, Ayatollah Hussein 'Ali Montazeri as well as a number of officials attended the ceremony. The body of the late Ayatollah was burried beside the Holy Shrine of Hazrate Masuma the sister of the 8th Imam of the household of the prophet, Imam Reza in an atmosphere of grief, a special prayer was led by Ayatollah Golpaygani. Meanwhile, a mourning ceremony was held in Tehran's Martyr Motahhari college today to commemorate the third day of the [word indistinct] of the outstanding Quranic exegetist, the late Ayatollah Allameh Tabataba'i. A large group of Muslim and revolutionary people of Tehran participated in the glorious ceremony held on behalf of Imam Khomeyni to honor of al-Mizan, a comprehensive commentary on the Quran. Ayatollah Khazali, a member of the council of guardians praised the services of the great philosopher in training Islamic scholars such as martyrs Motahhari, Beheshti, Qoddus' and Bahonar as well as other great religious scholars who are now serving in the society. He pledged full Soviet support for the regime. [Text] [London IRAN PRESS SERVICE in English 5 Nov 81 p 12]

KHOMEYNI ACTIVIST SHOT--Ghazanfar Khavand, a so-called student and leading activist for the Khomeini regime in Italy, has been shot during a visit he was paying to Tehran. His body was among those people killed in street battles in Tehran which were taken to the cemetery one day last week. [Text] [London IRAN PRESS SERVICE in English 5 Nov 81 p 12]

MAJLIS AUTHORITY QUESTIONED--The proposed Anavin Sanavieh (Secondary Matters) clause which is designed to allow the Majlis to decide on certain matters originally the responsibility only of the Shi'ite clergy, can be a first step in "communising" Iran, a leading Shi'ite cleric in Iran, Ayatollah Qomi-Tabatabai, said this week. Another leading religious figure, this time in Paris, in Ayatollah Mehdi Rouhani, has also warned of the danger to Iranians' freedom which the proposed new clause poses. Qomi, a constant critic of Khomeini, warned that ratification of the clause by the Majlis could mean that property could be taken away from people even though this was not allowed under Qoranic interpretations. The new clause would allow the Majlis to vote the confiscation of property on a force majeure basis, that is make it acceptable in reigning circumstances. "Already Khomeini's loudspeakers have started all over Iran explaining the needs for such a decision and preparing the people for it," he warned. "This is a most dangerous threat to people's freedom." Rouhani warned that under the new provision the regime could take over what it wanted. That meant it would be easy for any person who owned one or more properties to have all but a single one taken away from him. "If this is passed by the Majlis it could open the way for the sovietisation of Iran," Rouhani said. [Text] [London IRAN PRESS SERVICE in English 5 Nov 81 p 11]

MODERATES THREATENED WITH ROLL CALL--In a move which observers say is aimed at so-called moderate opponents of the fundamentalist majority in the Majlis the Iranian parliament has recommended that all deputies who are absent from sessions for 100 consecutive hours or 250 hours non-consecutively should be asked to resign. All elderly or sick members who are unable to attend parliament for four consecutive months should also be asked to quit. The moderate members frequently boycott sessions to express their disagreement with measures and methods of the majority. [Text] [London IRAN PRESS SERVICE in English 5 Nov 81 p 11]

TEHRAN GOVERNOR 'FIRED'--The governor of Tehran, Mostafa Neshat, has been fired for "irresponsible" remarks on the fuel situation in Tehran. He told the press recently that Tehran would have no fuel shortages during the coming winter. [Text] [London IRAN PRESS SERVICE in English 5 Nov 81 p 11]

ARAFAT WELCOME--Observers noted that remarks reported by Tehran radio as having been made by PLO chief Yasser Arafat to a delegation from the Iranian foreign ministry led by undersecretary Shaikholeslam, were "bland and reflected no special enthusiasm." This was seen as confirmation that the coolness between

Arafat and the Tehran regime continues and that Arafat made no effort with the visitors to alleviate it. Shaikholeslam and his team visited Syria and Lebanon and Tehran radio has continued to recount his criticism of Saudi Prince Fahd's peace plan, together with attacks on the AWAC sale and on the plan to introduce foreign peace-keeping troops to Sinai. Arafat has publicly welcomed the Fahd peace plan. [Text] [London IRAN PRESS SERVICE in English 5 Nov 81 p 12]

MERCHANTS ARRESTED--At least 15 merchants from the Tehran bazaar have been arrested on charges of having contributed to Mojahedin-e-Khalq funds. But some observers said that evidence suggested they were, in fact, from the nationalist-centrist supporting groups. The government has recently stepped up its campaign against traders in the bazaar, whom it blames for rising prices. [Text] [London IRAN PRESS SERVICE in English 5 Nov 81 p 12]

IRANIAN STUDENTS AVOID RETURN--Perugia, Italy, 6 Nov (AFP)--One hundred sixteen Iranian students have gone on a hunger strike here to press demands for enrollment at Perugia University and thereby avoid return to Iran. The students appealed to Pope John Paul II and Italian President Sandro Pertini for backing "to save their lives." Iranian student leader Firus Valizadeh told the Rome-based daily LA REPUBLICA that the demonstrators would follow the example of Bobby Sands, the first Irish hunger striker to die at Belfast's Maze prison. Several Iranian students began their hunger strike 17 days ago and were already seriously ill, Mr Valizadeh said. The students demanded that Perugia University hold new entrance exams for foreign students unable to sit for sessions already held. [Text] [NC061506 Paris AFP in English 1502 GMT 6 Nov 81]

COMPANIES DEALING WITH IRAN CAUTIONED--Paris, 8 Nov (AFP)--Ex-Iranian President Abolhasan Bani-Sadr today cautioned foreign governments and companies that doing business with Iran's Islamic revolutionary government would be at their own financial and political risk. A statement by the Iranian National Resistance Council (INRC), issued here by Mr Bani-Sadr and Mojahedin leader Mas'ud Rajavi, cited what it termed the "extreme gravity" of Iran's economic situation and monetary reserves, as well as "the growing unification of the democratic opposition forces." The fall of "this anti-people's regime is certain," said the statement. "In the current situation of the petroleum market, purchases of petroleum from the Khomeyni regime or the signing of any commercial contracts are considered political decisions," the statement said. The statement said the Iranian Government's ability to meet contract payments was "highly doubtful" and that the "Iranian people decline any responsibility for financial commitments between the Khomeyni regime and other governments or foreign companies." Mr Bani-Sadr and Mr Rajavi are living in exile in a Paris suburb. [Text] [NC081923 Paris AFP in English 1912 GMT 8 Nov 81]

TEACHERS EXECUTED--Tehran, 8 Nov (AFP)--Three teachers, accused of belonging to the underground left-wing people's Mojahedin organisation, were executed and another 107 Mojahedin were arrested in Tehran during the past month, the newspaper Keyhan reported today. The newspaper gave no dates, but said the three teachers had been found in possession of explosives including thousands of bullets, colt pistols, radios and grenades. Keyhan added that two Mojahedin arms caches had been discovered by revolutionary guards in Tehran, one of which contained plans of the homes of government authorities. In one of the operations, Javad Zargaran, a former candidate in legislative elections in Ahwaz, Khuzistan, had been arrested, it said. Iranian television today announced that 19 persons belonging to, or supporting, the Mojahedin had been shot in Mashhad and Khorasan in northeastern Iran. It gave no dates for the executions. TRIBESMEN RETURN FROM IRAQ--Tehran, 15 Nov (PARS)--A group of armed tribesmen who left Iran for Iraq last year returned to Iran today and were warmly received by the people and Ayatollah Ashrafi Esfahani (the Friday prayers leader of the city of Kermanshah), near the Dalahu front. Upon their arrival, the group of 750 tirbesmen carried a banner of the Islamic Republic of Iran and portraits of Imam Khomeyni, the tribesmen said after having learned of Saddam's crimes against the Islamic Republic of Iran and after they had come to know of the legitimacy of the demands of the Iranian people, they decided to return to Iran. They returned in small groups during the past two weeks giving up their weapons including RPG-7's and Kalashnikovs on their arrival. In a simple ceremony upon their arrival in Dalahu front, the Ayatollah assured them that they were now under the protection of Islam. During the ceremonies the group also sang a solidarity song and declared their readiness to fight against the invading troops alongside the Iranian combatants. A member of the group said that many of the dissident Iranians and counterrevolutionaries who had left Iran in the wake of the Islamic Revolution [words indistinct] generals of the past regime [word indistinct] in Iraq were gradually coming in contact with the realities of life in Iran and [?Iraq that) they were on their way back to the Islamic Republic of Iran. He said that the Ba'thist regime in Iraq provided arms and facilities to (?dissident) Iranians who have fled to Iraq, and encouraged them to fight against the Islamic Republic of Iran. Meanwhile the Fedayeen of Imam Khomeyni have reportedly erected an encampment for the arriving tribesmen near the front. [Text] [LD161052 Tehran PARS in English 1853 GMT 15 Nov 81]

PAPER URGES AGRICULTURAL REFORM PROGRAM--Tehran, 15 Nov (AFP)--Land grants to farmers is the only means of avoiding a rural exodus that is choking cities and threatening the government's plans for agricultural self-sufficiency in Iran, the newspaper Islamic Republic said today. "Tehran now has seven million residents, compared to four million before the revolution," the newspaper reported. "The provincial cities and capitals also have seen their populations swell," it said. "The only solution is to give land to farmers," the newspaper added. "If the farmer has land and is assured that the fruit of his labor will belong to him, he will no longer be tempted to rush to the cities." Islamic Republic, which is the organ of the ruling Islamic Republic party, said this theory could become reality "if the Agrarian reform approved by the revolutionary council were applied without infraction." POLITICAL PRISONERS REPORTED--Tehran, 15 Nov (AFP)--Between 6,000 and 7,000 political prisoners are held in Iran, Islamic revolutionary prosecutor Hojjat Ol-eslam Musavi Tabrizi said today in what was thought to be the first official estimate of detainees since the revolution began in 1979. Hojjat Ol-eslam Tabrizi, speaking at a news conference, said the number of political prisoners amounted to about one third of the number of common-law prisoners. The revolutionary prosecutor also said 90 percent of the members of the leftist people's Mojahedin organization have been arrested. Authorities captured about 30 leaders of the movement last week, he added. [Text] [NC151051 Paris AFP in English 1041 GMT 15 Nov 81]

WHEAT PURCHASES FROM FARMERS--Tehran, 16 Nov (PARS News Agency)--The managing director of Central Organization for Rural Cooperation, Hasan Motavallizadeh, today announced that over 850,000 tons of wheat had been purchased from farmers since the beginning of the year which amount would surpass 1 million tons by the end of the year. Motavallizadeh, speaking to PARS, said that some 3,005 cooperatives existed throughout the country covering 50,459 villages. He added that some of these cooperatives had been merged to establish cooperative associations which had replaced the wholesalers and thus now played an important role in the distribution of agricultural product. So far, he said, 150 cooperative associations had been established out of the merger of 2,947 cooperatives with a total capital of 6,211,865,055 rials. Speaking about loans given by the rural cooperatives, Motavallizadeh said that 50 billion rials in loans had been granted so far, the short-term loans with the cooperation of the agricultural bank and the mid-and the long-term loans directly by the bank itself. He also mentioned that some 80,000 tons of rice had been purchased from rice cultivators and which figure was predicted to reach 300,000 tons by the end of the current year (21 March 1982). FRG CRITICISM PROTESTED--The Iranian ambassador in Bonn, Mehdi Navab, has protested over remarks by the West German Minister of Justice condemning the executions in Iran and the attitude of parents who handed over their children for punishment. The envoy said the Minister had no right to express opinions about these matters. The Australian minister of foreign affairs is also reported to have criticised the human rights situation in Iran. NEW DEPUTY MINISTERS PROFILED

/Article by Yehoshua Bitzur/

/Text/ Aharon Uzan--Deputy Minister of Absorption

We asked MK Aharon Uzan what qualified him for the position of deputy minister of absorption. His firm response: "I was a new immigrant."

He immigrated to Israel from Muknin, Tunisia a year after the establishment of the state. A year later he settled in the cooperative settlement of Gilat near Be'er Sheva where he has lived to this very day with his wife and three children. One of his sons was killed in the War of Attrition.

Uzan, 57, has travelled a complicated and convoluted road. He was first a work steward and then the secretary and treasurer of his settlement. He established the procurement organization of the Negev settlements and their entire network of economic institutions. After his star rose in the settlements movement, in which he became the general secretary, he was taken from the back ranks to the Sixth Knesset. As the representative of the settlements movement, he was appointed the deputy of the then Minister of Agriculture Hayim Gevati, of the kibbutz movement. This was during the Eshkol and Golda Meir governments.

In the Eighth Knesset Uzan was already the minister of agriculture and communications in his own right. He prepared the development plans for the agricultural export. The large export of flowers and vegetables to the countries of Western Europe began in his term of office. In the meantime he was also selected for all the institutions of the Labor Party, and until recently he was a member of its bureau and secretariat.

In recent years he began extensive activity in the World Sephardic Federation, and he was elected its president in Israel. He is a confidant of multimillionaire Nissim Gaon who serves as the world president of this federation.

A "black cat" passed between Aharon Uzan and his associates in the Labor Party, and before the elections to the 10th Knesset, he officially left the party and joined Aharon Abu-Hatzeira in establishing the Tami movement and received a place on its list. At the same time he continued to serve as chairman of the Council of the Settlements Movement and its restricted secretariat.

He has turned over the management of the family household in Gilat to his son, and he will now go to Jerusalem. Let us hope that there will be many "customers" in the Ministry of Absorption.

Yehuda Ben-Meir--Deputy Foreign Minister

[Article by Ilan Kefir]

Deputy Foreign Minister Dr Yehuda Ben-Meir has come to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in one of the most difficult low points in the status of Israel in the world in general and in public opinion in the United States in particular.

As a renowned expert in social psychology, Dr Ben-Meir is likely to make a significant contribution to the explanation of the background of the events which aroused public opinion against Israel. In his new position he will be one of those who set the tone in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and will work alongside Foreign Minister Yitzhaq Shamir and Director General David Kimhi.

The appointment of Ben-Meir to the position of deputy prime minister is a reflection of his growing strength in the NRP as a representative of the Young Turks together with his friend and associate, Minister of Education Zevulun Hammer. For a long time Ben-Meir was regarded as a "rebel" against the political establishment and the veteran leadership of his party. Now he has joined the governmental establishment in a position which is likely to be a springboard for him to a ministerial position.

Dr Yehuda Ben-Meir is 42 and a native of the United States. In his youth he immigrated with his parents to Israel. At the end of his military service he went to study in the United States, receiving his BA at Yeshiva University and his doctorate with distinction in social psychology at the prestigious Columbia University. During this time he married Devora, now the mother of four children.

On his return to Israel he became a research officer in the IDF and afterward a lecturer in psychology and the head of the Psychology Seminar at Bar Ilan University. He became active in the NRP youth groups and was appointed chairman of the Youth Bureau.

In 1971 he was elected for the first time to the Knesset and in 1973 for the second time. He was a member of the Foreign Affairs and Defense Committee until the end of the Ninth Knesset.

Miriam Glazer-Tasa--Deputy Minister of Education

[Article by Yosef Waxman]

"I was suddenly called to the prime minister. I had no idea as to the reason. To my surprise he informed me that I will be appointed the deputy minister of education and culture," related MK Miriam Glazer-Tasa.

She was born in Yemen, immigrated with her parents in 1934, and settled in the Neveh Tsedek development where her grandfather and uncles, who had immigrated 100 years ago, lived. She studied in the girls school in the development and afterward completed the Talpiot gymnasium. She continued her studies in the Levinsky Teachers Seminary in Tel Aviv.

Her studies in the seminary were terminated after a year because the principal decided to expel her because of her activity in the Irgun Tzvai Leumi. "I was on the beach at Kefar Vitkin when the Altalena arrived there. This became known to the principal and he said to me: 'You will not be a teacher in Israel,'" she related. After many years she returned as a teacher in the seminary from which she was expelled.

She began her practical educational work in 1951 when she was offered a job which entailed working in the absorption and education of immigrant children at the Johanna Jabotinsky youth farm in Be'er Ya'akov, an institution which she has been serving to the present as the school principal. Until a few years ago her husband was the director of the entire institution.

MK Miriam Glazer-Tasa received her BA in Bible and history at the Hebrew University and her MA in the United States. She takes most pride in the many students who after completing their studies in the Be'er Ya'akov institution are using vocations which they learned in the institution: jet aircraft mechanics, air force ground equipment personnel, hospital nurses, and settlement members.

Although she was a member of the Herut Movement's Executive, she refused to join the list for the elections to the Ninth Knesset. Before the last election the pressures on her increased, and when she agreed, she was given a real place and a list of Herut candidates for the 10th Knesset.

Pesah Gruper--Deputy Minister of Agriculture

[Article by Aharon Periel]

Deputy Minister of Agriculture Pesah (Pacy) Gruper, 57, has been a farmer and worker of the land since his early youth. At a certain stage in his farming career, he decided to become a communal worker. "If a farmer continues to be a farmer, his mind becomes closed, and I decided that my mind would not be closed," he explained.

Gruper, who was born in the Neveh Tsedek development in Tel Aviv in 1924, began his public career as a member of the 'Atlit Council. Afterward, he became head of the Council, and in this position he established a special record: In his term as head of the Council, he was removed three times, but he defeated his successors four times.

Gruper was elected to the Eighth Knesset, and during the first 2 years, he uncharacteristically did not speak and did not shout, and even the train attendants did not recognize him. During the next 2 years, Gruper worked "like a bulldozer." To his merit it can be said that while he was one of the heads of the farm lobby in the Knesset, he worked on many farming and settlement issues without party bias even though he represents private farming.

He uses colorful and sharp language, and even in public he does not always restrain his language. His conduct is unruly, and he frequently tells stories laced with jokes. Gruper creates a "presence," and it is impossible to ignore him, for better or for worse.

On his appointment as deputy minister of agriculture, Gruper said: "this has been my ambition every year. I will give my soul to farming and the farmers. There is so much to do that I wish they would give me another day during the 24 hours."

As a farmer in 'Atlit, Gruper is now growing wine grapes, field crops, and fruits. He is married, the father of three children, and is active in public institutions and various farm organizations beside his current activity as a member of Knesset and as chairman of the Agricultural Department of the Likud.

Mikhael Deqel--Deputy Minister of Agriculture

[Article by Aharon Periel]

Deputy Minister of Agriculture Mikhael Deqel, who will be in charge of settlement matters, went through many "cycles" until he received this appointment.

Deqel (formerly Dikesel), 55, a member of the Nordiya settlement, was born in Pinsk and received a religious education in his childhood. He joined the Betar Movement in his native city, and in this way acquired a national Zionist awareness.

During World War II he was exiled with his family to Siberia, and in the forests of the north he was employed as a woodcutter until he was conscripted at the age of 17 into the Red Army.

After World War II he underwent farm training in Poland, and he worked there in the smuggling of Jews into the Land of Israel and in the publication of an underground newspaper called TEGER. He was one of the organizers of the voyage of the Altalena.

In 1949 he immigrated to Israel without an education and without a vocation. He joined the collective settlement Nordiya. During the course of the years he acquired a higher education and even completed his studies at Tel Aviv University with an MA in political science.

Deqel was elected to the Ninth Knesset as a member of the Likud. He was active in the Ninth Knesset in agricultural and social issues. He serves as a member of the leadership of the Herut Movement and as chairman of the Organization Branch in the movement.

Deqel now faces a great challenge: to cope with the settlement problem, the distress of the workers collective settlements, and the new settlements on the other side of the green line. In early 1980 Deqel called for the end of the establishment of new farming settlements and the establishment only of industrial settlements because hundreds of workers settlements are now in financial and organizational distress. The question is if he will continue to advocate this policy in his new position.

Hayim Drukman--Deputy Minister of Religious Affairs

[Article by Yehoshua Bitzur]

The direction of the Ministry of Religious Affairs in practice will now be entrusted to a Torah personality who is regarded as one of the outstanding leaders of the knitted skullcap generation of which national-religious Jewry is proud. MK Rabbi Hayim Drukman is a Yeshiva teacher in Merkaz Shapira in the south and is regarded as one of the teachers of the youth of the Hesder Yeshivas [a religious school in which the students spend part of their time in study and part of their time in military service].

Despite his patriarchal appearance, he is only about 48, but he has already managed to acquire a reputation as an educator and one who decides questions of halakah. He was born in Poland and immigrated to Israel at the height of World War II. After arriving in Israel he studied Torah in the Merkaz Harav Yeshiva in Jerusalem which is the hotbed of the Gush Emunim youth and the religious group which advocates the completeness of the Land of Israel. His wife is a physician, and they have nine children.

He is a brilliant representative of the national trend emphasized in the NRP. In this respect he is much more to the right than the activist party youth.

Rabbi Drukman was called to the political arena in 1977 elections, and he was given second place on the list. For the party he was a showcase of a spiritual image. However, he soon was revealed as a rigid political force who stubbornly maintains his hawkish and extremist views. When the NRP appeared to him to be too dovish, he considered leaving it in order to join the Tehiyah Movement.

Also before the last elections, he threatened to leave and form an independent list if the hawkish representation was not increased in the NRP list. They eventually reached a compromise with him. The NRP house is in a dilapidated condition, but the party has not abandoned any positions and perhaps has added to them here and there. In this way Rabbi Drukman also succeeded in gaining a position of authority.

Ben-Tzion Rubin--Deputy Minister of Labor and Social Betterment

[Article by Yehoshua Bitzur]

MK Ben-Tzion Rubin has been a witness to the vicissitudes of political fate. When the results of the election became known after the closing of the polls, everyone thought that he was on the "outside." It turned out that he was on the "inside" and very "strong"--the deputy minister of labor and social betterment.

MK Rubin, 42, was born in Tripoli, Libya and immigrated to Israel in 1949. He is married, the father of four children, and lives in Netanya where he served as deputy mayor from the NRP. When he was elected to the previous Knesset, not much was heard about him. He was a representative of the Lamifne faction where Dr Burg overshadowed everyone.

Ben-Tzion Rubin began to stand out precisely at the end of the Ninth Knesset when he became the "chief of staff" for Minister of Religious Affairs Aharon Abu-Hatzeira in the internal struggles of the NRP and in the minister's legal battles. For this reason he was not given a safe place in the NRP list for the 10th Knesset. It was only natural that he left the NRP together with Abu-Hatzeira and established with him the Tami Movement. It was only toward the end of counting the votes that it became evident that Tami had won a third seat, and Rubin returned to the Knesset.

In the exhaustive coalition negotiations in which the prices went up continuously, Tami succeeded in obtaining senior positions for three members of the faction. In this way Ben-Tzion Rubin also gained a piece of authority. This understandably did not arouse much enthusiasm among the former NRP associates.

Moshe Katzav--Deputy Minister in Charge of the Residential Developments Project

[Article by Ezra Yanuv]

Moshe Katzav, deputy minister for the rehabilitation of residential developments, was at one time the youngest head of a council in the country when in 1969 he was elected to this position in Qiryat Mal'akhi. Katzav, a native of Iran, is 35 years old, a member of Knesset for his second term and the head of this council for about 10 years.

He immigrated to Israel at the age of 6, the oldest in a family of eight boys and girls, all of whom like him are living in the development town of Qiryat Mal'akhi. The family first lived in the transient camp of Kefar Ahim (Qastina). He is married and the father of five children.

There is a strong connection between Katzav's life story and the history of Qiryat Mal'akhi. He changed himself and he changed the place, and there is no dispute on this. It is remembered when the dark-eyed and black-haired youth, who still had not completed his studies as a student of the Hebrew University in Jerusalem in economics and history, was a writer for the HERUT newspaper and led the small Herut faction which was set up in the Mapai development town. The chairman of the Herut students cell in Jerusalem was known in the town of his residence for his smile and his readiness to lend a helping hand to everyone who came to him. He has always had an attentive ear. As a quiet person who does not lash out verbally, he did not create enemies even when he defeated the Mapai in the town.

In 1970 at the age of 25, he was already active in the high-ranking institutions of the Herut Movement, the leadership, and the secretariat, and, together with Ezer Weizman and Judge Binyamin Halevi, he was added to the executive of the movement in a special position. His election to the Knesset in 1977 was taken for granted, and even this time it was not in doubt. In the previous Knesset he was a member of the Interior Committee and the Education Committee, he was a member of the delegation to the European Parliament in Strasbourg, was invited by the American government to the United States as a guest of the State Department, and it was only natural that before Khomeini took power in Iran that he was sent by the Jewish Agency to persuade the Jews of Iran to come to Israel.

He is a member of the Board of Trustees of Ben-Gurion University in the Negev and the chairman of the umbrella organization of native Iranians in Israel. In anticipation of his appointment as deputy minister for residential development, he announced that he would resign as head of the council of Qiryat Mal'akhi. Of the nine members of the council of Qiryat Mal'akhi, six are from his faction, the Likud. The administration is stable and the development continues. His deputy Y. Vanuno will serve as head of council. Now Katzav will work as the righthand man for Minister David Levi. Katzav says: "I will devote myself to the rehabilitation of the residential developments. This is an extremely important matter. As one who grew up in a residential development town, I will know how to act."

Dov Shilanski--Deputy Minister in the Office of the Prime Minister

[Article by Yehoshua Bitzur]

He is the "diligent one" of the Knesset. MK Dov Shilanski has spent more hours during a 24-hour period in the Knesset building than anyone else. This diligence was certainly one of the factors which motivated Prime Minister Menahem Begin to decide to appoint him deputy minister in the Office of the Prime Minister, and he will work primarily in coordinating actions between the government and the Knesset.

Dov Shilanski, 57, married and the father of two children, is a survivor of the Holocaust and the concentration camps. He is one of the last survivors who are stringent to this very day about not maintaining any contact with Germany or its representatives. He has written a novel called "Musselman" [a term applied to concentration camp inmates who had lost all hope of survival and waited for death] on the Holocaust, which has been translated into English.

Shilanski immigrated to Israel at the time of the establishment of the state, and in its early years, he was a member of extremist groups until he was imprisoned for illegal activity against the reparations agreement with Germany. Since then he has been very active for prison inmates. He wrote a book "Bakeleh Ha'ivri" [In a Jewish Prison], the diary of a political prisoner. Afterwards he studied law in the Tel Aviv branch of the Hebrew University and opened a law office.

He was first elected to the previous Knesset and was noted for his tireless parliamentary work on the Constitution, Law, and Justice Committee and the Interior Committee. He introduced many draft laws and worked hard for the common people who came to him for assistance. Shilanski is one of the activists in the Herut Movement; however he has always remained faithful to Menahem Begin even when he disagreed with is withdrawal policy in the Sinai. It is for this reason that he has now earned an appropriate reciprocation. He was very surprised when he was elected in the Herut executive to be among the movement's first seven candidates for the Knesset. This was the springboard which elevated him to the position of deputy minister.

David Shiffman--Deputy Minister of Transport

[Article by Avraham Rotem]

Deputy Minister of Transport David Shiffman is also deputy mayor of Tel Aviv, and the chairman of the board of directors of Elon Lines. He was also chairman of the board of directors of the Electric Company until he resigned last month from this position before his election to the Knesset. In the Liberal Party he was chairman of the executive and in the past, he was chairman of the Tel Aviv branch.

In 1973 when the Likud won the mayoralty, Shiffman was appointed to be the deputy of Shlomo Lahat. He carried out major development projects in traffic and construction which came under his supervision as chief of the Engineering Administration and the Municipal Traffic Branch. In this way he accrued considerable experience in everything connected with problems of traffic and transport. At one time he served in the military police, and he was released in 1954 with the rank of major.

David Shiffman, 57, and his twin brother Mordekhai (an advertising and public relations man) are married to two twin sisters. He has three grandchildren from his two daughters.

He studied at the Teachers Seminary in Jerusalem, and he was one of the first graduates of the Bnai Akiva yeshiva in Kefar Haro'e.

Shiffman, a member of a religious family in Poland, immigrated to Israel when he was 6 months old, and he grew up in Kefar Hasidim. His father, a member of Hapo'el Hamizrahi, was one of the settlement's founders. Shiffman is an observant Jew to this very day, he prays, does not ride on the Sabbath, and observes the dietary laws, even though he removed the skull cap after his military service.

He began his public activity as chairman of the Merchants Association in Tel Aviv while he was the owner of a furniture and hospital equipment supply company.

Shiffman believes that one of the main courses of action in the campaign against traffic accidents is the improvement of the road base. In this direction he has also worked in Tel Aviv for widening the roads and building bridges, elite roads, expressways, subterranean crossovers, and a system of computer-controlled traffic lights.

He is proud of the rebuilding of Dizengoff Square. In his new position he will possibly be able to complete the new central station in Tel Aviv and the expressway along the Elon River. In defense matters he is a hawk.

IMPACT OF KNESSET FINANCE COMMITTEE ASSESSED

Tel Aviv HA'ARETZ in Hebrew 6 Sep 81 p 9

[Article by Eliezer Levene: "The Melamed Interception"]

[Text] The most important man today, and apparently for the foreseeable future, in Israeli economics and politics is MK Avraham Melamed of the NRP. Anyone who thinks that the fate and future of the present government is in the hands of one minister or another, or in the hands of the party leaders, is wrong. Melamed walks about the corridors of the Knesset with a playful look on his face, and he has reason to be happy.

The balance of forces which led to the last elections dictated, more or less, a balance of forces in the Knesset committees. But while the discussions and resolutions of 9 of the 10 committees are purely academic in significance, the finance committee's work is the bottom line. Hundreds of laws, both primary and secondary, require the approval of this committee. Without its approval, the state budget has no force, not to mention changes in the tax rates, the appointment of the state comptroller, approval of loans to failing industries, etc.

There are 21 seats on the Knesset finance committee: MK Shlomo Lorentz, of Agudat Yisrael, who has been reselected as chairman; MK Avraham Shapira, of Agudat Yisrael, an important industrialist; and MK Eliezer Avitavi, of the NRP.

But while these three members, acting on behalf of Likud, will apparently act as good boys (after all Likud can always recall their positions), this is not the case regarding the representative by right, and not by grace, of the NRP--Avraham Melamed. He is already known as the "bad boy" of the coalition. More than once he has voted against the position of the government, or at least has abstained, in the Finance Committee. The rules of coalition discipline are less rigid than those of the Knesset. In fact, neither the faction nor the coalition leadership can do anything to a Knesset member who challenges them. Even the traditional sanction of replacing the objectionable member of Knesset would not be appropriate today for the NRP, because there is simply no one to replace him with. Of six Knesset members, two are ministers (Burg and Hammer), two are deputy ministers (Drukman and Ben-Meir), and one is of course a member of the finance committee (Avitavi). Melamed can therefore do what he wants and vote according to his conscience and according to his economic philosophy, without worrying about political considerations. His position is secure, and no one can hurt him.

In the balance of power of 10 against 10, Melamed's vote is decisive. It is no wonder that Likud, which remembers the troubles which Melamed brought on it in the last session, demanded a majority of two in the committee, so as not to depend on Melamed's vote. Members of the Alignment, who understood well which way the wind was blowing, demanded the appointment of their senior representative (Adi Amorai) to the regular acting position of committee chairman. It is said that the real intention was not to gain the appointment, but to foil Likud's intentions in the numbers game. So, after exhausting negotiations, both sides gave up their demands: the Alignment gave up its demand for the chairman, and Likud was forced to give up its demand for a majority of two. Thus Melamed returned and fortified his position as the decisive man on the committee--to the open joy of the Alignment people.

The committee had just convened when MK Melamed fired his first warning shots. The coalition did not have a majority to raise auto insurance rates starting on 1 September. Not that the Alignment and Melamed are opposed to a rise, but it was a warning shot. The coalition also ran into problems in raising the electricity rates, and in raising communications tariffs. And this is only the beginning.

The Likud made another tactical error: the Alignment people carefully appointed acting committee members to sit in their absence from the country. So, for example, it was decided that MK Micah Kharish would replace Amorai, who is going on a 10-day mission to Europe. For each member there is a permanent substitute, so that the Alignment can always make a full appearance. The Likud coordinator on the committee, Yigael Kohen-Orgad, is less experienced than his Alignment colleagues, and has not yet appointed substitutes. So, the coalition may discover in the near future that it cannot get through the committee the necessary resolutions for the implementation of the economic program of the government. Today, the Likud people prefer not to think about what will happen in February and March when the time comes to discuss the state budget, without which there can be no government.

FUTURE OF HERUT LEADERSHIP DISCUSSED

Tel Aviv HA'ARETZ in Hebrew 27 Sep 81 p 9

[Article by Amnon Barzilai: "The Victory Which Paralyzed Herut"]

[Text] Two weeks ago Ezer Weitzman made a telephone call to Arye Karmer, the new chairman of the Tel Aviv area secretariat of Herut. "I want to turn in my membership card," Weitzman said to Karmer, but Karmer responded negatively: "You are not leaving the movement. Your activity in the Herut movement has only been temporarily suspended. You do not have to turn in your membership card." This short conversation which took place a few days before Weitzman's departure to the United States ended on Weitzman's note that when he returned, the "matter would be closed."

But Weitzman's shadow, which a year and a half ago spread from his tenure as defense minister, and which cut off his links with the Herut movement, continues to hover at Metsudat-Ze'ev. New persons have moved up to the head of the movement's list. New deployments have developed within the Herut faction in the Knesset and in the party center. The pressure cooker of the Herut movement is filled to the bursting point, with potential camps, factions, and forces having contradictory goals and interests. As long as the movement leader Menahem Begin continues to hold the reins of the government and the movement, his movement will continue "to stew in its own juices."

As more than 4 years ago, now too the power brokers at Metsudat Ze'ev are searching to get a handle on the health condition of the prime minister. This activity, which is not open and about which people do not talk, is being carried out on "a small burner," in anticipation of the unavoidable moment when Begin will announce his departure from political life. Then, the lid will be blown off the pressure cooker, and the forces within will break out to deploy for the decisive battle between them.

It is generally accepted at Metsudat Ze'ev that three people brought victory to the Likud. Begin, who assembled hundreds of thousands of voters in large city parks, and who succeeded in inflaming the masses to return to the rock from which they were hewn; Yoram Aridor, who succeeded in dictating an economic policy which served his party in the elections; and Ariel Sharon, who in the "We Are on the Map" campaign showed to the hundreds of thousands of citizens who were brought to the West Bank that the Likud had established dozens of settlements in Judea and Samaria. Another person who indirectly influenced the success of the Likud was David Levy, who took on the slogans of the "strong man" in the Histadrut elections.

But except for agreement regarding the position of Menahem Begin, which is authoritative and extraordinary, no one in the Herut movement today is able to point to the person who will inherit the leader--whether it will be one of those mentioned above, or someone else. In spite of the years and the approach of the "target date" which was set by Begin, no one can figure out who will step into Begin's shoes. And the movement chairman has given no sign of his intention to say who will be the man that he prefers....

And so, 3 months after the election victory, and the personal achievements in which some can take pride, it seems as though the population of the upper echelons of Herut has expanded. In the absence of one prominent leader who can replace Begin, there is a line of people, most of whom apparently long to inherit Begin. The heir who seems right for the moment, is one of the following--not necessarily in this order: Ya'aqov Meridor, Yitshaq Shamir, Ariel Sharon, Yoram Aridor, David Levy, Moshe Arens. Developments of the past week in Tel Aviv have added additional names to the picture. In spite of Weitzman's telephone call, changes in the movement's leadership in Tel Aviv point to the possibility that in the future the ground may be prepared for Weitzman's return to the leadership of Herut.

This past week 5 years came to an end during which Prof Moshe Arens "ruled" the Tel Aviv region of the Herut movement. Arens reached this position after the fall of Yosef Kramerman, one of the sacrifices of the Talkhi fund affair. But Arens did not extract the political advantages of his new position. Prof Arens, who gained a reputation for himself as the chairman of the Knesset Committee on Foreign and Defense Affairs, did not exploit the political position which he had won. His hawkish group, which includes MK's Yigael Kohen-Orgad, David Stern, and Yosef Rom, which viewed Weitzman and the Camp David agreements as a serious danger, did not succeed in building itself as a significant political power.

With the departure of Prof Arens from the leadership of the Tel Aviv region, Ya'aqov Meridor won the title of Minister of Economic Affairs. Or-Gad, who was afraid to confront him, won the consolation prize--"acting chairman of the region." But the series of people who reached the upper echelons of the region included the following names: Karmer--chairman of the secretariat; Eytan Grifal--chairman of the directors. The presidium of the Tel Aviv region includes the following: Meridor, Arens, Kramerman, Aridor, MK Micah Reiser, Mikhael Kleiner, and MK Eytan Livni. The common denominator of all of them, except for Arens and Livni, is the sentiment for Ezer Weitzman.

The victory of Likud at the polls to some extent upset the processes, and perhaps even decelerated them. Failure at the polls could have accelerated the departure of Begin, and it certainly would have influenced activity at the party center. Today, the institutions of the party are somewhat paralyzed. Yoram Aridor still holds the title of chairman of the secretariat (parallel to the secretary general of the Labor Party), which he won before being appointed finance minister.

It is doubtful whether Aridor will be able to act effectively in his political role. Intra-party struggles have shown that there is a great mutual neutralization. Except for the appointment of ministers, an authority which is exclusively in the hands of Begin, even the "heir" will be unable to achieve by himself in the party. One of the struggles in the Herut Knesset faction was over the leadership of the Knesset Committee between MK's Eytan Livni and Roni Milo. Ministers

Shamir and Levy worked on behalf of Milo. Arik Sharon, Meridor, Arens, and Aridor established a momentary front in support of Livni, who won the post. In particular, Yitshaq Shamir and Roni Milo worked on behalf of the appointment of David Levy as deputy prime minister, to placate him after he was removed from the Ministry of Absorption. The rest of the ministers were more or less apathetic to the fate of their colleagues.

The position of David Levy--whose title of deputy prime minister had not yet been confirmed by the Knesset--is not clear to all members of the party. He was strong when he was in the "blue-white" faction in the Histadrut. He himself determined who would be the Herut candidates for the executive committee of the Histadrut. David Levy also apparently improved his public position when he compared himself to those Knesset candidates who were of Oriental origin, who had been proposed by the Alignment. David Levy was and remains the authentic leader, who grew naturally and achieved a key position in his party. But the man at the center of the party, who has a large army of soldiers, remains without support in the Knesset faction. Among the 24 Herut members of Knesset, there is not one who is considered David Levy's "man." MK Reiser said that in the internal elections for the Knesset list, "David Levy did not deliver the goods," and he did not work on his behalf. Reiser, David Levy's only man in the Knesset, joined forces with Yoram Aridor.

But the real danger for David Levy is coming from the development towns. Two new MK's--David Magen from Kiryat Gat and Meir Shitrit from Yavne--are hot on the heels of David Levy. At this point they are not threatening his position. But the appearance of other ethnics at high positions on the list casts a shadow on the future of David Levy, not because of their origin but because of their great similarity to David Levy. They, like him (as well as Deputy Minister Moshe Ketsev), are authentic products of the development towns in which they grew up. Magen, Shitrit, and Ketsev prove to all that David Levy is not one of a kind. The advantage which he enjoys over them today stems from his organized political power within the party. His problem is that these are three ambitious men of the younger generation, having formal academic training (Magen is also a senior officer in the IDF).

Another man whose position was weakened was Ya'aqov Meridor. Before the elections he was mentioned as a possible "heir." His announcements of his discovery of means of producing or conserving energy made him appear unreliable in his party. Also his appointment of Foreign Minister Yitshaq Shamir are somewhat in decline, especially because of Ariel Sharon, who is getting stronger in the movement as defense minister. Since the election he has not served as a member of the Shlomtzion movement. After the May 1977 elections, Sharon was concerned with manning positions with activists from his faction. This time, people in the Herut movement are convinced that Sharon has done his homework, and will not discriminate against Herut activists. The Arens group would apparently prefer the candidacy of Sharon over the candidacy of Meridor or Shamir, if there is a war of succession. This is especially because of his ideological background and hawkish stance.

These deployments have proven themselves for the time being in the small power struggles within and without the Knesset. A member of the Herut movement is not ready to risk prophesying how the forces will come down at the hour of test, when it will be necessary to choose the "heir."

SINAI INTERNATIONAL FORCE SEEN AS NO GUARANTEE OF PEACE WITH EGYPT

Tel Aviv DAVAR in Hebrew 31 Jul 81 p 14

[Article by Mota Gur: "New International Brigade; International Force Alone Will Not Insure Peace With Egypt"]

[Text] The Knesset this week approved the procedure for forming the international force in the Sinai and its operation. The new international brigade will comprise 2,500 soldiers, about half of them Americans.

The Egyptian army has hundreds of thousands of soldiers, equipped with both Russian and Western advanced weapon systems for air, land and sea; the might of the IDF is also well known. So it is no surprise if one concludes that the international force has no military value whatsoever if one of the parties--Israel or Egypt--decides, for its own reasons, to activate its forces toward or inside the Sinai.

The insignificance of this force becomes obvious in the recent shootings on the Lebanese border, which took place despite the presence of several thousand UN troops. On the other hand, if a political-military agreement between Israel and Syria had been signed in 1976, when Syria entered Lebanon, or in 1978, after the Litani operation, the northern border could have been kept calm with a much smaller force or even without one. The power of any international force, then, depends on the willingness of the main parties to honor their agreement and not use military force to solve their problems.

The prime minister and his colleagues are mistaken, and they mislead the public, when they present the peace treaty with Egypt as the sole basis for our ability to act in the north without mobilizing the reserves. During the decade following the Suez War, from 1956 to 1967, the Egyptian border was completely quiet. Despite campaigns and air battles between us and our neighbors to the east, and despite the fact that we did not have a peace treaty with Egypt, Egyptian President Gamal Abd al-Nasir did not use force. The IDF did not mobilize its units and was free to act. Also, in the years 1970-73 the IDF acted against the Syrians and against the terrorists in Syria and Lebanon without beefing up its forces in the south against possible Egyptian reaction.

These facts do not detract from the importance of the peace treaty with Egypt. On the contrary, they indicate that it is not an international force, but rather an Egyptian decision to respect the agreement and not sacrifice it in case of hostilities between Israel and its other neighbors, that will prevent Egyptian action against us. Such Egyptian behavior will persist for a long time given two conditions: the continuation of the peace process and the preservation of our military might, both in conventional terms and in keeping with the coming nuclear age.

The American presence undoubtedly adds political weight to the presence of the international force, but its importance should not be overrated. Legally, if the Egyptians annul the peace treaty, the international force will also be annulled. Politically and militarily, we have seen in the past that the United States is not interested in getting implicated in foreign wars, and one should not assume that it will instruct its 1,000 soldiers in the Sinai to resist either an Egyptian or Israeli takeover of the Sinai.

Can this American presence serve as a guarantee for peace in the Middle East just as the presence of 300,000 American soldiers in Europe serves as a guarantee for Western Europe against Soviet threat? Such an analogy is misleading in more ways than one, especially since the Americans are in an adversary relation with the Soviets, while in the Sinai they are mediators who want to please both sides.

Just as during the years 1948-56 our Arab neighbors talked about a "second round" against Israel, and just as in 1956-67 Egyptian President Nasir talked about war against Israel, when the time is right and the preparations are completed, there will be voices heard in Egypt, from the government as well as the opposition, to the effect that there cannot be real and full peace with Israel until Israel withdraws to the 1967 borders and political independence is given to the Palestinian Arabs. The Egyptians continue to refuse to give their peace treaty with us precedence over inter-Arab defense treaties, and they have not gone back on their word during the peace negotiations, namely, that in their eyes a war by any Arab state to regain its occupied lands is justified and justifies their own direct military intervention. Even if Egypt does not engage in any hostilities toward us for a long time, which I believe will be the case, we cannot lie beneath our vines and fig trees and rely on American guarantees and an international force.

On the other hand, we can insure the peace by keeping Egypt on the side of negotiations rather than confrontation and by keeping the United States on our side in helping us build our military and economic might without getting it into too much trouble with its Arab allies.

This calls for a patient and responsible policy that is carefully weighed and not ruled by rash decisions and passing fancies. We must study in depth all the lessons of Camp David and the formation of the international force in order to build a firm foundation for the future and avoid unexpected traumas.

STRATEGIC STUDY PROPOSES DIRECT CONTACTS WITH SAUDI ARABIA

Tel Aviv YEDI'OT AHARONOT in Hebrew 14 Aug 81 Weekend Supplement p 2

[Article by Eli'ezer Strauch: "What Was Neglected in Our Policy Vis-a-Vis Saudi Arabia? Israel Is Not Prepared to Deal With the Sophisticated Saudi System of International Relations; Our Policymakers Are Yet To Be Convinced Saudi Arabia Is Becoming Dominant Factor in Our Region; Tel Aviv University Center for Strategic Studies Produces Comprehensive Study on Subject; Study's Author, Uzi Arad, Proposes Direct Talks With Saudis; Is Rejection of Saudi Peace Plan Without Making Counter-offer for Talks Without Preconditions a Missed Opportunity for Such Talks?"]

[Text] What is Saudi Arabia? It is a family of princes who control oil, desert and slaves.

This derogatory definition, which was recently voiced by Prime Minister Menachem Begin, seems to sum up past and present Israeli public statements vis-a-vis the growing influence of the desert kingdom in the international arena.

It appears that the more we detract from Saudi Arabia's importance in the hope of influencing at least public opinion if not policymakers in the United States and in the West, the more successful the Saudi princes are in the propaganda war. Clearly, by making a so-called peace proposal, which according to some was meant to be rejected by Israel, Prince Fahd was able to force us to take a stand that is frowned on in the West while putting him in a favorable light, at a time when U.S. policy in the region is being formulated, especially in relation to the sale of AWACS and other sophisticated weapons to the Saudis.

In any case, it is clear that in addition to the Saudi advantage of controlling the world economy through oil and the investment of surplus petrodollars, they also benefit from the good advice of top consultants whom they hire from the ranks of veteran U.S. foreign service and intelligence personnel and their colleagues from other Western countries.

Suffice it to mention only a small part of this well-oiled, mystery-shrouded battery of consultants, as revealed last September in the weekly EIGHT DAYS (published in London with funds from Persian Gulf oil emirates). According to this report, a private intelligence agency was set up in 1978 under the guise of an international consulting firm named GISE (Group for International Study and Evaluation), which serves no other customers except the Saudi court. Through this agency, the Saudis can elicit the services of American experts who avoid registering as foreign agents as required by U.S. law.

Our Information Deficiency

The most outstanding consultant working for this agency (whose fees often total $60,000 per year) is veteran diplomat Robert Ellsworth, former U.S. ambassador to NATO, who lives in Washington and has good government connections.

Other consultants are John Gunther, former director of the Middle East division of the International Monetary Fund, and Marjorie Dean, editor of the financial report of the weekly ECONOMIST. Many veteran CIA people also help the Saudis through this agency.

In any case, it seems that Israel is not prepared to deal with the sophisticated Saudi operation in the international arena, for the simple reason that our foreign policymakers are yet to be convinced that Saudi Arabia is becoming a more and more dominant factor in our region that must be dealt with in a more sophisticated way.

Our deficiency in this area is underlined by a study commissioned by the Tel Aviv University Center for Strategic Studies. The author, Dr Uzi Arad, a Middle East scholar, writes: "Israel's policy vis-a-vis Saudi Arabia has thus far failed, not because of what was done but because of what was neglected. The grimmest fact is that no comprehensive action has been initiated--nor has there been any public or strategic discussion of such action--to stop the Saudi advance toward a position of all-out confrontation."

The report based on the findings of this study was written 2 years ago, but there has not been any substantive change since then.

What, then, has been neglected in the Israeli policy vis-a-vis Saudi Arabia? The author writes: "Israeli analyses of developments in the region fail to deal with Saudi Arabia as a source of an independent policy, a country with its own political ambitions, an active factor, rather than a mere influence on Egypt, Syria, or the Palestinians, which contradicts the Saudi image in the West."

The study points out the weakness of Israeli information directed to the West, which is based on the argument that there is no connection between the Arab-Israeli conflict and oil. This argument is unacceptable in the West. Moreover, it has often caused Israeli information sources to sound contradictory. They have tried to present the Arab oil countries as a paper tiger in order to downgrade their image, and at the same time they decried Arab blackmail and the danger of Arab military power. The study considers it a gross error to look down on the Saudis and to engage in wishful thinking about internal security problems in the desert kingdom. This, according to the author, diverts attention from the main problem and prevents Israel from obtaining an accurate and balanced assessment of the growing strength of Saudi Arabia in the region, which may be the most revolutionary development in the area over the past decade.

The study indicates that attempts at direct talks between Israel and Saudi Arabia--if indeed there have been any, as reported in the world press--have been unsuccessful. Events show a slow yet dangerous process of deterioration in Israeli-Saudi relations.

Dr Arad notes the implications of this process of deterioration for our relations with the United States. He reminds us that back in 1968 Israel maneuvered itself into a crossfire when it objected to a package deal for selling American weapons to Saudi Arabia, Egypt and Israel.

During that confrontation, Israel and Saudi Arabia stood on opposite sides of the fence. Israel lost out. It suffered a defeat in Congress, a traditional friend of Israel. It also experienced a decline in the influence of the "Jewish lobby." The lesson, according to the author, was clear: "It was a most serious mistake to force the United States to decide between its interest in Israel and in Saudi Arabia."

The author foresees many dangers, both political and military, in Saudi Arabia becoming a confrontation state vis-a-vis Israel. Despite rash statements by Israeli political and military leaders, Saudi Arabia has yet to become a full-fledged confrontation state, since it still has its own motives and goals, which override the Arab-Israeli conflict on its strategic agenda.

Dr Arad maintains that Israel's foremost strategic objective vis-a-vis Saudi Arabia should be to prevent Saudi Arabia from becoming a threat to Israel, despite its growing strength in the region and in the world. He adds that this cannot be guaranteed, but it certainly has to be worked on.

Opposing Normalization

What is needed? The author is not against an Israeli information effort in regard to Saudi Arabia but favors it only as a secondary step, designed to create an option for normalization, which will bring an end to hostile propaganda.

The author advocates direct talks with the Saudis by identifying mutual interests that will help the Saudis understand the Israelis. But he cautions against unrealistic expectations, such as an alliance of pro-Western nations, in keeping with the saying, best is the enemy of good.

In any case, the question remains--did we miss an important opportunity for direct talks with the Saudis, which are at least as much in our interest as in anyone else's, by failing to come up with a counteroffer to Fahd's peace plan, namely, for talks without preconditions?

CONTROLLING GOLAN HEIGHTS TERMED NECESSARY TO COUNTRY'S SECURITY

Tel Aviv MA'ARAKHOT in Hebrew No 279-280, May-Jun 81 pp 55-56

[Article by Colonel Eli: "Military and Security Significance of Golan"]

[Text] Golan Heights--Vital Area

A "vital area" in military terms is an area the control of which is necessary for a military operation. In this respect, the Golan Heights are extremely vital, from both the national-strategic and tactical point of view, since the topography of the area--an elevation that controls both east and west--makes it imperative to keep it for both defensive and offensive purposes.

Advanced Technology Versus Topography

Those who deal with security from a general perspective sometimes underestimate the controlling topography. They point to impressive technological advances that can "help hit a target anywhere by pressing a button." There is no greater mistake. Now, more than ever before, one can close technological gaps by buying weapons, which are sold to the highest bidder. Military advantage is put into effect by correct use of means, especially proper topographical maneuvering. The new technological and electronic devices can help reach distant targets, but the main limitation is the visibility of the target. Hence, there is no substitute for topography when it comes to observation and fire control.

Topography As Military Component

Forces and land are not interchangeable. They complement each other in building might. The IDF fights as an army of the few against the many and does not have the luxury of not making use of all the components of the battlefield, which go beyond the ratio of forces. The experience of the Yom Kippur War showed that a small force that was positioned at Har Hermonit prevented a Syrian breakthrough and turned the area into a slaughterhouse. One must not detract from the bravery of the soldiers, yet the topography and the superiority of the terrain enabled the Israeli soldier to be at his best.

Disproportion Between Relinquishing Territory and Control

From a military standpoint, it is extremely difficult to accept any territorial compromise in the Golan Heights, since the military significance of giving up

2 percent of the land means giving up 100 percent of control. The importance of a vital area is seen in a mound, hilltop or mountaintop. Giving up a few square yards can mean total relinquishment of military control. Since the IDF is deployed in a minimal defense line, any concession, even the smallest, diminishes its military capability.

To Prevent Surprise Attack and Increase Alert

To prevent a tactical surprise, it is necessary to face the Syrians in a state of constant alert, monitoring their every move. There are indeed many electronic means one can use for warning purposes, but there is no substitute for conventional ground observation. Advanced radar and electronic observation and listening devices work better when there is a line of sight between the observation post and the target. One could substitute satellites and aircraft, but their cost is high and they are limited in terms of the weight of equipment they can carry, anti-aircraft protection, and so on. Even superpowers like the United States and the Soviet Union strive to control ground as close as possible to the battleground in order to place warning devices.

Keeping IDF forces on the ridges gives them a dual advantage. It enables them to maintain a warning system, and it gives them a firm base to prevent surprise attack. It not only gives them the upperhand but also makes it hard for the Syrians to obtain information and to have westward fire control.

The following topographic examples clearly show the significance of observation and two-way control.

Put in Neutral and Go

Even experienced armies find it hard to seal off their borders in the face of a surprise attack, at least in the early stages. The Syrians may go after limited objectives at the start of the war to gain territory. By sending large forces along several axes, they may be able to advance westward.

Strategic depth, albeit limited, enables one to mount a counterattack. By leaving the present line, the IDF would enable the Syrians to advance toward the axes going down the western slopes, where they can go down in neutral. During the Yom Kippur War, the Syrian forces were able to advance and come down the axes, despite the strategic depth, but it is doubtful whether the IDF could have fought back, stopped the enemy and push on eastward if it had not controlled the present line.

Defense Problems

There are two basic prerequisites for defending an area: the stopping line (that line which is determined by the defender as necessary for defending the area) is located behind the front line and controls the area, and the front line, which is also a stopping line so that the battle for defending the area takes place in enemy territory.

The Golan is too narrow to launch a strategic-depth battle, which limits the maneuverability of the reserves in the area between the purple line, or the ridges, and the starting point of the axes going down to the Hula and Jordan valleys. Yet this area still permits the concentration of forces and their movement from one axis to another in the battleground, provided armored forces are engaging the enemy and stop its westward advance.

With the Syrians controlling the ridges, this is not possible.

Upper Galillee, Unthreatened

A look at this sector shows that from the slopes of the Golan Heights the settlements in the Hula Valley are within downward firing range.

Any Syrian presence in Lebanon puts the area under the threat of encirclement, both in terms of firing range and mobility. Any concession in the area helps the Syrian advance and reduces the area they have to fight for. One should take into account the short distances even under the present conditions: 13 km from the purple line to Kfar Szold; 13 km from the purple line to 'En Gev; 23 km from the purple line to Gadot.

Even a 2-km concession radically changes the present situation. Har Hermonit, 2 km from the purple line, controls the northern Golan and the westward slopes. Tel Avital, 2 km from the purple line, is close to the central axes in the Golan and controls the area to the west (see Upper Golan sector). The Ramat Mashimim area, 6-7 km between Wadi Haroqed and the steep western slopes, is a key area that enables forces to be sent southward to the Jordan Valley.

Demilitarization--A Step Backward

The demilitarization of the area forces the IDF to recapture vital areas during war. The desire to recapture territory is two-sided, and the one who wins the race is in control. To give up territory in order to recapture it is foolish, for if the area is needed for defense one shouldn't give it up just to face the necessity later on of retaking it.

Insuring the Water Sources--Protecting a Vital Installation

Israel's water sources are in the northern Golan. Insuring the water supply calls for physical protection. This cannot be achieved without territorial superiority. Hence, control of Mount Hermon is vital. It is not only the eyes and the ears of the country but also the head.

The Psychological Factor

One should not overlook the psychological factor. When the Syrians control points overlooking the northern settlements, they can see their targets clearly, and those targets appear within reach. The sight of flourishing settlements at their feet can entice them to start shooting or to engage in other hostile action.

Agreement or Escalation

It appears that despite their interference in Lebanon, the Syrians have been avoiding direct confrontation with Israel. This shows that they see their present position as vulnerable, and therefore they do not encourage the PLO to operate out of their territory, as they did when they controlled the Golan Heights. The cease-fire agreement is based on the premise that it does not pay for either side to start shooting, and thus any change in the present status quo may invite hostilities. The Syrian fortifications in the Golan prior to 1967 clearly show the importance they impute to the heights, when everything lies in the palm of their hand.

The Syrian army is more advanced and experienced than ever before. It is an army preparing for offensive action. In this light, the IDF should make the most of its advantage in occupying the present line.

MAPAM CRITICIZES HAWKISH TREND IN LABOR ALIGNMENT

Tel Aviv MA'ARIV in Hebrew 25 Sep 81 p 26

[Article by Moshe Maisels: "Four (Red) Flags and Three Percent (of the Population)"]

[Text] At the opening of the Mapam Council this week, one of the council members turned to the chairman and asked why the podium was decorated with 10 national flags, but only four red flags.

The chairman, MK Elazar Granot, appeared a bit perplexed, and turned himself to view the flags. Then he answered: "I am pleased with the comment. It is true."

There was in this a kind of revelation of thoughts and fears which haunt the Mapam people during discussion of the lessons of the results of the last Knesset elections. The comments of the Mapam leaders, MK Viktor Shem-Tov and Haike Grossman, at the council regarding the situation which had developed in the Labor Party after the elections and the deep concern regarding that situation testified to an increase in the tensions between the two Alignment partners.

The Mapam leaders fear that the Labor Party leaders are reading the "map" which was created following the elections differently and in a distorted fashion--something which carries the danger of a split in the Alignment. They fear that in the sharp struggle within the Labor Party, between the dovish-socialist faction and that faction which they define as "statist, activist in defense affairs and liberal in economic affairs" the latter faction may well come out on top. While Mapam demands that one of the lessons of the election results is that there should be a new emphasis on socialist ideology, the values of the labor movement, and the difference between it and the Likud, to bring the working public back home--the lesson for the Labor Party has on the contrary been a turn to the center, and a blurring of the differences between it and the Likud, as well as a hiding of the red flag, the socialist ideology, and the values of the labor movement.

The election results--the failure to replace the regime--renewed within the leadership of the Labor Party the struggle over party line and ways of action, for the future. In opposition to the thesis of the doves (including among others MK Abba Eban, MK Yeruham Mashal, MK Uzi Baram, MK Micah Kharish, MK Ora Namir, MK Menahem Hakohen and Naftali Blumenthal, as well as members of Ikhud Hakvutsat ve-Hakibbutzim, members of the Young Guard, etc), which follows a line which is moderate in political and defense matters, and which is faithful to socialist doctrine, there is another faction whose strength is increasing, which views the character and substance of the Labor Party as being social democratic, a kind of left-center bloc, and this is of particular concern to Mapam. Within this faction are in particular the Yakhdav group, headed by MK Eliahu Speiser, hawks such as MK Shlomo Hillel, most of the representatives of the Oriental community, leaders of the moshav movement, etc.

While the doves view the non-success of the Labor Party to replace the current regime in the elections as the result of a blurring of the socialist position of the party as well as the values of the labor movement, the "social democratic faction" sees the oversight in the election campaign as being a lack of appeal to the center. Leaders of this faction, and primarily MK Eliahu Speiser (who is a candidate for the position of secretary general of the party), claim that in the political sphere there was in the election campaign a leftward attraction in expressions of spokesmen of the party, in the direction of the Sheli platform, to the extent that the public was unable to distinguish between the platform which was accepted by the majority, and the opinions of individuals expressed during the campaign.

The "social democratic faction" also claims that the Labor Party ignored the dialogue with the NRP, and thus pushed it into the arms of the Likud. It supported anti-religious legislation in the Knesset--in such matters as army service, the employment of religious workers on the Sabbath, the attitude toward the Reform movement, and the prior determination that the Ministry of Education would never be given to a religious representative, etc. It is the opinion of the leaders of this faction that the lessons of the election are that one can never submit to dictates by the religious groups, but that at the same time one cannot adopt an attitude of "to hell with them," and that there must be a renewed dialogue with the younger leadership of the NRP.

Mapam is concerned that the Labor Party will become a party of the center "with a bit of the flavor of the kibbutz movement" in alliance with the religious groups. The secretary general of the Mapam party, Viktor Shem-Tov defined the signs of these developments as "arousing confusion, and sometimes causing concern and revulsion." He claimed in the Mapam council that today "one hears anti-kibbutz sounds in the Labor Party, anti-dove noises, and anti-secularist voices. The atmosphere is permeated by an extreme ethnic approach, and one gets the impression that the party is falling apart."

What concerns Mapam is the decentralizing method of the "social democratic faction" which seeks a change in the internal election method by means of election of more representatives of the districts and Orientals to the party institutions. Mapam fears that this public is more hawkish and more traditional. Also of concern to Mapam is the "orientation" of the public which is centrist, and the lower middle class such as tradesmen and small businessmen, which during the election supported the Likud.

The Mapam leaders bitterly ask: What is this talk that the kibbutz movement constitutes only 3 percent of the people? MK Eliahu Speiser, champion of the social-democratic faction, claims: "The kibbutz movement has a preferred position in the party, and no one challenges it. The partnership with the kibbutz movement is assured in the future, and if there are differences of opinion--they are only with a few people in the movement."

The leaders of Mapam claim that they have no intention of intervening in the decision regarding who shall be the secretary of the Labor Party. But the secretary general of Mapam, Viktor Shem-Tov, stated in the council that in the opinion of Mapam, Haim Bar-Lev represents the values of the labor movement, and that it cannot be apathetic regarding the question of who will replace Bar-Lev.

MK Eliahu Speiser claims: "Even before the first confrontation between Peres and Rabin, Mapam claimed that it had no intention of intervening in the confrontation, but on the other hand it publicly rejected Peres...." He adds that any drift to the left, which is the way of Mapam, will reduce the electoral prospects of the Labor Party, and this is neither its way nor its platform. "The slogans of Mapam will not bring back the workers who voted for Likud into the bosom of the Labor Party, because they are more hawkish and traditional."

Mapam gives its blessing to the position of MK Mota Gur, because we can negotiate with a Palestinian who recognizes our right to exist and who forswears terror. Thus they approach the Yariv-Shem Tov formula, which is accepted by Mapam. But what concerns the Mapam leaders is the response of the hawkish camp of the Labor Party, which completely rejects the position of MK Gur with the claim that this position is opposed to the party platform, it legitimizes the PLO, and it opens the way to the establishment of a Palestinian state. They are also concerned about attacks on the doves of the Labor Party on the question of links with the Palestinians, when they vote on the "evasive response" of Peres or the "analytical response" of Rabin to the proposal of Mota Gur. On the other hand, the hawkish camp rejects the position of Yosi Sarid, because his "orientation" converts the Labor Party into a kind of "Likud B." In such a case, the voter would prefer to vote directly for the Likud.

Mapam is also not happy with the positions of the Labor Party regarding strategic cooperation with the U.S. With few exceptions, the party leaders have criticized the agreement, especially the interpretations given to it by the prime minister--but the Labor Party has rejected Mapam's demand that it call for a special discussion of the matter in Knesset, claiming that it is still not a sure thing, and that it would be better to wait until the end of the AWACS affair.

The struggle between the socialists and the social democrats of the Labor Party expanded into a struggle between the two partners in the Alignment. In Mapam there were already some voices saying that under the present circumstances it would be better to begin discussions on the dismantling of the Alignment, but the leaders of Mapam rejected this call by those "who hasten to hitch a ride on the serious division which has been visited on the Labor Party and who call for its dismantlement." They claim that this would only serve the purposes of Likud. The Mapam leaders are of the opinion that at this juncture it is best for Mapam to follow closely what is happening in the Labor Party, while supporting the dovish-socialist faction, in the hope that it will ultimately come out on top in the internal struggle.

The leaders of the hawkish faction in the Labor Party claim, on the other hand, that the mark of "Likud B" has been imprinted by party members. They claim that there is no point to this type of talk, which is only used to strengthen leftist theses in matters of foreign and security affairs. It is no longer possible to be satisfied with an "ideological supermarket" but rather, the time has come to make a decision, proceed on its basis, and speak clearly.

This "clear language" is revolting to Mapam. They are afraid of the inclination of some of the Labor Party leaders (such as MK Peres, MK Gad Ya'aqovi, and MK Moshe Shahal) to bring back MK Moshe Dayan and the Telem people into the party. Is the lesson which the Labor Party wants to learn from the election results that Moshe Dayan should be brought back to the ranks of the party? The same Dayan who participated in the Begin government and proclaimed that Begin was closer to him than Meir Ya'ari? These are questions posed by the Mapam secretary general Viktor Shem-Tov.

Haika Grossman has already announced that Mapam has drawn two red lines for the continued existence of the Alignment: no establishment of a national unity government, and no participation of Telem as a unit within the Alignment. But according to Viktor Shem-Tov, the Labor Party has not yet given up thoughts of this sort.

GAZA STRIP AUTONOMY POSITION ASSESSED

Tel Aviv DAVAR in Hebrew 17 Sep 81 p 9

[Article by Dani Tzidqoni]

[Text] Is the Gaza Strip Ready for Autonomy? Just now Brig Gen Joseph Lunz is coming on board as the tenth IDF governor of the Gaza Strip. Which goes to show you that in just a few more years the period of our rule in the Gaza will be equal to that of the Egyptians, and the military regime, which is a temporary means of rule, could become a permanent framework if autonomy is not achieved and if some other solution is not found which would make possible an IDF pullout from the Gaza Strip. The list of military governors, which began with the Six-Day War, is long and interesting. The first governor was General Moshe Goren. His replacement was Col 'Aviv Garzilai, may he rest in peace. After him came Lt Gen Mote Gur, Brig Gen Menahem (Man) 'Aviram, Brig Gen Yitzhaq Pundaq, Gen Abraham 'Orli, Brig Gen David Mimun, Brig Gen Joseph Qastel, and Brig Gen Yitzhaq Segev, who is just now completing his tenure.

It might be possible to survey the history of Gaza since 1967 according to the periods of rule of the above-mentioned commanders. Each of them had to confront, apart from basic problems, problems of the time which were the fruit of changing conditions. We will not deal here with a historical survey of the military regime in the Gaza Strip from Goren to Segev. But the completion of Segev's period of service demands specific treatment.

Indeed it is hard to understand why the 43-year old Segev was transferred from his position just after the new defenee minister Sharon adopted new principles for the military regime in the territories, which Segev had favored and according to which he had tried to act in the period in which Israel had "frozen" her political activity in the territories. Sharon is now trying to overcome this gap in the talks that he is now conducting with Palestinian leaders in the territories in advance of the resumption of the autonomy talks. We used to call Segev's policy in the Gaza Strip the "understanding hand" policy or the "wise hand" policy, and we presented it as something more sophisticated and efficient from the point of view of Israel's interests and its war against the PLO than the policy of the "hard hand" which was operated primarily on the West Bank, in our estimation--at the political and military inspiration of the chief of staff. It seems that it would not be an altogether incorrect estimation if we were to say that in Sharon's tenure, the chief of staff will lose, except for regular defense issues, the influence that he enjoyed in days of the previous Minister of Defense Begin over the military regime in the territories and over the attitude of the regime toward its Arab inhabitants, and in that there is nothing to be sorry about!

The freeze in the political discussion with the inhabitants of the territories began, in fact, with the resignation of Dayan from the Foreign Ministry, after which Weizmann lost his stability in regard to the political line to take towards the territories. The tenure of Segev, who is a Middle East scholar with a Master's degree from Tel Aviv University, and who had served earlier as governor of El Arish, is a period which was measured not only by his success in preventing the PLO in escalating the relations of the Gaza Strip with Israel and the disruption of normal life in the area, but also by his contribution to the "ripening" of the Gaza Strip in the political programs of the State of Israel as a part of the autonomy deal.

In the 2 years of Segev's tenure, the Gaza Strip was influenced by the political process that began to be achieved in an intensive way between Israel and Egypt. Changes occurred principally in two major areas: in renewing the bonds with Egypt and in a positive attitude toward the political process as a means of solving the Palestinian problem. The bond with Egypt, which was weakened at a certain stage following the ascendancy of the PLO, draws its strength from the ties that developed between Egypt and the Gaza Strip from 1948 until the Six-Day War. The inhabitants of Gaza lived in the bosom of the senior Arab state, which led not only in nurturing Arab culture but also in nurturing the idea of Arab nationhood and was involved more than any other Arab state in the struggle for Palestine.

The signing of the peace agreement between Israel and Egypt led to a renewal of the bond with Egypt and hurt the orientation towards Jordan, headed, as we know, by Rashad al-Shawwa.

The fruits of normalization in Gaza are now very real, and prime among them is the regular territorial tie between them which did not exist before as it exists now since the opening of the Sinai Fields terminal. This tie will be tightened even more with the transfer of the terminal, in about 7 months, to Rafiah, when Egypt will approach to within 40 kilometers of Gaza.

Tens of thousands of Gaza residents began to move along the narrow coastal highway of Sinai south to Egypt, and their number last year reached 120,000. This mass movement goes on despite PLO pressures against it. It should be remembered that this mass movement was also aided by the conduct of mail and telephone service between them. The Gazans today are in the Egyptian "picture" not by watching Egyptian television or listening to Cairo radio but by travel and thanks to daily reading of the Egyptian press which streams regularly into the newspaper kiosks of the area's cities. It should also be remembered that tens of thousands of Gazans received their education in Egypt and remember her fondly. The connection is not only cultural, tourist, social and familial, but it has also taken on an economic form which is expressed in commerce and investments. Last year Gazans invested about 200,000,000 (that they earned in Israel?) in Egypt. For this purpose special offices were opened in the area, and they create the right ties for purposes of investment in Egypt, where bureaucracy and payoffs are among the signs of its economy.

There are those who think that this "experience" was fertile ground for the flowering of another attitude among residents of the area toward the conflict, who are inclined more now to see the solution precisely in the political plane and not in violent confrontation. Since the political option of Camp David is "autonomy," which is the solution suggested by the government, it is proper that the government should nurture, by means of the military regime and through suitable activity on the part of the political echelon, the "experience" described above, which, because of the Arab terror campaign, has not yet been given public expression in the direction of autonomy. On the matter of autonomy, the situation in the Gaza Strip is different from that on the West Bank because of the Gaza bond to Egypt and the West Bank bond to Jordan and the PLO. In Gaza the situation is easier because of the lack of friction with religious-nationalist settlements and land and water questions as they exist on the West Bank.

In the Gaza Strip there has been a basis for autonomy even since the Egyptian period which has been pressed during the Israeli administration, which administers its civilian and national services in the area by means of departments which remained from the Egyptian period, headed by Gazans, just as its workers are Arabs. Israeli supervision is achieved by Israeli staff officers, who represent in these departments the Israeli mother offices and the area headquarters.

Another reason why the Gaza Strip may merit "autonomy" is the integrative web of relationships that it has developed with Israel in the economic realm which has created in the area a large stratum of people interested in continuing the coexistence with Israel. But there is a problem. These pro-autonomy changes in attitude which exist among broad strata of residents in the Strip have not yet received political expression. Thus far there has evolved on the part of the local leadership of the area no attempt at integration or readiness for integration in the autonomy negotiations. (Two that tried, Ahaykh Hashim Huzandar and the deputy chief of the council of Jibeliyah Mr Abu Wardab, paid for it with their lives.

It may be that the principal reason for this is the lack of clarity that surrounds the autonomy program, which in fact is not clear even to many Israelis. The attitude toward the political process in Gaza also suffers because of its political structure which lacks a democratic tradition of party activity, elections, etc. Here the PLO influence is decisive in stopping the Gazan leadership from joining the process which it is battling against, by means such as the allocations of the joint PLO-Jordanian commission to institutions in the territories, the purpose of which is the encouragement of political elements.which identify with the PLO and oppose the political process, as well as by what we call "Arab terrorist acts," which are directed against what the PLO calls "fellow travelers," to which category, unfortunately, belong some Israeli journalists who identify people who prefer talking to us to terror as "fellow travelers."

Segev completed his mission in Gaza at precisely the time when the defense minister published his emphasis towards Israeli policy in the territories, which Segev had followed even earlier. These "emphases" aroused expectations among the Gazan leaders of complementary steps in the political area, especially in the realm of the essence of autonomy and what would come after it. Gaza, thus, is "conditionally ripe" for autonomy. The matter depends in large measure on the government, whether it will take steps which will enable moderate and pragmatic circles to be integrated in the political process which at this stage is contrary to the PLO.

LEGAL ASPECTS OF POLICY IN TERRITORIES ANALYZED

Tel Aviv MA'ARIV in Hebrew 11 Sep 81 p 28

[Article by Ze'ev Segal]

[Text] A group of jurists has published a comprehensive research study--in response to the research of Arab jurists--which sheds light on the principles of international law and its application in the territories. The study reveals that there is no military regime in the entire world comparable to that of Israel in preserving both the spirit and the letter of the law.

In a lecture before an international gathering of Jewish jurists who arrived in Jerusalem from 15 countries, minister of Justice Moshe Nissim said: "It can be said without hesitation that the essential rights of man are preserved in the occupied territories by the State of Israel in an unprecedented fashion in comparison with any other military regime anywhere."

It was not in vain that these words were spoken a month ago in an explanation of the legal foundation for the military grip in the occupied territories. If in the past Israel's military hold on the territories was attacked by political bodies, jurists from various countries have joined in, who have attempted to show, on the pretext of objectivity, that Israel does not carry out the principles of international justice which apply to a military regime in an "occupied territory."

A comprehensive study written by Israeli jurists was distributed world-wide to debunk this fabrication. In the preface to the study, jurist Haim Cohen wrote; "There is no denying that in the history of military regimes in occupied territories throughout the entire world, there is no clearer example of the preservation of human rights than their preservation by the State of Israel."

In the context of publications both abroad and in Israel on the subject of the methods of a military regime--it is doubtful if the public in Israel itself knows the basic principles which mold the action of the Israeli military regime. A study of the basic approach of Israeli governments from 1967 to the present shows that the practical view adopted binds Israel to the precepts of international law, even when Israel claims in the international arena that the international laws of conquest do not apply in Judea and Samaria, since at the time of the IDF's entry to the area there was no soverignty whose hold on the territory merited general international recognition.

The Geneva and Hague Conventions

A short time after the end of the Six-Day War, the legal advisor to the Israeli government Me'ir Shamgar proclaimed that the state would consider itself obligated to act according to the principles of the Geneva pact of 1949 on the matter of the defense of civilians in wartime, and according to the Hague Convention of 1907 on the matter of warfare on land. In discussions that took place before the High Court of Justice, it was clear that the actions of the military regime in the territories were checked in ac ordance with the precepts of international law, and that in case of violation of the instructions of customary military law, it would be possible to bring suit against the military regime before the Israeli court.

The approach of the Government of Israel creates an unprecedented precedent in what has been accepted in international law concerning the regulation of the rights of citizens, inhabitants of an "occupied territory," vis-a-vis the authority of the power holding the territory as a result of war. The government was the party which decided in 1967 not to claim an absence of authority on the part of the High Court of Justice to hear the appeals of inhabitants of the occupied territories. In the absence of such a claim--the result of which would be hard to predict in the absence of precedent--the Israeli court proceeds on the assumption that it has standing on the subjects of those functions of the military regime which belong to the executive authority of the state. It was the application of this authority which enabled the High Court of Justice to render its famous decision on the matter of the settlement at Alon Moreh (High Court of Justice 390/79), by which the respondents--the Government of Israel, the defense minister, the military commander of the Judea-Samaria area and the military commander of the sub-district of Shechem--were ordered to remove from the lands of the appellants, Arab residents of the village of Rujayb, "every structure that was erected thereupon and every object that was brought thereto."

The Needs of an "Army of Occupation"

The court based its decision on an examination of the actions of the military regime in light of the precepts of international law as they were fixed in the Hague Convention, which recognized the concept of the holding of real estate for the needs of an "army of occupation." The court determined that the "needs of an army of occupation" do not include those needs which are required "to guarantee public order and security," which is the primary function of the army according to the Hague Convention.

Since in this case there did not exist clear "military needs" in this sense, the order for the confiscation of real estate that was issued by elements of the military government, was vacated. This decision of the High Court of Justice, composed of five judges, contained a basic point of view": not only a comprehensive check of the activity of the military regime in the light of international law, but also a readiness on the part of the court to examine in depth the question of whether in fact there existed those "military needs" which the military regime claimed.

The decision makes clear that the military regime is in fact "the servant of two masters." Every one of its administrative actions would be tested before the High Court of Justice against two criteria: accord with international law as it applies in the occupied territories, and accord with Israeli internal justice (the municipal law code) which applies in Israel. The military regime is one of many state authorities and is bound by the rules of Israeli law. In this connection it is clear that the "military regime is not its own master but carries out a policy outlined for it by the government, as the court made clear earlier in its decision on the matter of the settlement at Beth-El (High Court of Justice 606/78).

On the matter of 'Alon Moreh the court made clear its thinking through its president Moshe Landau on the matter of the military regime. The government is the supreme body that determines the policy of the military regime. The government is the supreme body that determines the policy of the military regime. As long as the government does not say something about a particular topic concerning the activity of the regime in the territories, the chief of staff is obliged to carry out the instructions of the minister of defense; but when a topic is brought before the government, its decision is binding upon the chief of staff (and through him upon the various bodies of the military regime), even if the decision is one about which the minister of defense held the minority opinion in the government.

The granting of the opportunity to the residents of the occupied territories to appeal to the highest court in Israel--assures them not only a judge (High Court of Justice), but also a legal code (the rules of administrative law which apply in the State of Israel in addition to the international rules of law). These rules, which were developed in essence through the rulings of the High Court of Justice, imposed several obligations on the authorities: to act within the framework of their authority, reasonably, honestly, fairly and without harmful discrimination.

Both Law and a Judge

Thus the rulings of the High Court of Justice stand guard over the existence of the basic democratic principles in the territories such as freedom of expression, freedom of employment, freedom of association, etc. To the extent that these freedoms are limited in Israel itself they are also limited in hhe occupied territories, whether by force of legislation that existed in them before the entry of the IDF or by force of special orders that were issued by the military regime.

The basic authority for the limiting of freedoms (which is occasionally an issue for public debate) is recognized by international law. Thus, for example, this law recognizes the right of a military regime to forbid public gatherings and political meetings. The Israeli regime does not go the route of absolute prohibition; rather its approach is to require those who request to assemble to obtain a permit from the military regime (in Israel, too, those who ask to demonstrate must obtain a permit from the police). The policy of the government to forbid or to allow changes in accordance with conditions and the views of the bodies of government, but it is clear that in the final analysis, their decision is subject to review by the High Court of Justice.

The review authority of the High Court of Justice, however, was asserted in a similar connection having to do with freedom of expression and the dissemination of information in the occupied territories. The military regime decided to prohibit the distribution in the territories of a paper which appeared in the State of Israel. In a ruling on this matter (High Court of Justice 619/78), the court construed that in accordance with international law, the military regime was obligated to "take all measure in its power to guarantee as fully as possible order and public life," as stated in the Hague Convention.

It is this obligation which grants the regime the power to forbid political activity and to limit publication, and international law does agree that an "occupying state" does have such power. But the decision of the military regime was upheld only after it passed the "combined test" of international law and Israeli law. The court was convinced that the military regime had properly balanced the relevant interests; the assurance of security and public order as against the high social value of "freedom of expression."

10 Percent of Appeals to the High Court of Justice are from the Territories

These proceedings demonstrate the high degree of popularity of appeals by the residents of the occupied territories to the High Court of Justice. It should therefore come as no surprise that these appeals today constitute about 10 percent of all appeals submitted to the High Court of Justice. In the year 1979-80 residents of the territories submitted 91 appeals to the High Court of Justice. In five cases the appellants won an aboslute decision against the regime, in 28 cases the government achieved a compromise with the appellant or decided to acknowledge the appeal without a court order. In 42 cases, decisions were rendered in favor of the regime, and in six cases the appellants decided to withdraw their appeal (at the time of publication of the jurists' report, ten cases were still in litigation).

The appeals touched a wide spectrum of topics: taxation, land disputes, detentions, etc. One of the noteworthy decisions was the determination by the High Court of Justice not to recognize the decision on the purchase of the Jerusalem Electric Company as far as Judea and Samaria were concerned (High Court of Justice 351/80). Another ruling vacated the decision of the commander of the Judea and Samaria district which rejected the request of a husband to be reunited with his wife as not in accord with judicial decision.

The question is still uncertain as to what legislation the regime has the power to enact. The basic norm, upon which the structure of Israeli rule in the occupied territories was established, is the rule of a military regime without application of Israeli law which implies Israeli sovereignty. The matter was well clarified in Judea and Samaria by a manifesto issued by the military commander on 7 June, 1967, upon the entry of the IDF into the area.

When is there "Need for Change"?

This manifesto established that "the law which existed in the area would remain in force as long as it does not contradict this manifesto or any other manifesto or order that would be given, and with changes resulting by the establishment of IDF rule in the area." Since that time, more than 900 orders have been issued in Judea and Samaria, of which 120 led to amendment of the local legislation. A weighty question is what are the changes in legislation that the military regime is authorized to make under international law.

The Hague regulations set forth the obligatory principle by which existing laws in an "occupied territory" are to be honored except if there "exists a categorical obstacle" to doing so. In order to respond to the question that we have just raised, we must first explain the rest iction by which it is possible to estimate when a necessity for change in legislation has been created, and that is the recognition of the duty of the military regime to assure "public order and security."

The basic question was discussed in the High Court of Justice as long ago as 10 years back (High Court of Justice 337/71). In that instance the military governor issued a legislative instruction establishing an arbitration procedure for labor matters which did not exist according to Jordanian law. The opinion of the High Court majority emphasized that "life does not stand still," and that the military regime acted legally in establishing that change since it was clear that its objective was to fulfill its obligation to attend to the welfare of the population.

The minority opinion held that the military regime should not act to administer new arrangements that appear and that it is only authorized to maintain arrangements that existed in the past and to innovate only where absolutely necessary. From the decision of the High Court of Justice that was rendered at the beginning of this year on the question of the purchase of the East Jerusalem Electric Comapny (High Court of Justice that was rendered at the beginning of this year on the question of the purchase of the East Jerusalem Electric Company (High Court of Justice 351/80), it turns out that the regime would exceed its authority if it were to make long range changes because a military regime is by its very nature temporary and its principal task is the maintenance of security and public order.

Nevertheless, the basic approach of the High Court of Justice affirms the actions of the military regime, which has done much in the area of legislation in that which it felt desirable for the welfare of the residents, in accordance with changes in legislation that were accepted in the State of Israel in recent years. Thus an order was enacted in Judea and Samaria according to which no-fault compensation would be awarded to a person injured in a traffic accident; auto insurance and a fund for victims of hit-and-run accidents were established; the principle began to be applied in the area which was established in Israeli legislation concerning the obligatory use of seat belts in inter-urban sectors; compensation was established for job related accidents and this workman's compensation became obligatory for the employer.

In so doing the State of Israel acted not only in accord with current practice in international law but also according to an ethical conception of military rule which attempts to act in the best interests of the residents of the "occupied territories." Even if one does not agree with all the actions of the military regime (and some of those actions have, over the years, drawn heavy criticism from the High Court of Justice), it would seem that these aspects of Israeli activity in the territories deserve some small illumination more than other aspects.

The illumination of the judicial underpinnings to military control in the occupied territories can be summed up in an interesting fact: the "integrated test" that has now begun to apply to actions of the military regime in the occupied territories results in the fact that not every action which would be considered legal in Israel would be considered so in the occupied territories. Since the military regime is subject both to international law and to Israeli law, it follows that its freedom of action is even more limited that of the government of Israel which is beholden only to the Knesset.

The High Court of Justice is the focal point for supervision over the military regime and its approaches and stance assure, in large measure, the existence of the "rule of law" even under special conditions and at a time when everyone is talking about "difficult instances." The fact that suggestions for legislation which would nullify the authority of the High Court of Justice over the territories were rejected almost without discussion is testimony to the honor of Israeli society.

The judge Haim Cohen writes at the opening of the jurists' report: "I am not happy with certain aspects of the military regime; not every one of us with current basic conceptions on the matter of security needs. But as long as the military bears the responsibility for security, and as long as the territories are subject to terrorist actions, these conceptions have to apply."

In referring to the decision of the High Court of Justice (on the matter of 'Alon Moreh) in which the court nullified the view of the [military] authority on the question of "military need," the judge stresses the principle which concerns the "rule of law" in the territories: "there is no doubt that the very existence of the High Court of Justice and its activity in this connection as a watchdog have contributed to the degree of self-restraint of the military commanders in the area."

There is no doubt that this part of the activity of the High Court of Justice is of unique importance today, in considering the scope of this activity, which is controversial in almost every aspect.

DIALOGUE WITH 'ARAFAT SEEN AS NECESSARY EVIL

Tel Aviv DAVAR in Hebrew 11 Sep 81 p 14

[Article by Mote Gur: "Israel and the PLO"]

[Text] What more needs to happen for all of us to appreciate that radicalism in word and deed leads to results opposite to those expected, for a perfect example lies prostrate at our feet: in order to arouse among the people mass hysteria, which is a mixture of fear and strength, Mr Begin inflamed passions in Israel and Lebanon and instructed the IDF, in the first months of this year, to increase its activities against the terrorists above and beyond what was accepted all these years "in order to strike first and hit them before they hit us." In similar fashion the government hinted to the Christians that they could renew their action against the Syrians and could expect our assistance. But when the Syrians reacted in full force --and they are capable of doing so with merciless cruelty--the prime minister screamed Holocaust!--he would send our planes into action against them.

Today, just a few months after those unnecessary occurrences, we can summarize the results:
--Syrian missiles are set up in Lebanon;
--We have gone through the trauma of the northern settlements;
--The Christians have announced that they will sever relations with us;
--The Government of Israel agreed to a direct cease fire with the PLO under the signature of Yasir Arafat--while he clings to the Palestinian charter with all his might and to terrorist actions against Israel and denies our right to exist;
--The terrorists are fortifying themselves in Lebanon and increasing their strength--both military and political--and we are prevented from acting against them;
--President al-Sadat saw in this agreement an "opening of hope" for a direct agreement between Israel and the PLO and made a declaration to that affect before his people and the world;
--The French foreign minister met openly and as a clear snub to Israel with Yasir Arafat, and despite the fact that Israel is about to welcome him here in Israel--despite that and despite his declarations that he and France see the PLO as a representative of the Palestinian people, even if "of course"--not the only one. That is how far radicalism has brought us!

Since when does Israel have the right to tell other peoples who their representatives are? Would we allow foreigners to become involved in our internal democratic processes, and would we dare to intervene in what is done under the mask of Egyptian "democracy," which has forged a peace treaty with us and which is likely tomorrow, in the same democratic process of detentions and compulsion, to abandon it? Or perhaps someone has thought about returning to the debate of the early seventies about the existence of non-existence of a Palestinian entity, after Begin's government recognized, in the Camp David accords, the legitimate rights of the Palestinians? What interests us, and what must interest us, is one thing alone--the attitude toward us in ideology and in practice.

When I believed, in the years 1970-75 that al-Sadat seriously intended peace and was ready to meet him with certain concessions in Sinai--I was called by many a "dove" and "naive": could we possibly see a real peace maker with Israel in a man who had once supported the Nazis and who had forced the Yom Kippur war on us? Not many years passed and only because of this political and verbal radicalism we were forced to give up the entire Sinai without even a symbolic change of security border! On the day that al-Sadat surprised the radicals and decided to put us to the test--full peace with full concessions--they were astonished and gave in, some willingly and some as if possessed of the devil. In the coming months we are about to pay the final price for the false flag of radicalism--the evacuation of all the settlements in the Sinai while al-Sadat, and he alone, remains king of the peace and carries his good news.

Yasir Arafat is an international terrorist and his hands drip innocent blood. I have not the slightest doubt about that, and as many times as I have tried to get him for it, I would support similar attempts in the future if he should continue his methods of terror and murder. To my great sorrow, his compatriots do not see him that way, nor do the large majority of the world's peoples and leaders.

In their opinion, he is the leader of a national liberation movement, and he employs methods identical to those of these movements throughout the world--in Africa, in Asia, in South America and in Europe (Ireland). In all these places peaceful citizens murder and are murdered--day and night--at home, in restaurants, on the street, in trains and in movie theaters. Even if this is not our way, and it is superfluous to emphasize how much it contradicts our every ethical conception as human beings and Jews, we cannot ignore the fact that things like these exist and, to a large degree, even merit recognition, understanding and symtathy.

Another sad fact is that the Arabs in Judea, Samaria and Gaza have not yet produced a leadership that is ready to replace the PLO and deal with Israel over their political future. In contrast to many radicals in our midst who speak mainly with themselves and their ilk, I have talked a great deal with the leaders in the territories. Both people who are identified with the PLO and people who oppose it are in agreement in their recognition that Israel will have to test the future of Israel-Arab coexistence with the PLO as well--if not only with the PLO. On the other hand not a few of them recognize that Israel would not be able to do this without PLO recognition of Israel. There is not anyone who sees the Israeli-Palestinian conflict with open eyes who is not aware that the quarrel is so deeply problematic as to be almost beyond solution. The conclusion to be drawn from this could go in either of two directions: either complete severence or an attempt at negotiation.

In its ideological platform the Labor party prefers negotiation and has even opened and expanded possible avenues of approach to it. Since we recognize the difficulties resulting from the existing conflict, we have started with an explanation of our stand, which appears in detailed unequivocal paragraphs in which the central idea on the question of the Palestinians is based on the following fundamentals:

--An obligation to the Camp David accords;
--Renunciation of the policy of "not one step" in Judea, Samaria and Gaza;
--A peace agreement with Jordan based on territorial compromise;
--Palestinian self-identification will receive its expression in a Jordanian-Palestinian state;
--Renunciation of an additional Palestinian state in the territory between Israel and Jordan;
--All the Jordanian-Palestinian territory west of the Jordan would be demilitarized and no foreign army would cross the Jordan westward;
--This demilitarization would not prevent agreed upon security arrangements involving an Israeli presence: the platform details territories that would remain under Israeli sovereignty: the Jordan Valley, the Jerusalem environs and Gush 'Etzion and the southern part of the Gaza Strip, and leaves an opening for mutual discussion on additional territories as required by an agreement that would be reached with Jordan.

As to the human character of the relations between Israel and the Palestinians and Jordan, and with the intent of opening prospects for negotiation, the platform explicitly sets up an expanded framework for Palestinian representation: in accordance with its desire to put an end to the Israeli-Arab conflict, the Labor party would be ready, as in the past, to enter into talks with Palestinian people and organizations (in addition to agreed upon representatives from the territories), who would recognize Israel and renounce the use of terror. The peace between Israel and the Jordanian-Palestinian state would be based upon mutual respect of sovereignty, structure and internal regime! This paragraph is intended to respond to the question raised in discussions: the possibility that the PLO leadership would be the one chosen to stand at the head of the Jordanian-Palestiaian state. Our answer is that we would not interfere with that!

In order to remove any doubt concerning this question, we explicitly affirm that: the PLO, which denies Israel's right to exist, and any other organization founded on the "Palestinian Charter" or which uses terror, is not a negotiating partner for peace. And we continue: it is necessary to increase political and ideological activity on public opinion, governments, parliaments and international organizations against the granting of legitimacy to terrorist and sabotage organizations and against the appeasement of their murderous activity.

But, unlike radical bodies, the Labor party believes that it is impossible to speak about negation without leaving an opening for something positive. Therefore we emphasize our absolute renunciation of the PLO, its way of doing things and its leaders--and we will continue to act against them and to fight them as much as we are able in the accepted military and political ways. But we leave every Palestinian Arab a way out of his radical dilemma, and this includes the PLO: to renounce the Palestinian Charter which seeks the destruction of Israel; to desist from acts of terror and to recognize the State of Israel and its right of sovereign existence as an independent Jewish state founded on the law of return and the right of immigration to it by every Jew in the world!

A PLO which would do this would not be the PLO of today—neither in form nor in content. This is also the only possible way for us to contend with the PLO, which does exist on the international political arena: we leave the door open, and it is up to the PLO to decide whether to come in. His refusal will assist us in showing him to the world for what he is and will enable us to act against him so long as that is necessary for our existence and security.

STUDY OF PEACE PROCESS--Professor 'Itamar Rabinowitz, in a conference at the "Peace Institute," declares: "The peace with Egypt has sharpened the Israeli-Arab conflict." "The agreement between Israel and Egypt has brought about a sharpening of the Israeli-Arab conflict, even though it has also had a softening and moderating influence"--declared Professor 'Itamar Rabinowitz yesterday in a discussion held on the third anniversary of the Camp David accords, which was held under the auspices of the Institute for Peace in the Middle East. Professor Rabinowitz, head of the Shiloah Institute, explained that the sharpening occurred because the conflict was focused on more immediate issues which sharpened the Israel-Palestine war and worsened relations in the territories. From the standpoint of cooperation between the three components of the Camp David accords--the U.S., Israel and Egypt--these were three disappointing years; no axis was created for progress. Rivalry was created between Egypt and Israel because Egypt is working to replace Israel as "property" of the U.S., and the signing of the agreement was an important step in the Egyptian strategy towards the U.S.. As to relations between Israel and Egypt, Professor Rabinowitz said: "A kind of consultation and dialog were created as well as exchanges of visits among the leadership, and up till now the tradition of maintaining the technical existence of the agreements is good." However in many other aspects, the results are disappointing. The question mark of April, 1982 seems to hover over everything. [Text] [Tel Aviv MA'ARIV in Hebrew 25 Sep 81 p 3] 9794

GAZA AUTONOMY STAND--In the Gaza Strip they do not understand the meaning of the change in the structure of the regime. Confusion, uncertainty and curiosity to learn the significance of the separation of authorities in the military regime are rampant among officers of the military regime in Gaza and its civilian workers as well as among Arab workers and the public in the area. Israeli functionaries in the regime said that they had received no guidance and the program was a mystery to them. The replacements now being carried out in the military regime's top brass in the Gaza Strip are contributing to this lack of clarity. The area's Arabs believe that it is Sharon's intention to lead Gaza into a one-sided autonomy, all Dayan; since there is a ready basis for it there as a result from the new policy which Sharon announced about a month ago. The day before yesterday Mayor Rashad al-Shawwa met with the Egyptian charge d'affairs in the American foreign office. It was reported that al-Shawwa told him that Israel and the U.S. erred in agreeing to Sadat's original demands, which follow from the need of both of them to recognize the rights of the Palestinian people and self-determination. Shawwah, who according to the same sources did not mention the PLO, said that if Israel and the U.S. would adopt this approach, it is possible that the Palestinians would not oppose autonomy. OTRAG LEAVES LIBYA, FUTURE UNCERTAIN

Hamburg DER SPIEGEL in German 2 Nov 81 pp 74, 76, 78

[Article: "Extravagances with Qaddafi"]

[Text] On the heels of violent internal dispute the Munich rocket construction firm Otrag has left Libya.

The countdown went off without a hitch. Right on schedule, at 11:20 am local time on 1 March 1981, the 12-meter long rocket left the launching pad at the oasis of Sebha, 800 kilometers south of the Libyan capital of Tripoli, and rose skyward.

The launch was extravagantly hailed by officials of the "Orbital Transport and Rocket Ltd" of Munich as "one more important step along the way toward commercial use of the Otrag carrier rocket system for transporting satellites and cargo vehicles in space."

But those who financed the desert undertaking were none too happy.

The successful launch made the 1,500 or so "silent partners" who had invested some DM 170 million in the tax shelter company since 1974 quite uneasy. They thought Otrag's Libyan adventure a bit too daring.

Libya's neighbors were afraid the Germans might be constructing rockets —possibly to be equipped with nuclear warheads— for Muammar Qaddafi, Libya's eccentric head of state.

The Egyptian foreign minister, Kamal Hassan Ali, lodged a protest with the FRG, calling it "a serious threat to peace."

Once again, the firm was under suspicion of not merely being a harmless "moving and storage company in space" but a clandestine military operation. Once before, in 1979, Otrag had had to vacate a large test area in Zaire.

At that time, Soviet chief of state Leonid Brezhnev raised the possibility that the Germans might be engaged in testing military rockets there. Both chancellor Helmut Schmidt and the then French President Valery Giscard d'Estaing prevailed upon Zaire's President Mobutu Sese Seko to cancel Otrag's lease.

The rocket firm's financiers were annoyed to find that Otrag's founder, Lutz Kayser, had once more chosen a questionable partner to link up with. "These extravagances with Qaddafi were never discussed with us beforehand," says Arno Gerisch, an adviser of Carl.E. Press, a Frankfurt moving firm executive and Otrag shareholder.

Following the Libyan desert launch, the Otrag partners called for Kayser's resignation. In late September, he was forced to relinquish his 74 percent share in the company, which is tied to the silent partnership group, and turn it over to the partners' advisory board by whom it would be held in escrow. Frank Wukasch, the technical head of Otrag, and Otrag's business manager, Helmut Billen, both resigned in proceedings before the registry court and were subsequently installed as the "emergency board" of the stock company. After that, Kayser was out at Otrag.

Not only the "escapades in Libya," as Gerisch calls them, had taken the financiers' breath away. They were even more upset when they took a look at the books. The rocket firm was just about to take a nosedive. Otrag had outstanding debts amounting to about DM 500 million— a tidy sum for an enterprise employing no more than three dozen people at last count.

Kayser had always been one to throw around with millions. By the end of 1978, after three successful launches, development costs had already reached DM 465 million. Of this sum, DM 190 million went to Zaire for leasing the proving grounds in the province of Shaba.

As early as at the end of 1974, Kayser already took godd care of his own interests, selling his "inventor's rights, patents and know-how" to the company for DM 150 million.

That was a great deal of money for an idea that did not even originate with Kayser. The principle of the rocket type which Kayser used to attract investors had been worked out by German space pioneer Johann Winkler in the late twenties: a basic element consisting of two liquid propulsion tubes would be built up into carrier rockets of any size whatever and the projectile's flight would be controlled by regulating the thrust of the individual elements.

Technically, the system is obsolete because the Kayser rocket's payload to dead weight ratio becomes more unfavorable the larger the rocket gets— the bundled tube elements growing heavier and heavier.

Nonetheless, Kayser took the money— and not only for rights to the basic principle. It did not bother him that many of the inventions he sold to Otrag turned out to be useless. The guidance system he called ingeniously simple —windshield wiper motors were to be used to regulate the thrust of the tubes— was a particularly conspicuous failure.

Thus far, Kayser has collected some 15 million in cash; the remainder of the rights fees were to be paid out to him in annual instalments.

Now, however, Kayser will have to do without at least a part of the millions still outstanding. The advisory board and the board of directors of the debt-ridden firm came up with a "stabilization settlement." The creditors agreed to relinquish 70 percent of their claims. The firm can now enter the sum of DM 350 million in the books as a "stabilization profit."

Kayser did not come out of this settlement unscathed. Still, after the partial relinquishment of claims, he will still be entitled to some DM 40 million— provided Otrag ever becomes solvent again.

Zaire alone refused to play along in the Otrag bailout; it still has a claim for DM 70 million in leasing fees for the test area pending. Negotiations aimed at reducing the claim are to take place in early November.

The Otrag financiers will still have to throw good money after bad; millions more are needed to provide the funds for the "stabilization settlement."

But those that are being hit are by no means paupers. Some of the silent partners are quizmaster Wim Thoelke; Stuttgart publisher Ernst Klett and the estate of Willy Kaus, the one-time owner of the Metzeler tire company.

In all, another DM 13.5 million were pumped into the ailing firm this year; but the partners had no choice. If the tax shelter undertaking had gone bankrupt, the tax authorities would have slapped fines amounting to millions on the shareholders. The tax savings so far, which permitted the high-earning Otrag shareholders to finance Kayser's rocket experiments, would have been due in case of bankruptcy and the shareholders would have been liable.

Last month, the firm put "circular letter 11.1981" which contained some "good news" for the silent partners. "The continued existence of Otrag is assured," it said.

But compared to Kayser's extravagant predictions of "overall sales amounting to DM 30 billion over the next two decades" the continued existence of the firm has a somewhat more modest look about it. The super-rocket which was to lift satellites into space no longer has a chance. The rocket with four propulsion elements, tested in Libya, now is to be placed on the market as a high-altitude research rocket for scientific purposes.

But there is no launch site for it as yet. The new head of Otrag, Wukasch, does not want to risk further experiments in Qaddafi's backyard. The Otrag has already left the desert site. At present, the Otrag management and Brazil are discussing the possibility of testing the rockets there.

But in these talks it is turning out to be a serious handicap that Otrag has the reputation of being in the arms business. It also now appears that Kayser's activities in Libya were by no means as harmless as he always made them out to be. "What he did in Libya," Wukasch now admits, "could not be tolerated by the board of directors of a German corporation."

Several features of the rocket model testfired in Libya seem to point to less than peaceful uses. The newest version was said to have been equipped with swing wings and control jets. This would provide for more accurate target guidance— a superfluous device for use on a simple research rocket.

After departing from the German tax shelter enterprise, Kayser could feel free to continue working on the rocket, without political qualms and at Qaddafi's expense— but not without risk to himself. The Israelis would not be likely to stand by and let the German rocket expert work away for long.

STRATEGY BEHIND WESTERN SAHARA FIGHTING

London WEST AFRICA in English No 3352, 26 Oct 81 p 2489

[Article by Alex Rondos]

[Text] WITH ITS ATTACK on Guelta Zemmour, the largest engagement against Moroccan forces for some time, the Polisario Front has let Morocco off a decidedly unpleasant hook. Coming as it does at a time when there were some signs of a move towards peace in the region, the scale of the attack suggests a willful break by the Sahrawi from the OAU-guided path to peace. It has also shattered the returning tranquility in the relations between Mauritania and Morocco.

Guelta Zemmour is close to the frontier with Mauritania and on the major road to El Aiun. To have captured this garrison would have seriously affected the strength of the Moroccan lines of defence set up earlier in the year, behind which is contained the politically and economically most useful part of the West Sahara. In the event, the Moroccans have recaptured the garrison, but not before having two aircraft destroyed by SAM missiles, provided — as Moroccan officials will eagerly point out — by some foreign power. Perhaps, with events in Egypt and Sudan in mind, Rabat thought it opportune to play up the fact that surface-to-air missiles were now being used in the conflict. Equally important has been the subsequent tension between Rabat and Nouackchott.

The Moroccan Air Force attacked Polisario Front positions in Mauritania, as the guerilla columns withdrew. General Ahmed Dlimi, the Moroccan commander in the Western Sahara, explained that orders had been given that the army should not cross the frontier, though obviously this did not apply to Mauritania. A message from King Hassan to Col. Mohamed Khouna Ould Haidalla, the Mauritanian Head of State, said that the attack "by an armed battalion equipped with heavy and extremely sophisticated weapons . . . would have been able to reach Geulta Zemmour only by moving directly from Mauritanian territory." He even specified the village El-Aidiet, just 10 kilometres inside the frontier. The Moroccan claim was that 12 Soviet T54 tanks and 50 armoured troop carriers were involved in the attack. Journalists who have visited the scene are inclined to agree with these claims.

Although the tone of the note was not as aggressive as it might have been and the army was ordered not to cross the frontier, the King warned that this did not mean that Morocco will "remain with arms folded in the event of a fresh attack." The Mauritanian Government has rejected the allegation of involvement, which will have done considerable damage to the re-establishment of improved relations between the two countries. Ever since the signing of the peace agreement between Mauritania and the Polisario Front in Algiers in August, 1979, Mauritania has struggled to keep an independent line in the conflict and to cope with its internal political and financial problems. However, relations with Morocco reached their lowest point in March this year when the responsibility for an attempted coup in Nouackchott was claimed by a Moroccan-based group.

Since the June summit of the OAU in Nairobi, when King Hassan, with a characteristic display of diplomatic gymnastics, produced not only a rapprochement with Libya (which kept Tripoli's sniping at bay) but also a proposal for a ceasefire and referendum in the Western Sahara, attention has focused on the OAU's attempts to reach a compromise procedure for the ceasefire and referendum.

King Hassan's proposal in Nairobi was vague, but enough to impress delegates as to his goodwill. In late August, the OAU committee responsible for the implementation of the ceasefire and referendum (comprised of Guinea, Kenya, Mali, Nigeria, Sierra Leone, Sudan and Tanzania) met to decide the procedure. It was at this stage that divergences emerged (although Morocco, at the time, did not disapprove of the proposals). The Nairobi solution included a preference for a referendum on self-determination which contradicted the Moroccan desire for a consultative referendum. The OAU Committee, whose exact extent of authority in the matter is not entirely clear, also decided that it would be responsible for organising the elections; again, contrary to Rabat's wish that Morocco be responsible for the task. The proposal that a peace-keeping force should be comprised of OAU or even UN forces seemed acceptable just as the proposal that any intermediary administration in the Western Sahara should co-operate closely with the Moroccan officials was a sop to the Moroccans. However unpalatable the OAU suggestions might have been, Rabat was caught by its initial gesture of goodwill and held its peace.

Though no timetable was set for the referendum or even the ceasefire, the initial exchanges in the campaign had already begun. Morocco accused Algeria and the Polisario Front of grossly exaggerating the number of Sahrawi refugees in the camps in southern Algeria. Morocco says there are some 75,000 refugees, while the Polisario Front say there are at least ten times as many. Polisario has accused the Moroccans of transferring several hundred families from Southern Morocco into Western Sahara in order to strengthen the electorate for the referendum.

Whatever the disagreements, the public impression was one of a qualified desire on all sides to arrive at some solution. So, why then the escalation of the conflict? These have been difficult times for the Polisario. At the OAU they failed to gain recognition. One of their main arms suppliers, Libya, came to an agreement with Morocco just before the summit. Subsequently, Morocco refused to enter into direct negotiations with the Polisario Front over the ceasefire.

Behind the facade of public diplomatic support for the Polisario Front, Algeria is more concerned with stability in the region. Indeed, President Chadli Benjedid has even spoken of this in public. King Hassan has always played on the Algerian weakness by offering them a free port on the Atlantic Coast and the freedom to have gas pipelines to link up their natural gas resource through such an outlet. Behind the scenes, secret negotiations continue between Algeria and Morocco. It has been reported reliably that Algeria has intervened over the shipment of arms to the Polisario Front.

For the Polisario, if the diplomatic manoeuvrings are proving unfruitful, then the alternative is a military solution. Though the sophistication of the arms employed in the latest attack by the Polisario Front is a novel feature, it has to be asked for how long will Algeria continue to support the Polisario, especially at a time when the Moroccans seem well dug in and Algiers no longer displays the militarism of Boumédienne. There have been reports of meetings between King Hassan and Libyan envoys — which are no secret — in which it has been suggested that Libya would accept the possibility of Saharan autonomy under Moroccan sovereignty.

Moroccan prevarication over the referendum and the vaguest chance that, one way or another, the result of the referendum might disappoint the Sahrawi leaders, combined with the constant concern for a military breakthrough, have prompted the latest action. It has been suggested that there are two ways of looking at the Polisario strategy; either the Guelta Zemmour attack is a "final fling" or it is part of a long term strategy dependent upon foreign support and designed to bleed Morocco into submission.

For Morocco, the attack appears to be conveniently timed. The OAU deliberations were coming to embarassing conclusions. Internal opposition to the occupation of the Western Sahara is minimal though the economy is in dire straits. The occasion could, however, be turned to Morocco's benefit. The prolongation of the war — which is suggested by the latest events — will permit the continuation of negotiations with Algeria. Certainly, while Libya is associated with the Polisario Front, and there is evidence of arms as sophisticated as SAM missiles, the US will be loath to avoid helping an old friend.

Whatever the justice of the Polisario struggle, it has had to suffer some disappointments recently which it has tried to reverse in the last couple of weeks, militarily. The failure of military action leaves them open to only one path; a negotiated solution which will be dependent upon the current strategic and political whim of the protector, Algeria.

EFFECTS OF DESERT BATTLE EXAMINED

Paris AN-NAHAR ARAB REPORT & MEMO in English No 43, 26 Oct 81 pp 6-7

[Text]

The Saharan sands have not yet settled over last week's battle at Guelte Zemmour. The Polisario Front's siege of the Moroccan army's Western Saharan stronghold has nonetheless probably marked a watershed in the six-year war over the phosphate-rich territory. If Morocco's King Hassan II in is correct in alleging that Soviet Sam-6 missiles used to shoot down a Moroccan Hercules C-130 "flying command post" and a Mirage F-1 fighter-bomber on October 13 were supplied by Algeria and Libya and manned by Cuban or East German technicians, then it may represent a significant broadening of the conflict with potentially serious international repercussions.

Even if there was no Cuban or East German involvement, much that has already happened serves to justify this fear. King Hassan claimed that the Polisario attack violates the OAU's Organisation of African Unity's resolution on a settlement in the Sahara (An-Nahar Arab Report & MEMO, July 6) and restores Morocco's "complete freedom of action." And he sent the Moroccan air force in "hot pursuit" of the quick-moving guerillas to attack their positions in Mauritania. Mauritanian President Mohamed Khoura Ould Haidalla has denied that the Polisario used Mauritanian territory as a base from which to attack Guelte Zemmour, which is 40 kilometres from the Mauritanian border. The Mauritanian leader accused King Hassan of "seeking to justify agression against our country," adding that the Mauritanian army would "defend the integrity of our territory" in the event of Moroccan intervention.

Both Algeria and the Polisario have denied foreign (including Algerian) involvement at Guelte Zemmour and have accused King Hassan of trying to entangle the great powers in a local conflict at a time of heightened Soviet-American tensions by blowing out of proportion "just another episode" in the Saharan conflict. Polisario has also charged that King Hassan is seeking US intervention, which may be corroborated by a report by the Moroccan News Agency MAP from Washington that delivery of 100 M 60 tanks, originally due in 1983, would be advanced to an earlier date. The announcement was made on October 16, while former US President Nixon was visiting King Hassan in Morocco. Mr Nixon called for increased US military aid "to defend the country's territorial integrity. It appears unlikely however, even in the tense period following the assassination of Egypt's President Anwar Sadat and the machinations, real or imagined, of Libya's President Qadhafi in Chad and Sudan, that the US will risk jeopardizing its improving relations with Algeria by any involvement in the Saharan conflict other than as a supplier of arms to Morocco. Algeria is furthermore an important trading partner of the US.

The most immediate and visible outcome of Guelte Zemmour will most likely be on the diplomatic front. The "biggest battle of the Saharan war" should suffice to hamstring the already-bogged-down efforts of the OAU to bring about a peaceful resolution of the conflict by a referendum among the Sahrawis on their future status. The OAU had resolved at its Nairobi summit in June to begin work on organising referendum which would give the inhabitants of the Western Sahara the opportunity to decide whether they wish to be independent or united with Morocco. Both King Hassan and Polisario, along with Algeria, had agreed with the idea, and until last week, the Western Sahara was relatively peaceful.

The referendum, however, has since become mired in the problem of estimating the Sahrawi population, that is, determining who would be allowed to vote. The Moroccans and Polisario have widely divergent views on this issue, and there has been no reliable census since Spain relinquished its Saharan colonies of the nomadic and refugee poulation, which shift back and forth over the borders of the Western Sahara into Algeria and Mauritania. Another problem which may have helped to bury the referendum and provoke the Polisario attack on Guelte Zemmour is the chicken-or-egg-first deadlock over recognition and negotiation: since agreeing to the OAU proposal, Algeria and Polisario have insisted that direct negotiations, a ceasefire and withdrawal of Moroccan troops must precede the voting. Morocco has called this view "obstructionist," accusing Algeria of trying to torpedo the OAU peace-making efforts. Rabat has refused to negotiate with the guerillas and withdraw its troops prior to a ceasefire and a referendum, since such actions would be construed as recognition of Polisario. The attack on Guelte Zemmour may have been mounted by Polisario as a last-ditch effort to force King Hassan to negotiate with them and to obtain recognition prior to the vote.

If such is the case, whether or not Guelte Zemmour signals a return to protracted military conflict depends largely on King Hassan. It is possible that there is something to the Polisario claim that King Hassan wants to abandon the Nairobi accords and relinquish his commitment to the referendum in order to shore up national unity. Moroccans of all persuasions support the integration of Western Sahara into Morocco. Last month, the leader of the Moroccan socialist opposition party (Union Socialiste des Forces Poulaires-USFP) was jailed for criticising the government's support of the OAU referendum on the grounds that it "threatened the integrity of our country". In this connexion, it may well be that it was the June 22 food riots in Casablanca which forced Hassan to announce to the OAU that he would be in favour of a Western Saharan self-determination referendum. The riots drove home the close relation between a $1 million per day war and domestic discontent over rising food prices. Agreeing to the referendum bought King Hassan valuable time, which is now at his disposal. As a result of the Polisario attack on Guelte Zemmour, King Hassan can claim to have given peace a chance and turn to his people for renewed support for the Saharan war. At the same time, an intensification of the war may muster up the national sentiments needed to mend the tattered fabric of domestic Moroccan politics.

Guelte Zemmour and its repercussions will also have important consequences for inter-Arab relations, with a renewed cold war between Morocco on the one hand and Algeria and Mauritania on the other. Secretary General of the Arab League Chedli Klibi expressed his "profound concern" right at the outset of the attack, and is reported to be seeking to ensure that the Arab Summit Conference due to take place next month in Fez does so "in a cordial atmosphere". But whether the latest fighting means that leaders from Algeria, Mauritania, and Libya will not show up in Fez remains to be seen, as does the outcome of the conference for the Western Sahara.

POLITBURO REPORT TO 17TH PLENUM OF CENTRAL COMMITTEE OF TUDEH PARTY OF IRAN

Tehran MARDOM in Persian 11 Apr 81 pp 3-10

["The Politburo Report to the 17th Plenum of the Central Committee of the Tudeh Party of Iran"]

[Text] Dear Comrades,

The Politburo of the Central Committee has commissioned me to report its activities to the Central Committee between the time periods of the 16th and 17th plenums, as well as its proposals for the future work of the Party.

This report consists of two parts. In the first part, the present situation in the country as well as that of the world are briefly analyzed. In the second part, the activities of the leadership of the Party during the period between the two plenums are reported to the comrades.

Based on the guidelines of the 16th Plenum, the Politburo has prepared a new Party plan for the present evolutionary stage of the Iranian society, to be discussed and approved by the Plenum.

Part I

A BRIEF ANALYSIS OF THE PRESENT SITUATION OF IRAN AND THE WORLD

A. THE INTERNAL SITUATION OF IRAN:

The most important characteristic of the present internal political situation is that the Iranian revolution--in the wake of its very significant accomplishments in the destiny-making battle against world imperialism headed by the United States and against domestic counter-revolution--is now going through one of its most difficult stages of stabilization, strengthening and expansion. The united front of the plundering forces of imperialism, world-wide, evil reaction, and domestic counter-revolution, which were shattered by the victory of the Iranian revolution, are by no means willing to accept the stabilization, strengthening and expansion of this revolution as an irreversible change. They have employed all their infernal forces to overthrow this revolution and take Iran and the region back to the era of unquestionable domination by imperialism. As we know, within the past two years, a number of imperialistic conspiracies of various colors were devised and executed which, one after another, were scandalously defeated by the brave resistance of the Iranian people and the genuine forces of the revolution.

At this very moment, our fight continues with great violence to shatter the sixth conspiracy of imperialism disguised as the imposed war of aggression of the traitor Saddam and his cohorts on our country. In fact, this conspiracy was basically defeated in the early days. Its goal was nothing short of the overthrow of the regime of the Islamic Republic of Iran and its replacement with an imperialist puppet regime, which is to say, the gang of Ashraf, Oveysi, Bakhtiar, and their parasites. This plan was organized with the direct participation of American, British, and French imperialism and their allies, with the cooperation of the most reactionary governments of the region including Israel, Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Jordan, Turkey, Pakistan, Oman, and the Arab Sheykdoms of the Persian Gulf. And the gang of Saddam and counter-revolutionaries in Iran were commissioned to carry it out.

The brave, heroic resistance of the Iranian revolutionary forces defeated this conspiracy in the early days [of its implementation]. But it is sure that even this defeat will not stop the enemies of the Iranian revolution from continuing to conspire for the overthrow the regime of the Islamic Republic. At this moment--in addition to the continuing agression of Iraq whose main goal is apparently to increase the hardships caused by the war and to weaken our newly founded republic against the imperialistic and counter-revolutionary conspiracies--the seventh conspiracy of the domestic counter-revolutionary forces, imperialism, and world-wide reaction, as well as other conspiracies, are in the making.

The main goal of the conspiracy which is already taking place is to turn large masses of the people away from the revolution and sow the seeds of enmity and dissention among the revolutionary forces. Should they succeed, they intend to impose civil war on the Iranian revolution.

The criminal government of Reagan does not hide this objective as it prepares itself to reap the benefits of such a possibility.

Alexander Haig, the U.S. Secretary of State, with the shamelessness characteristic of imperialists, has said:

> In the event of a civil war in Iran, the United States will have the opportunity to give emergency aid to the side it favors. The formation of a rapid deployment force and all the preparations around Iran made by the United States are the result of this probable plan. (KEYHAN, 17 Esfand 59 [Mar 81])

But with the spread of the revolutionary movement of our country, especially after the occupation of the U.S. conspiracy center in Tehran, and with the increased recognition of the masses of our people of the real enemies of the revolution, if the active operators of the revolution are able to mobilize all the people's forces to confront this conspiracy, we can be hopeful that this conspiracy will also end in an infamous defeat for the conspirators and their road rollers.

GAINS OF IRANIAN REVOLUTION

The united front of subversion tries to suggest through its propaganda that the Iranian revolution has failed, has been fruitless, and even it has made the condition of the people worse than it was during the domination of the Pahlavi era with its SAVAK regime. But, hard realities which are still alive and cannot be forgotten prove the opposite of this poisonous and misleading propaganda. In spite of all the pressures and the plots of the imperialists and the domestic counter-revolutionry forces; in spite of the impeding role of the "step-by-step liberal" government which had been penetrated by the agents of imperialism; in spite of the efforts of the monarchists and constitutionalists (the National Front, the Freedom Movement [Nehzat-e Azadi]), and in spite of those political and religious forces and personalities who have tried to confine the revolution within a framework which would safeguard the profit-seeking interests of the large capitalists and landowners, the Iranian revolution has been able:

--to send the hated, oppressive monarchical regime into the trashcan of history;

--to stop the criminal Pahlavi regime and a significant segment of the servants of and dependants on large capitalists and landowners, who were the main source of support for that regime, from plundering the political, economic, and cultural life of Iran;

--to overthrow the rule of the criminal SAVAK and to free thousands of political prisoners;

--to punish a significant portion of the criminals who were captured by the revolutionary forces, despite the efforts of the followers of the "step-by-step" policy to let them escape;

--to return a significant portion of the wealth plundered by these and other escaped criminals which was left in Iran--and this includes nearly 70 percent of the industrial units of the private sector and all the banks--to the hands of the plundered masses;

--to end the plundering and oppresive domination of the imperialists headed by U.S. imperialism, and to open the way for the establishment of a true independence in the political, economic, military, and cultural life of the country;

--to tear to shreds the infamous neo-colonialist agreement between Iran and the United States and release Iran from the imperialist CENTO military agreement in order to join the non-aligned countries;

--to send home tens of thousands of American, British, French, German, and Japanese leeches and spies who had taken over all of the vital arteries of our country, sucking the blood of the people and plundering our national wealth;

--to close down the military bases of American imperialism and to free the Iranian army from the absolute domination of U.S. masters;

--to remove the infamous scar of being the gendarme of the region from the image of our country and transform it to a cradle of revolution and one of the strongholds of the fight against world imperialism and regional reaction;

to blow up through the historical endeavor of the Students Following the Line of the Imam the "headquarters for the subversion of the Iranian revolution," that is, the U.S. spy nest in Tehran; to remove the mask of world-devouring American imperialism and its puppets, mercenaries, compromisers, and submissive elements who had infiltrated into the sensitive positions and the revolutionary government; and to put aside the "step-by-step" government which followed a policy leading to the mutilation of the Iranian revolution;

--to take a first step, in spite of all the disruptions and extensive instigations of counter-revolutionary and submissive elements, in following a foreign policy which well safeguard the interests and independence of the country;

--to sever diplomatic relations with the main, number-one enemy of the Iranian people, the United States and its direct puppets: Israel, Egypt, South Africa, and the monarchical puppet and affiliated governments of Jordan and Maghreb, and on the other hand, to establish strong ties of friendship and cooperation with combatant countries which support the resistance front of Moslem and progressive Arab countries, and to take steps to normalize relations with some of the other countries in the camp of worldwide anti-imperialism;

--to create revolutionary units in order to safeguard and preserve the gains of the revolution, and to carry on a continuous struggle against the counter-revolutionary plots and conspiracies;

--to prepare the constitutional law which, in spite of all its shortcomings, contains many positive points, and to establish a governmental units based on its principles;

--to purge the government offices, the cultural institutions, and the armed forces of a significant percentage of SAVAK agents, the mercenaries of the overthrown regime, and those affiliated with the imperialist espionage organizations;

--to take certain steps in resolving some of the most important and urgent social problems such as putting an end to the plundering domination of feudal and semi-feudal large landowners and to stop the plunder of large merchants by nationalizing the foreign trade and establishing governmental control over domestic distribution.

After all these gains, the claim that the Iranian revolution has failed and has accomplished nothing, is either based on ill will or mere blindness and deafness.

The historical importance of these gains becomes more significant when we consider the difficult conditions under which they have been achieved. The fact is that the truly faithful forces of the revolution have attained these goals by fighting three hostile, opposite and obstructive factors.

These three factors are:

--The efforts exerted by the enemy to end the revolution in failure.

--The efforts of the well-to-do classes and exploiters to hinder the progress of the revolution.

--The negative consequences of mistakes, absolutism, thirst for power, monopolism, and self-centeredness among the ranks of the revolutionary forces, which are the result of the stance and the class-oriented viewpoints of these forces.

The experience of the past two years provides much evidence that each one of these three factors have in turn inflicted painful blows on the stabilization, strengthening and expansion of the revolution. The present complicated, difficult situation is the result of the combined effect of these destructive factors.

1. THE GOAL AND THE OPERATIONAL METHODS OF THE ENEMIES OF THE REVOLUTION. The sworn, irreconcilable enemies of the Iranian revolution are as follows:

The imperialists and world-wide reaction, especially the regional reaction headed by the rabid, aggressive, criminal imperialism of the United States and all the supporters and those who still remain of the overthrown Pahlavi regime, that is, the large capitalists and landowners, usurers and speculators, SAVAK agents, and the local servants of that regime in the army, police, gendarmerie, and government institutions, all the plunderers and autocrats in the cities and villages, some of whom have fled and are involved in conspiracies from abroad, and others who remain in the country and who would not hesitate to commit any crime.

The goal of these enemies of the revolution has been clear from the days when the revolutionary movement of the Iranian people was reaching its peak. In short, their goal has been to bring defeat to this revolution at any price and at any stage possible, thereby returning the country to its former self, as in Indonesia, Chile, and Egypt.

The documents published so far and the events of the past two years support the fact that the enemies of the Iranian revolution, headed by American imperialism, have not even spared one moment in preparing and employing everything at their disposal to bring the Iranian revolution to a decisive defeat.

According to the evaluation of the Tudeh Party of Iran, thus far seven conspiracies of subversion to defeat the Iranian revolution have been planned and executed by imperialists and reactionary forces of the region as follows:

First, the conspiracy of a military coup before 22 Bahman [11 Feb];

Second, the conspiracy to deviate the revolution with the help of the government of the liberals;

Third, the conspiracy to exert pressure through the economic embargo following the occupation of the American spy nest, and in conjunction with this, another effort to deviate the Iranian revolution during the last months of 1358 [1979-80] by taking advantage of the events in Afghanistan;

Fourth, the invasion at Tabas and the accompanying coup plot;

Fifth, the Nozheh coup;

Sixth, Iraq's invasion of Iran;

Seventh, creation of disturbances throughout Iran during the months of Bahman [Jan-Feb] and Esfand [Feb-Mar].

The aim of all these conspiracies, in particular the American-Saddam conspiracy of the military invasion of Iran, has been and is to prevent the stabilization and strengthening of the Islamic Republic, and to weaken the country economically and socially to the point of collapse of the revolutionary regime, all of which has been an attempt to pave the way for the transfer of power into the hands of the counter-revolutionary functionaries.

There is not even the slightest doubt that these efforts will continue more violently and extensively in the future. If American imperialism has not yet, after 20 years, given up the economic embargo of Cuba, as well as all sorts of military intrigues just short of an invasion of that country, and has not given up the idea of overthrowing the revolutionary regime of Cuba, it is clear that as far as Iran is concerned, as Imam Khomeyni has rightly stated, we will be enemies of the United States for the rest of our lives. The economic, political and military strategic importance of our country is so vital to the transgressive domination plans of worldwide imperialism that the victory of our glorious revolution has caused much sleeplessness to the prime enemy of deprived people all over the world. The Iranian revolution, like a devastating earthquake throughout the world and particularly in the Middle and Near East, and the Persian Gulf, has destroyed not only one of the major imperialist bases of plunder and transgression, but it has violently shaken and made vulnerable many of the other bases. With this great effect throughout the world and especially in the region, it is quite understandable that the rage of imperialism and worldwide reaction, headed by American imperialism and directed against the Iranian revolution, cannot be cooled and the Iranian revolution will, in the future as in the past, face continuously and unceasingly its harshest criminal comspiracies.

2. THE OBSTACLES TO THE REVOLUTION Consist, first of all, of the liberal capitalists and the well-to-do classes who enjoyed various material privileges during the reign of the tyrant.

The fact is that these social classes, during the reign of the affilated regime of Pahlavi, participated within a certain framework in fighting to end despotism and limiting the uncontrolled plundering of the country by imperialist monopolies and the affiliated ruling classes. The reason is quite obvious. The rulers during the tyrannical regime--that is, imperialist monopolies, the Pahlavi family, and the ruling classes consisting of large landowners, capitalists, and corrupt thieves in the government administration, army, police, and SAVAK--so openly plundered our national wealth and the fruits of the labor of tens of millions of the working masses, and the producing force of the society, that there was relatively little left for the profit-seeking accumulators of wealth, and the middle class capitalists. This class had no dispute with the imperialist plundering, affiliated capitalism, or the Aryamehr [Pahlavi] regime. They accepted the shah, as well as the constitutional monarchy and maintaining relations with the imperialist world. These gentlemen only wanted a larger portion of the vast profits.

The efforts of this class and its affiliated organizations and political personalities have continuously, from the beginning of the revolutionary movement, been to prevent the revolution from rooting and spreading and to limit it in such a way as to safeguard the maximum profit for the Iranian capitalist liberals. The obvious stances of the National Front, the Freedom Movement [Nehzat-e Azadi] and the political organizations affiliated with the liberal bourgeoisie during the heightening of the revolutionary movement, and their disagreement with the decisive, anti-imperialist, anti-plundering orientation of Imam Khomeyni, which was supported by the people, best represents the true political nature of this bourgeois class.

Taking into consideration the characteristics of this class, it is quite clear that they only conditionally supported the revolution. Undoubtedly, if the revolution were victorious and not confined such that the liberals desired, they would use all their forces to slow down the development of the revolution, and if they were able to, they would return it to the limitations they desired.

Because of this particular hypocritical outlook, the 16th plenum of the Central Committee of the Tudeh Party of Iran in its political analysis concerning its future policy arrived at the conclusion that:

> ". . . Now the question is: How long will the unity displayed by the revolutionary movement of Iran during the overthrow of the regime last, and what will be the position of various classes and factions in the course of future events?
> ". . . What is certain is that the working class along with the toilers of cities and villages will struggle with all their might to attain all the goals of the national democratic revolution and will consistently retain their revolutionary stance to the end . . . .
> "Obviously, the liberal capitalism, which has supported the movement thusfar, will be trying to confine the movement within its own limited class interests, and will strive to weaken its humane and popular aspects. The experience of all revolutions has shown that with the expansion of a revolutionary movement in the direction of the needs of the deprived classes of the society, the liberal capitalists have turned away from the revolution and have reconciled with the remainder of counter-revolutionary forces, in order to suppress the popular movement of the toilers. It should be expected that within the revolutionary movement of our fatherland, too, such a phenomenon should develop. Even before the victory of the revolution, voices of discontent could be heard from this class concerning the progressive views of Ayatollah Khomeyni on the economic system of the Islamic Republic, and this discontent is increasing daily. This faction tries to confine the revolution to a referendum for a republic, to have elections for the Consultative Assembly, and to safeguard certain democratic freedoms, but to continue the previous calamitous economic policies of capitalism."

Thus was the evaluation of the Tudeh Party of Iran in the early days of the victory of the revolution. And the experiences of the past two years have revealed the unquestionable accuracy of this evaluation to the largest segments of the deprived masses of our society and particularly to a large segment of the revolutionary forces who did not agree with our evaluation at that time. Only one example of this development in understanding [our evaluation] will illustrate this great change. Ayatollah Mahdavi-Kani, the minister of the interior, in his sermon for the Friday prayer service on 24 Bahman 1359 [13 Feb 81] gave the following evaluation in connection with the role of this class:

> Before the revolution, many were with us, but afterwards they separated from us. Many of the merchants, too, changed their ways and having taken advantage of the situation, pocketed large profits. These individuals . . . create discontent among the people and harm the revolution.

The Iranian liberal bourgeoisie, by employing all its political and economic forces during the past two years and particularly during the eight months of the "step-by-step" government which was almost totally controlled by the political representatives of this class, tried to prevent the spread of the revolution and its anti-imperialist and anti-popular stance, which would totally dispel any kind of imperialistic domination over the political, military, economic and cultural affairs of our country and would limit the plunder of the deprived people in the society by the landowners and capitalist classes. The main policy of the liberals consisted of the absolute preservation of the previous capitalist system and extensive land ownership in Iran and the maintenance of a unilateral political, economic, military, and cultural relationship with worldwide imperialism headed by the United States, with certain modifications. And if the previous relationship with the United States was to be temporarily suspended, the relationships with Western Europe and Japan were to be strengthened.

Obviously, this policy is a "minimum" response to the wishes of the United States and its collaborators in Iran, since the United States correctly views this policy as a steam roller for the return to the previous relationship, which is, the establishment of the infernal domination of imperialism over all aspects of our country's social life.

3. THE CONSEQUENCES OF THE MISTAKES, ABSOLUTISM, THIRST FOR POWER, MONOPOLISM, AND SELF-CENTEREDNESS AMONG THE RANKS OF THE REVOLUTIONARY FORCES.

Undoubtedly, these negative, in many instances very negative, consequences, although they cannot all be considered conscious enmity with the revolution, slow down like painful obstacles the expansion of the glorious revolution of our country, and in practice help imperialism and counter-revolution and offer the opportunity to the wounded liberal bourgeoisie to take advantage of the situation for harming the revolution.

These characteristics are not exclusive to one side; they are found both on the "left" and on the right; and their source, both on the "left" and the right, is the petit bourgeoisie.

On the right, these characteristics can be witnessed in aggressive, fascist groups, roughnecks and their operators. The course of action which has created a favorable atmosphere today for the unknown counter-revolutionary and SAVAK elements who are now turning against those who were instrumental in creating them was the result of the monopolization of power aimed at the suppression of any view other than the narrow views of those who initiated it.

The spread of this course of action causes, on the one hand, the narrow-minded elements to restrict the stage for the united front of the true forces of the revolution and to set aside the valuable units who can actively and constructively take part in a common battle to achieve the most major goals of all the deprived classes of the society, and on the other hand, it opens the way for opportunists and hostile elements who can soon disguise themselves through means of trickery and hypocrisy in order to infiltrate the ranks of the monopolizers of power. Historical experience has shown that monopolistic groups soon become the race-course for hostile elements.

On the "left," monopolism, absolutism and self-centeredness can be seen among those leftist groups whose members, similar to the rightist monopolists and sectarians are, on the whole, sincere in their orientation, but because of the same deviant characteristics are, in practice, subject to incorrect orientation, regarding the necessities of the revolution at this historical moment. In this connection, too, riot-creating, destructive actions--i.e. exercising pressure and resorting to violence in order to impose the narrow-minded views of a group on others--have replaced the creative revolutionary approach. We can see that these courses of action, precisely like the deviant suppressive attitude of the rightists, have given rise to the violent deviation of the leftists, meaning, a sort of Maoist "cultural revolution" tendencies, which will end in the barbaric policies of Pol Pots.

Sectarianism among the ruling authorities has caused, on the one hand, mistakes and extremism which have resulted in irreparable damages to the constructive forces of the revolution, and on the other, the loss of valuable possibilities and opportunities in many instances. On the "left," sectarianism and self-centeredness have caused destruction and disunity. Consequently, as a result of their inclinations, the most favorable circumstances have been created for the activities of the enemies of the revolution and the profiteering of conciliatory and submissive liberals.

Attention to these three factors highlights the historical importance and value of the gains of the revolution.

This in itself indicates the great popular power of the revolution which, in spite of all these negative factors, has been able to substantially increase its gains, which include uprooting the imperialist domination, struggling to uproot the traces of despotic monarchy, attempting to limit the opportunity for plunder by the big landowners and capitalists, and securing freedom and better living conditions for the deprived classes of the society.

THE RULE AFTER THE VICTORY OF THE REVOLUTION

The most important results of the victory of the glorious revolution of Iran were the destruction of the plundering domination of imperialism headed by U.S. imperialism over our country and the overthrow of the regime of the despotic monarchy which was, in fact, nothing more than the crystalization of the rule of the big landowners and capitalists headed by the Pahlavi family, affiliated with worldwide imperialism.

With the overthrow of this regime, the way was paved for the rise to power of an anti-imperialistic and anti-despotic front which included great numbers of workers, peasants, craftsmen, shopkeepers, intellectuals and liberal capitalists. Within this front were various political inclinations from the supporters of Islam to the followers of scientific socialism. THE MOST DISTINGUISHED RELIGIO-POLITICAL AND SOCIAL PERSONALITY OF OUR SOCIETY IN THE RECENT YEARS, IMAM KHOMEYNI, who has enjoyed the confidence of the vast strata of the masses of people through his continuous, uncompromising struggle against the affiliated, despotic regime of monarchy and imperialist domination headed by U.S. imperialism, was confirmed by the people as the leader of the new revolutionary rule.

With the historical victory of the revolutionary forces over the remnants of the obstinate counter-revolutionary forces on 22 Bahman [11 Feb], a new governmental system, an offspring of the revolution in the form of a transitional government, and the revolutionary institutions, i.e. the Revolutionary Council, the committees, and the revolutionary courts which served as the cradle of the Revolutionary Guards Corps--were established.

The social class of this new rule was, in its early stages, totally anti-imperialistic and anti-dictatorial. For precisely this reason and from the first days of the establishment of the new rule two completely distinct trends were projected within the movement, as follows:

On the one hand, there was the transitional government which was almost totally in the hands of the political representatives of Iran's liberal bourgeoisie, and on the other, there was the popular faction of the ruling body which was trusted and confirmed by the anti-imperialistic, anti-despotic front of the people--that is, forces who, in addition to the overthrow of the dictatorship, demanded an over-all independence and social changes in the interest of the deprived classes. A battle to determine the direction of the revolution started between these two trends and was intensified day after day.

In the first stage, this competition within the relying body was concentrated, for the most part, on the issue of the relationship of the Iranian revolution with world imperialism headed by U.S. imperialism. The liberal flank, that is, the representative government of the liberal bourgeoisie and those liberals who had occupied their place within the units of the revolution had adopted an attitude comprising reconciliation with U.S. imperialism, the preservation of the capitalist system and big land ownership, compromise with affiliated capitalists and big landowners, an attempt to return the escaped landowners and capitalists, amnesty for arrested criminals, securing "liberal freedoms" for those affiliated with imperialism, taking an adverse and irreconcilable stance against the followers of scientific socialism in Iran and socialist countries, and thereby open enmity with the national liberation movements, especially the resistance front of the Arab peoples against U.S. imperialism and international Zionism.

Opposite this liberal flank was the political trend of the popular flank of the ruling body which, although it was not in any way united and homogeneous, advocated the following policy: irreconcilability with the United States; uprooting of imperialist domination, especially that of U.S. imperialism; punishing of traitors and the main devoted servants of the overthrown regime; confiscation of the wealth of fugitive traitors; and limiting the plunder of crooks for the sake of the deprived classes of the society.

Concerning a policy to deal with the followers of scientific socialism, socialist countries, and liberation movements, there existed and still exists serious descrepancies between these two flanks emanating from their different stances on relations with world imperialism.

The height of the conflict between these two trends came in Aban 1358 [Oct-Nov 1979] when, on the one hand, the liberal flank was preparing to collude with U.S. imperialism to the extent of visiting and consulting with Brzezinski, the operator of all the conspiracies against Iran, and on the other, the forces of the anti-imperialist popular flank of the revolution neutralized the collusion by occupying the main headquarters of counterrevolution and conspiracy, i.e. the U.S. spy nest, and thus dismissed the government of the liberals. From this date on, the ruling body of the Islamic Republic was re-established in a new form, which, for the most part, represents the popular flank of the revolutionary forces.

The dismissal of the government representing liberal capitalism did not mean that the liberals were discharged from all the organizations of the ruling body. On the contrary, for a long time they retained their very important and effective role in the Revolutionary Council, and, until the formation of the new government in Shahrivar 1359 [Aug-Sep 80], they controlled, more or less, all the ministries.

Hence, until the formation of the institutions of the Islamic Republic, that is, the opening of the Islamic Consultative Assembly and the appointment of the government and the Supreme Judicial Council, there was a dual ruling body and a liberal policy of compromising with U.S. imperialism dominating the actions of the government and particularly its foreign minister. It is only with the new government that one can say the rule of the popular flank over that of the liberal flank has been established on a relatively strong base.

THE MAKEUP OF THE RULING BODY IN THE NEW STAGE

1. From the Standpoint of Its [Social] Class Base

The present elements of the ruling body of the country, on the whole, consist of: legal institutions, including the leadership, the president, the Islamic Consultative Assembly, the Supreme Judicial Council of State, the cabinet, the Council of the Guardians of the Constitution, the pasdaran [the Revolutionary Guards] and the revolutionary courts, the revolutionary committees, the reconstruction crusade, the Mostaz'afin [underprivileged] Foundation, etc. These institutions are, on the whole, a mixture of the spectrum of representatives of the people as well as the liberal bourgeoisie. But the qualitative difference between the present ruling apparatus and that prior to the establishment of legal institutions lies in the specific gravity of various flanks in the overall makeup of the ruling body. During the reign of the provisional government, the operational period of the Revolutionary Council, and the previous government, the representatives of the liberal bourgeoisie weighed heavier in the government apparatus, but this weight has now been significantly reduced. The makeup of the majority in the Consultative Assembly and in the present government shows that the various classes of the people's representatives form a larger percentage of the legitimate ruling body. And the policies adopted by this ruling body in all areas--internal, economic, and also foreign policy--illustrates the fact that the liberal capitalists, who work with all their forces for reconciliation with U.S. imperailism, and who oppose any kind of limitation on the plunder by the big landowners and capitalists, have been weakened and have lost their paralyzing influence to a certain extent.

Within the revolutionary institutions--that is, the revolutionary courts, the revolutionary committees, and the pasdaran [Revolutionary Guards]--the division of power is, again, beneficial to the representatives and those connected with the popular flank. Of course, this does not mean that those connected with liberal capitalism, big landowners, and even elements affiliated with organized counterrevolution have been totally uprooted and eliminated from these institutions. On the contrary, and unfortunately, the fact which has frequently been pointed out by Imam Khomeyni must be accepted, which is that these counterrevolutionary, reconciliatory elements have penetrated all the institutions, and through hypocrisy, trickery, and pretentions to religious extremism, are operating against every legal wish of the masses and every liberal, progressive idea, by fomenting discontent, chaos, and instability among the people.

It is the duty of all the true forces of revolution to support, with all their energy, the anti-imperialistic, popular and liberal trends of the influential forces of the present ruling body, to expose the supporters of conservatism and backwardness, and save the true forces of the revolution from being irreparably damaged by such trends and inclinations.

2. FROM A POLITICAL AND SOCIAL POINT OF VIEW

From this point of view, in the present effective policy-making ruling body, that is, the majority of the Islamic Consultative Assembly, the government, the Supreme Judicial Council, the revolutionary courts, the committees, and the Revolutionary Guards Corps, there are three distinct trends which can be described as MONOPOLISM, REALISM, and CLEAR-SIGHTEDNESS.

The monopolist flank of the ruling body which can be characterized as sectarian extremism, refusing to recognize the rights of anyone with a different point of view--even the right to defend the country, the right to choose one's profession, and unfortunately not too rarely, the right to live--is still powerful, and by creating an atmosphere of pressure has an impact on all the actions of the ruling body by its damaging stances which result in the weakening of the resistance front vis-a-vis the enemies of the revolution.

A clear instance of the attitude of this flank is seen in the attack of the pressure groups on the activities centers of the Tudeh Party of Iran, a party whose every effort supports the revolution and the Islamic Republic. The inability of the influential authorities of the ruling body to deal with the illegal actions of this group is relected in the pressures put on our Party for more than eight months now, [during which time] they have refrained from giving back our party headquarters, despite the fact that such pressures are against the Constitutional laws which have been accepted by the ruling body.

But what can be regarded as a hopeful sign is that in the course of dealing with the various difficulties of everyday life, in confronting the conspiracies of the foreign and domestic enemies of the revolution, realism and clear-sightedness in all areas is becoming more wide-spread among the ruling body, in spite of the disruptions of liberal capitalists and the increasing problems resulting from the fundamental changes in the politically, economically, and culturally affiliated regime of the "Aryamehr" [ex-Shah's title] era.

The speed of this growth is still slow, but we can hope that life, the great teacher, will increase speed.

Undoubtedly, the continuous struggle of the great masses of the toilers of our country to stabilize, strengthen, and expand the Iranian revolution--which secures all the economic, political, and cultural rights of these masses--and, as an inseparable part of this struggle, a major effort to break down all the conspiracies of the enemies of Iran's revolution headed by U.S. imperialism, will strengthen the trends of realism and clear-sightedness in the ruling body of Iran.

THE PRESENT STATE OF THE REVOLUTIONARY BATTLEFIELD

A historic struggle is now being fought on several fronts and with ever-increasing intensity by the genuine, anti-imperialist, popular forces of the revolution. In this connection it must be noted that the composition of the popular forces fighting on all these fronts lacks homogeneity and this has produced complications and confusions so typical of the glorious revolution in our homeland.

There is no doubt that the hardest and most fateful battle is now being waged by genuine anti-imperialist forces against the strategems and multifarious plots of the enemies of the Iranian revolution, who include the imperialists, international reaction and local counterrevolutionaries led by U.S. imperialism. This battle is being fought with unprecedented ferocity in all aspects of social life and in the politico-military, economic and cultural fields, where international imperialism and its supporters in Iran have exerted all their hellish strength in attempts to defer the Iranian revolution and restore past conditions.

There are four fronts participating actively in the revolution: The "subversion front," the "compromise and surrender front," the "resistance front" and the "middle-of-the-road forces."

The subversion front, which operates under the direct leadership of U.S. imperialism, is engaged in the implementation of three simultaneous plans. These have a single aim, although the methods used to realize them differ. The three plans consist first of the overthrow of the present government abd its replacement with a middle-of-the-road government similar to the "step-by-step" provisional government, on which will secure and guarantee America's "vital interests" in Iran and the regionè second, the plan is to prepare for a counterrevolutionary coup, involving first the exacerbation of the internal situation and the undermining of the stability of the Islamic Republic, thus leading to violent moves on the part of counterrevolutionaries aided by the intervention of counterrevolutionary forces abroad and reactionary regional governments who have sided with the enemies of the Iranian revolution.

According to unimpeachable reports, the governments of Egypt, Turkey, Iraq, Saudi Arabia, Oman and Pakistan are involved in this plan, in association with counterrevolutionaries led by Ashraf, Oveysi and Bakhtiar, whose headquarters in London, Paris and Washington, the capital cities of the leading imperialist countries, are now the scene of feverish activity.

Third, there is the final plan involving direct intervention by imperialism. American imperialism has created a big military force in the region. In fact there has been no such concentration of forces by imperialism since World War II. At present over 60 American, French and British warships and tens of thousands of aggressive American troops are carrying out a series of maneuvers very close to Iranian territory in company with large subservient military forces under the command of imperialism, so that if other imperialist plans to overthrow the Islamic Republic of Iran should fail, they can go into action directly.

It would be wrong to suppose that the U.S. has learned a lesson from its bitter experience of aggression in Vietnam, or that because of the presence of the Soviet Union situated to the north of Iran it will not embark on such a dangerous adventure. One of the peculiarities of U.S. foreign policy since World War II has been precisely this sort of adventurism, which is divorced from any "sound political logic."

Time and time again the Tudeh Party of Iran has warned against the pursuit of such adventures by the domineering foreign policy of imperialism, in particular the rabid and aggressive form of American imperialism, and historical events have confirmed the accuracy of these warnings with mathematical precision. One factor which actively encourages the United States to pursue such adventures is undoubtedly the existence of an intensely hostile stance towards the socialist world and the Soviet Union in particular not only by the remnants of the reactionary ruling class, that is, the plunderers, the big landowners and capitalists and "aryamehr" [shah's title] counterrevolutionaries but also by an important section of the present government.

The bitter experience of 28 Mordad [pro-shah coup in 1953] showed that the pursuit of a hostile policy toward forces supporting scientific socialism in Iran and abroad can lead to an imperialist and reactionary coup or at least open the door to a "middle-of-the-road and reasonable" government which, to quote American sources, will guarantee to maintain U.S. interests in the region.

The United States is exploiting the Afghanistan experience, an area where a considerable section of the effective forces of the Islamic Republic of Iran have become embroiled in the subversive plans of American imperialism, yet instead of doing something to neutralize this threatening imperialist plot hatched by the U.S., Pakistan and China, the success of which could greatly threaten the Islamic Republic of Iran directly, it continues to support it in practice.

For this reason the U.S. is spreading deceitful propaganda, blowing up "the communist threat," the "threat of Soviet attack," the "threat of a Tudeh Party coup," so that, just as happened in the weeks before 28 Mordad, the ground might be prepared for its conspiracy.

The identifiable forces of the "subverion front" consist locally of remnants of the supporters of the toppled regime, that is, the big landowners, the subservient, big capitalists, the supporters and lackeys of that regime, including the Savak agents and their ilk, in government organizations and in the armed forces, and the thugs and club-wielders, heroin peddlers, thieves and smugglers who have always worked for Savak. To these forces may be added America's political fifth column operating in the form of the minuscule quasi-fascist, pseudo-leftist, Chinese-American groups, such as "Ranjbar," the "Peykaris," the "Ettehadiyeh-ye Komunisti," the "Komeleh," the Qasemlu wing of the KDP of Iran and counterrevolutionary groups In Kordestan, Baluchestan and elsewhere. The actions of these groups since their inception have always been directed towards sowing discord among the genuine forces of the revolution and creating unrest as a prelude to counterrevolutionary activity, a phenomenon which is not confined to the Iranian revolution and Iranian society but is international. A clear, simple definition of this would be "American-left," while its role is exactly that of "American-Islam." If it succeeds in seizing power, it will repeat the criminal policies of the Pol Pot regime and Hafizollah Amin in Cambodia and Afghanistan, in order to create an attitude of despair among the people towards true communism, and if they cannot do this they will hinder the expansion and undermine the solidarity of the revolutionary movement, after which they will thwart and smash the revolution itself.

The role of these criminals was most evident in Chile and Portugal, and they are now making the revolution in our homeland their stamping ground.

FORCES OF THE 'COMPROMISE AND SURRENDER FRONT'

The class of liberal capitalists, intellectuals, affluent salary-earners and the elite of the "Aryamehr" society and, politically speaking, all westernized members of our society for whom the country was merely a source of huge incomes to be spent in Paris, London and Washington, have come together to join these forces, whose ultimate aim is not, however, exactly the same as the subversion front. They do not want a revival of the "Aryamehr" regime in all its dimensions. They want to expel the radical and persistently anti-imperialist people's forces from the government and to come to terms with the American-led imperialists and provide guarantees for imperialism's vital interests, namely the preservation in Iran of a capitalist system dependent on the imperialist world, the continuation of Iran's military dependence on the U.S. and the west, the adoption of a local policy openly at war with communism and the Soviet Union, cooperation with other reactionary countries of the region, refusal to cooperate with progressive Arab [and other] countries and to support national liberation movements, particularly that of the Palestinian people. In short, these forces wish to see the imposition of a regime similar to that of Turkey before the military coup, or Greece, Spain or Portugal, that is, a regime which is outwardly democratic but at the same time bound by a thousand links to the imperialist camp. In their readiness for compromise and retreat, these forces will even go as far as to accept a "constitutional monarchy."

Now that most of them have been dismissed from office, their most urgent and pressing aim coincides with the aim of the "subversion front," i.e. counterrevolution and imperialism. Both these fronts are exerting all their efforts in attempts to overthrow the present government and replace it with a "middle-of-the-road, moderate and reasonable" government, advocated by Reagan's gang as the protector of America's vital interests in Iran and the region--we repeat, "the protector of America's vital interests in Iran and in the region--and they hope that with such a government coming to power the closely-knit relations of the past could be renewed.

Organizations which can be identified in this camp consist of the "national front," the groups and minuscule groupings associated with it, the "freedom movement," the president-people coordination office and also smaller groups such as the "Jama" and similar organizations which obey this front while claiming to be independent and to hold views of their own.

The political representatives of the "compromise and surrender front" are not homogeneous but are drawn from a motley spectrum ranging from Amir-Entezam Hazih, Maraghe'i and some other ignominious dependents of imperialism to such liberal personages like engineer Bazargan and other dyed-in-the-wool liberals resembling him, who "sincerely" and "faithfully" defend capitalism, and whose tempers flare at the mere mention of worker, peasant, artisan, toiler, and the rights of these working people, and on this basis they "sincerely" and "faithfully" fall into the trap of the exposed and unexposed Amir-Entezams, and are being controlled by them.

RESISTANCE FRONT FORCES

The great army of this front is composed of the vast majority of workers, peasants and the toiling classes of tradesmen, craftsmen and intellectuals, the brave fighters of the anti-imperialist and anti-despotic front,whether in the guards corps, the mobilization organization for the underprivileged, the reconstruction crusade volunteers and the genuine forces supporting the revolution, whether religious or political.

The resistance front forces are drawn from a broad and motley spectrum, but it has one common viewpoint and approach in its actions, which involve ceaseless and irreconcilable struggle towards ending the tyrannical and plundering domination of imperialism and "aryamehr" counterrevolution. This spectrum, which has incurred the severest hatred of the imperialistic and counterrevolution camp, compromisers and defeatists, ranges on the one hand from the most sectarian religious elements to genuine followers of scientific socialism. Between the two extremes, the struggle is being fought by large numbers of religious fighters following the Imam Khomeyni's line and also by other truly popular, anti-imperialist and progressive forces.

The sad truth must be mentioned that lack of experience, narrow-mindedness and monopolism on the part of the sectarian forces has caused the front not to succeed in using all of its forces. This situation, at such a difficult juncture in the Iranian revolution's historic battle against the enemies and the compromisers, has inflicted irreparable harm on the revolution. This narrow-mindedness has enabled enemy elements pretending to be Muslims to place their lackeys inside many of the revolutionary institutions, and once installed in sensitive positions, to sow the seeds of discord.

This is dear to the hearts of the enemies of the Iranian revolution, like the compromisers and the defeatists, and they have launched an extensive campaign which aims to intensify this harmful phenomenon. All enemy radio propaganda, such as that of VOA, the BBC, Radio Israel, and the radios of Cairo, Baghdad, Bakhtiar and Oveysi, as well as newspapers associated with compromising and defeatist liberal groups in Iran, has as its basic policy the enlargement of split within the resistance front forces.

In the fateful battle now underway between the supporters and enemies of the Iranian revolution, the revolutionary forces can, as in the past, rely on unstinting and all-round support from the entire forces of anti-imperialist front all over the world, including the family of socialist states, the revolutionary workers movement in developed capitalist countries, and the genuine national liberation movements, as well as countries where these forces are in control of governmental powers.

Our own revolution has received valuable assistance from unstinting support given hitherto, whether during the period of the historic battle to topple the monarchical regime, the battle for the stabilization and consolidation of the Islamic Republic, or the struggle wages against the multifarious plots by American imperialism and its accomplices, particularly during the economic blockade. And this support will undoubtedly continue in the future in all its dimensions as before.

THE 'MIDDLE-OF-THE-ROAD' FORCES

Alongside the three main camps on the battle arena in our country there are other moderate forces consisting of organizations, groups and social and political figures, who manifest a dual identity: on the one hand, they declare their policy to be contained within a framework of relentless and irreconcilable stances against imperialism, yet in practice they operate alongside compromising and defeatist forces and even, in some instances, with the subversive forces.

The middle-of-the-Road forces which do not, definitely, fit into the above three political camps consist of:

The Mojahedin-e Khalq, the minority group of the Cherikha-ye Feda'i-ye Khalq, and similar leftist minigroups such as the "Rah-e Kargar" [the workers' road] Of course, the stances of these moderate groups lack uniformity and, although they are comparatively close to each other, particularly in the field of political action, serious differences exist between them. These groups have, in the main, adopted stances which are anti-imperialist and against despotism, and support the people's demands, but, in practice, in the accurate assessment of the moment, they are subjected to a serious swing to the left and, as a consequence of the adoption of this leftist stance, which has led them to take measures aimed at weakening and overthrow of the present ruling power, i.e. the majority in the Majlis and the present government, they are in practical terms on the same side as the liberals and those forces which seek the overthrow of the Islamic Republic. The analysis which these forces present of their adopted stance is that apparently the chief danger threatening the fate of the Iranian revolution comes not from imperialism in the first place or from liberal capitalism, as the steamroller for the return [of imperialism]. They argue that by depriving the present ruling power (i.e. the Majlis majority and the government) of the power to govern, the most important stumbling-block in the path of the expansion and promotion of the revolution will have been eliminated, and consequently, ruling power will fall into the hands of the "radical, revolutionary forces" (meaning themselves).

As we know, the experience of many revolutions, and that of Portugal as a recent case, shows quite clearly the painful consequences that can befall a revolution as a result of such fanciful and adventurous assessments. We must add, of course, that heavy responsibility in this regard must fall on extremist, monopolist forces of the right, who have used measures aimed against freedom and intensified strife and disunity among the genuine forces supporting our homeland's popular, anti-imperialist revolution.

Our party continues to hold the view that all this is based on the fact that these forces have swung to the left, and this has resulted in the flights of fancy, visible in their assessments of the realities. So long as these evaluations are maintained, we shall strive to rescue genuine revolutionary forces, whose rightful place is on the people's united front, from this wayward path.

As we know, within the Feda'i-ye Khalq Guerrillas, who held similar evaluations until recently, a serious development took place towards gaining a scientific understanding of the realities, and the majority of supporters of this organization overcame their past errors. It is our hope that the future developments and experiences of our movement will help other young forces which continue to follow incorrect stances.

In this connection, we must also examine the stances of a group of politican figures, especially those Majlis deputies who, in spite of the fact that as a whole they support Imam Khomeyni's line and that their position is anti-imperialist and popular, nevertheless side in their confrontation with the present government of the Islamic Republic with the liberals in many instances, while on major issues affecting the revolution's fate--in the case of their stance against imperialism and the need for fundamental changes in the interests of the deprived classes of the society--they clearly oppose the liberals.

In our view, responsibility for the emergence of this phenomenon lies chiefly with the monopolist elements in the spectrum of the present government's supporters. The policy of this group, which is in no way prepared to tolerate any sort of opposition to its political and social stances, even for cooperation on a single front, is most effective in "expelling" many individuals who have independent ideas or who make independent judgments.

Without doubt, these monopolist attitudes constitute one of the chief and most dangerous obstacles to the most important and pressing imperatives of the revolution, i.e. the unity of all forces supporting the stabilization, consolidation and expansion of the revolution in adopting anti-imperialist stances.

Flagrant aggression practiced by pressure groups against the democratic rights provided by the constitution has been a major factor in the intensification of this phenomenon.

IN THE ARENA FOR THE ATTAINMENT OF DEMOCRATIC FREEDOMS

The claim by counterrevolutionary and imperialist propaganda organs and by compromisers and defeatists that there has been no visible change in Iran as regards limitations on freedom, and that one despotism has been overthrown and replaced by another is nothing more than a nasty, unwarranted and demagogic lie. In fact, one of the main achievements of our glorious revolution has been the defeat of the awful nightmare of Savak repression, and official recognition of individual and social freedoms. However, of course it cannot be said that the freedoms gained and secured in our revolutionary society are as reasonable and logical as those which ought to be secured, guaranteed and stabilized following a popular and anti-imperialist revolution.

In the political arena, there are variations in the scope and meaning of freedom as understood by the different elements which make up the vast spectrum of forces participating in our country's revolution. In pursuit of its class stance, each group wants for itself unrestricted freedom, but seeks to impose and tighten restrictions on other classes in proportion to the extent that it is at odds with them.

Rightist sectarians of the ruling-class front enjoy positions of absolute freedom, unfettered by any constitutional restrictions, and in deed and word as well as in their publications those who call themselves the protectors and guardians of the constitution of the Islamic Republic permit themselves to trample on the individual and social freedoms provided by the constitution, to attack rallies, lectures and offices and burn down shops selling the books of any organization which does not agree totally with their views, to injure people and to enlist the aid of their members in the revolutionary institutions to compile dossiers on them, and to incite ignorant people against them. These groups, which support mob rule, and those who, in the words of the ETTELA'AT editorial (Feb. 1980) viewed their first "brilliant deeds" with an approving eye, provided the best possible facilities for counterrevolution and professional adventurers. They forgot that it is as easy as pie for counterrevolutionaries to buy over a few hundred desperate smugglers and heroin-peddling lackeys, to place them in the ranks of the Hezbollah, and to incite ignorant and fanatical youths.

The supporters of the Islamic Republic have thus provided counterrevolution with the finest weapons available to subversive forces for the purpose of weakening the Islamic Republic in the wake of renewed social unrest and civil war, in order to prepare the ground for a counterrevolutionary coup, and they have enabled the compromisers and defeatists to exploit these events for demagogic purposes, by pretending to be supporters of law and freedom, and to attract a wide section of the people, who naturally and justifiably demand peace and order and the rule of law.

For itself, counterrevolution demands the total freedom of the period of the "step-by-step" government, but seeks to restrict freedom for the most relentlessly anti-imperialist and anti-despotic forces. Counterrevolution is not content with such newspapers as RANJBAR, 'ADALAT and others, but also demands the right of publication for AYANDEGAN, BAMDAD and TEHRAN-E MOSAVVAR, Etc., and it demands freedom for demonstrations of Savak agents, and for the national democratic front, supporters of Nazih, Matin-Daftari and Moqaddam. Maraghe'i, for the Muslim people's republican party and for similar minigroups, while demanding the closure of such relentlessly revolutionary organizations as the Tudeh party of Iran.

Counterrevolution complains loudly of lack of freedom, although it enjoys comparatively wider freedoms [than others]. Under the wing of rightist sectarians, counter revolutionaries freely mount attacks on opposition demonstrations using stones, clubs and firearms, and set fire to bookshops in the name of the Hezbollah [God's party] they raid and plunder the clubs and headquarters of parties and anti-imperialist groups and, with the protection of liberals and by exploiting rightist club-wielders, they audaciously attack rallies and even centers of the Islamic republican party, the most important political organization, a governmental coalition with the majority of the Islamic consultative assembly.

Counterrevolution demands that this "freedom" for subversive purposes be legalized.

It may thus be seen, that the actions of a section of extremist sectarian forces, in spite of its selflessness and stances on the battlefield aimed at uprooting imperialist domination, and securing, in practice, individual and social freedoms guaranteed by the constitution, resemble those of the revolution's enemies in trampling on those very freedoms which are vital to the strengthening of the Islamic Republic regime.

It is, unfortunately, one of the harmful "characteristics" of the present stage of the Iranian revolution.

The spectrum of compromisers and defeatist forces also demand these freedoms within the same framework. The head of the provisional government, engineer Bazargan, whose policy was a crystalization of the demands of liberal-capitalism in Iran, during the early days of the revolution, when total freedom had been secured for TEHRAN-E MOSAVVAR, AYANDEGAN and the SAVAK agents, frequently invoked the black law of 1310 [1931] passed by Reza Khan against the Iranian Tudeh party, thus recognizing that enactment as lawful.

This is the best example of the freedom of which the liberals boast.

Protected by the total freedom given to counterrevolution, and paralyzing the relentless revolutionary forces and restricting them by using a Reza Khan law, the compromisers are best able to play their historical role, i.e. the role of a steamroller, in order to pave the way for a return to imperialist subservience.

Against these three are ranged the realistic and clear-sighted forces of supporters of the Imam's line and the sound forces and followers of scientific socialism, who are demanding the implementation of all the provisions of the constitution, including the securing and guarantee of freedom for all the forces which seek to stabilize, consolidate and expand our country's glorious revolution. In other words, the uprooting of imperialist domination and the prevention of a return of the plunderers, restraint of the ruling class which supports the [former] satanic regime, i.e. the big landowners and subservient capitalists, the implementation of basic changes in the interests of the deprived members of the society and, in short, to secure the full political, military, economic and cultural independence of our homeland, supported by the immortal power of the deprived masses. In other words, freedom to promote the revolution and not to overthrow it, freedom for social progress not regression, freedom to help along the path to and sacrifice for the sake of revolution, not for sabotage, conspiracy and the imposition of another form of strangulation.

The tens of millions of toiling workers, peasants, artisans and intellectuals are the firm supporters of this [kind of] freedom, and they are fighting incessantly for it.

The foregoing is a summarized account of the three main characteristics of the present political scene of our society.

THE ARENA OF SOCIAL AND ECONOMIC CHANGES

The third goal of the glorious revolution of our homeland, for the success of which tens of thousands of the deprived members of the society in the cities and the dispossessed people of the countryside sacrificed their lives, and hundreds of thousands ruined their health, was to remove the socio-economic system bequeathed by the despotic monarchical regime supported by the big landowners and capitalists, and replace it with a just system in which national assets and the fruits of labor are used to improve living conditions among the slum-dwellers and toilers in urban and rural areas.

In this arena, tens of millions of workers, peasants, artisans, small traders and hard-working intellectuals are ranged on one side, against the big landowners, property tycoons, merchants, capitalists, a large gang of land-hungry plunderers, speculators, brokers, forward purchasers, wholesalers and middlemen, on the other.

In spite of valuable services rendered by institutions inspired by the revolution, such as the crusade for reconstruction, and the seven-man boards responsible for effecting land reforms to benefit the landless peasants and small holders. It is regrettably still true that a considerable section of the political forces which are actively and unceasingly engaged in the fight to secure national independence is not yet convinced of the undeniable and unbreakable link between the road to uprooting imperialist domination and tyrannical plunder and the implementation of fundamental changes in the country's economic system, in the interests of the deprived members of society, and to restrict the depredations of plunderers and profiteers. The enemies of the Iranian revolution and the liberal capitalist forces of compromisers and defeatists, who are the irreconcilable and implacable enemies of this revolutionary policy in Iran, have exerted all their might in efforts to slow down the advance along these lines, and their most important weapons are sabotage in the public sector of the economy, widespread, provocative propaganda and demagogy, with which they oppose those making relentless efforts to effect fundamental changes in the interests of the deprived members of society. They even go as far as to slap the lable of "communist" and "anti-religious" on such measures as sugar rationing in wartime, thus trying to incite the ignorant religious masses against such measures. The unprecedented mobilization of the big landowners, who by supporting the liberal capitalists' arsenals and propaganda organs and also by supporting the section of the clergy associated with large-scale land holdings and capitalism, [in attacks] on land reform, which aims to eliminate the remnants of feudalism in the Iranian rural areas, indicates the extent to which the subversion forces and liberal compromisers, and a section of the clergy associated with colonizers, have joined forces, and have gone into action in a deliberate alliance.

Most regrettably, it must be said that sectarian monopolists and deliberate action on the part of counterrevolutionary elements who, by growing beards and holding prayer-beads, have joined the ranks of the Muslim revolutionary fighters, when many of the genuine fighters are losing their lives on the battlefields, and are infiltrating sensitive governmental posts at an ever-increasing rate, creating conditions enabling them to frustrate the government's positive measures, allowing the liberals to claim that they alone can keep the wheels of the economy and the machinery of government moving.

The foregoing is a summary of the state of the political forces within the country.

CONCLUSION

In general, the main results of the struggle [achieved] during the first two years of the revolution could be described as follows:

1--Considerable deepening and intensification of the seriousness of the revolution as regards its main policy directions, i.e. in the battle for ending imperialist domination and fundamental changes in the interests of the underprivileged.

2--The growth and legal stabilization of forms of "shovra" [council or soviets administration, in the social and economic life of urban and rural toilers, within a clearly-defined framework in the executive organs of government and the armed forces--although this positive process has met with certain obstacles from the outset, and remains incomplete.

3--The emergence and growth of embryos of political realism among an important section of the genuine forces of the revolution in the fields of:

--Gaining acquaintance with the great hardships confronting the stability, consolidation and expansion process of the revolutions;

--Partial identification of the revolution's true supporters within the society, and its true friends in the international political arena;

--More profound knowledge of imperialism, its diverse conspiracies and its facilities;

--Identification of the half-way friends of the revolution, who include the liberal capitalists and their political representatives.

4--The "legalized" desertion by the compromisers and defeatists, i.e. the liberal capitalists and all their associates, from the revolution, and their tendency to cooperate with the revolution's enemies.

5--An increase in the various hardships which obstruct the revolution's stabilization, consolidation and expansion. These include:

--Hardships arising from visible factors, such as the imperialist economic blockade, socio-economic changes, counter-revolutionary sabotage, and the obstructive role of liberal capitalism, the consequences of the adventurous methods used by left-inclined groups and, finally, the consequences of the imposed imperialist Saddam-American war on our homeland.

--Hardships arising from certain abstract factors, the main one being the present government's ineptitude when faced with the necessity of making quick and decisive resolutions against profiteering by the liberal capitalists and remnants of the "Aryamehr" ruling class, i.e. the big commercial capitalists and landowners, to which this important factor may be added.

--The consequences of monopoly-seeking by extremist forces in the management of the economy, resulting in the removal of an important section of genuine pro-revolution forces from the reconstruction program, thus clearing the field for sabotage by adventurous elements and counter-revolutionary agents, to sow disunity and strife; and, finally, the consequences of inexperience and egotism among the administrators of the Islamic Republic and the lack of attention to constructive proposals [for the revolution] coming from sympathetic forces.

The harmful results of the actions of forces referred to in this report as "middle-of-the-road" [are obvious]. Regrettably these forces, instead of concentrating their attention on adopting a fundamental policy for the revolution at this time, i.e. the struggle against imperialist conspiracies and plots, rendering valuable service to the people's glorious revolution in our homeland, refraining from sectarianism and left-leaning monopolism, and employing revolutionary confrontation based on creative insight, realism and clear-sightedness to differentiate the revolution's friends from its foes, they provide grist to the mill of the revolution's enemies through the incorrect policies and actions they adopt.

We thus witness the fact today, that the Iranian revolution, having experienced a series of remarkable historic victories, is beset on one side with many hardships, and on the other with an ever-increasing number of plots hatched by [its] enemies, in addition to which it has not succeeded in evolving decisive methods with which to mobilize all the faculties it possesses, in order to smash enemy plots and surmount hardships.

It is obvious that increased hardships will enervate and deplete the revolutionary forces and pave the way for the success of enemy plots.

This is the main cause of concern occupying the minds of all genuine and well-informed forces of the Iranian revolution. This concern becomes more alarming when the present turmoil in Iran is seen in the context of present-day world events, which indicate that the aggressive, imperialist and international reactionary circles led by rabid American imperialism is enlarging the scope of plots, political provocations, and aggressive military interventions for the purpose of crushing national liberation movements. It is a great error to separate what is happening in Iran from events taking shape in the world at large. For this reason, it is necessary to review the international scene, [as well].

B. THE POLITICAL SITUATION IN THE WORLD TODAY

Undoubtedly, the determining direction and basis for the changes in the political situation in the world is developing to the advantage of the camp of worldwide anti-imperialism and to the disadvantage of imperialism, to the advantage of the progress of socialism and the disadvantage of monopolistic capitalistic rule, to the advantage of the deprived masses of the developing nations and the disadvantage of neo-colonialism. This historical battle which began with the great October Revolution, the first determining, irreversible victory of working power over capital, during its short historical period of 63 years, has been able to change radically the image of the world, and to provide conditions, with an ever-increasing velocity, for the victory of other deprived masses. A comparison of changes alone in the world during the three decades of '50s, '60s, and '70s after World War II, clearly shows this increasing velocity.

It would be enough to view only the great historical achievements of the past ten years. Even a brief study shows that the struggle of the deprived masses in the three continents of Asia, Africa, and Latin America has not only quantitatively but also qualitatively evolved in the direction of perfection. With the great victory of the people of Viet Nam over the criminal aggression of U.S. imperialism, as a result of which for the first time in its two-hundred-year history the snout of this criminal superpower was rubbed into the ground, great changes have begun throughout the world in the interest of the deprived masses. In the period between the defeat of the American aggression in Viet Nam up to this date, we have witnessed that the plunderous domination of neo-colonialism has been eliminated in more than 12 countries of the most important regions of the world. In South Viet Nam, Laos, Cambodia, Angola, Mozambique, Guinea-Bissau, Ethiopia, Benin, Afghanistan, Iran, Nicaragua, and Zimbabwe, the victorious anti-imperialistic, popular revolutions have overthrown the evil, reactionary, dependent regimes of neo-colonialism. In the absolute majority of these counties the persistent revolutionary forces took over the leadership of the revolution and secured the development of their country directed towards socialism. In three European countries, Spain, Portugal, and Greece, fascist regimes were overthrown. These are the most significant victories of the deprived masses achieved in their battle waged against world-devouring imperialism and its dependent reaction.

In the battle between these two world systems, i.e.e socialism and imperialism, the balance of power has shifted significantly to the advantage of socialism because of the great, ever-ongoing economic, cultural, and social developments in Socialist countries, and because of the intensification of various fundamental crises in imperialist countries.

In 1980, which was the last year of the Soviet Union's five-year plan, industrial production in that country went beyond the 20 percent increase in industrial production of the entire world, while its population is less than 6 percent of the population of the world. The superiority of the socialist system becomes more obvious when we take into consideration the fact that industrial production in that country in 1913, that is, the highest level of production before the October Revolution, was only 3 percent of world industrial production. In agricultural production as well, despite the fact that during 3 of the 5-years plan weather conditions have been most unfavorable for agriculture, the average grain production has reached an unprecedented annual amount of 205 million tons. During this plan, the actual average of the per capita income of the Soviet people increased by 17 percent. More than 50 million Soviet people moved into 12 million newly-constructed residential units. At the end of this plan, the number of physicians in the Soviet Union exceeded 1 million. Now, there are 37 doctors for every 10 thousand Soviet people, the highest figure in the world. All these great victories have been achieved even though 20 of the 64 years since the October Revolution were wasted on civil war, foreign military intervention, World War [II], and the reconstruction of what was ruined because of these wars.

This rapid growth and immediate expansion will continue also in the future. For instance, according to the forecast of the five-year plan for 1980-85, the national income of the Soviet Union will increase by 18-20 percent, industries by 26-28 percent, and agriculture by 12-14 percent. The average grain production will reach 238-243 million tons per year, and more than 50 million Soviet people will be housed in 12 million newly-constructed residential units.

Of course, the loudspeakers of world capitalism, who are staring enviously and begrudgingly at these achievements, use every propaganda means available to them throughout the world, including the American-made CIA newspapers in Iran, to distort these obvious facts. Along with these loudspeakers are those unenlightened individuals who are entrapped by these distortions and close their eyes to the truth. In addition to these loudspeakers, there exist also inwardly blind people who fall into the trap of these distortions, or pretend not to see these facts. But in spite of this wretched attempt by world capitalism, and in spite of the regressive efforts of the inwardly blind elements, this is an era of the final collapse of the plunderous system of capitalism and the irreversible victory of socialism throughout the world, and no lie, trickery, conspiracy, crime and vileness of world imperialism and counterrevolution will be able to change this trend of the history.

But, in imperialist countries, the problems which are the outcome of the economic crisis of 1974-75, having not yet been resolved, a new era of crisis has begun. Since the middle of 1979, economic activities in major imperialist countries have been on a decline. In the second half of 1980, in 24 developed capitalist countries social production has decreased by 1 percent. This crisis started in the United States, then spread to England, Canada, and finally to the most stable imperialist country, i.e. the Federal Republic of Germany. In the economy of the United States the forecase is that this year domestic production will decrease by about 3 percent.

At the present time, there are more than 20 million unemployed people in the developed capitalist countries. All indications show that this huge army of the unemployed will grow even larger this year.

On the basis of these great developments on the two great world battlefields, the efforts of the peace-supporting forces have succeeded significantly in quelling disturbances. Thus, this factor which provides the opportunity to aggressive imperialist forces to interfere in the internal affairs of nations was limited to a great extent. We should note one historical fact, that under the conditions of the decade of the 1960s, i.e. the unsuccessful military invasion of Viet Nam by the United States, in spite of the flood of protest from all over the world, the United States was able, for the purpose of suppressing the liberation movement of Viet Nam, to dispatch to that country the largest number of troops in its own history--that is, an army of 600,000 well-equipped soldiers exceeding the number of military forces sent to Europe during World War II--and to drop on Viet Nam three times the amount of bombs used in World War II. After a few years, because of the significant changes which occurred throughout the world, the United States lost its courage to carry out such interference in Iran and Nicaragua, and was unable to confront the revolutions of these countries in its usual manners. This comparison also shows that the change in the proportion of forces in favor of socialism and anti-imperialistic liberation movements, and as a result, the progress of the peacekeeping policy has provided great new potential for the success of the movements of the deprived nations. It is under such favorable historical conditions and with the friendship and cooperation of national liberation forces and the great, undefeated power of socialist countries that small countries, who have recently been able to free themselves from the domination of worldwide imperialism, are able to continue their growth and evolution even under the difficult conditions of economic embargo and the all-out pressure of worldwide imperialism. The revolutionary Cuba of today is still under the economic embargo of imperialist countries after 20 years; heroic Viet Nam and its struggling neighbors Laos and Cambodia, or the Democratic Republic of Yemen and Ethiopia, which are pressured from all sides and even despite the militarily aggressive interference of imperialistic and affiliated reactionary forces are the clear example of reality in our age. Today, 20 out of 110 developing countries with a population of more than 150 million people have chosen the socialist direction for the evolution of their social future. Although the revolutionary socio-economic and cultural quality of these countries are at various stages of growth, they have all gained and are gaining valuable experience in the major issues regarding means of development and solutions to their social and economic problems.

The historical s'gnificance of this change in the proportion of forces in the world becomes more obvious when we consider that these notable and destiny-making changes have taken place under such adverse conditions, while the most populated country in the world, the People's Republic of China, has in the past 10 years dangerously regressed in its stance and has openly betrayed the universal camp of anti-imperialism. In order to suppress the national liberation movements and to encourage the imperialistic military aggression against socialist countries, particularly the Soviet Union, China has accepted an infamous compromise with the darkest imperialistic forces, i.e. the United States and fascist, racist governments such as Israel, South Africa and Chile. And, in order to prove its irreversible "sincerity" in this treason, China has imposed the greatest political, military, and economic pressure on the Soviet Union to the north, and Viet Nam, Laos, and Cambodia to the south.

These victories and especially the acceleration of the changes in the last 10 years have been achieved in the bloody struggle of the uprisen masses and progressive forces of the world against worldwide reaction headed by U.S. imperialism.

The imperialists and reactionaries stand against this great current with all their might. They do not even relinquish an inch of what they have taken forcefully, without a fight. Worldwide imperialism and affiliated reaction are trying to retrieve what they have lost by taking advantage of every political, economic and military means and using every criminal, deceitful policy. Or at least they try to prevent the stabilization, strengthening and expansion of the new revolutionary, anti-imperialistic, popular systems, and in this way decrease the ever-increasing speed of changes in the world which are to their detriment.

The important peculiarity of world politics at the present moment is exactly this miserable imperialistic attempt. The criminal imperialism of the United States in the frontlines of worldwide imperialism, i.e. that of Western Europe, Japan, and other reactionary countries, has at the present moment set the following as its most important strategic objectives:

--to end peacekeeping and calm by escalating political disturbances and returning the world to the cold war and the arms race era, and in this way, by forcing heavy military budgets on socialist countries, to slow down the rapid development of those countries as far as possible;

--to obstruct the progress and success of the national liberation movements and, if possible, to cause the victorious movements to fail and to thereby regain their previous position;

--to keep the developing countries within the capitalist system and prevent, with all their might, their inclination to follow a path towards a non-capitalistic development and adoption of a socialist orientation.

--to beseige the foreign and world policy of these countries within the framework of their own world policy, and thus prevent them from approaching and establishing relations and cooperation with socialist stakes and other liberated, independent countries;

--to prevent these counties from having a free, independent economy, and to keep them dependent on imperialist markets.

In order to achieve these objectives in their infernal plan, the imperialists have employed all their political, economic, military, propaganda, and ideological forces.

Now it is certain that the entire region of the developing countries is an operational arena for these imperialist policies. It would be sufficient to only note the imperialist's actions, especially the role of its world gendarme--U.S. imperialism throughout the world, in the Middle East and the Persian Gulf, in South East Asia, in Africa, and in Latin America. Among these, the Persian Gulf is of primary significance, because of its unique strategic importance, both economically and militarily and because of the occurance of the great revolutionary explosion in that region.

We have now witnessed for two years all the imperialist plots and conspiracies in this region, and we can see how all the visible and invisible hands of black imperialist and reactionary forces are working to defeat the two anti-imperialist, popular revolutions of the region--the Iranian and the Afghan revolutions, or at least they hope to transform these revolutions from within, and drag them to compromise and submission, that is, to that very prison of dependence on world capitalism.

We are now witness to the fact that U.S. imperialism and its associates have concentrated large quantities of military equipment and huge numbers of armed forces in the Persian Gulf area. Through their daily instigations and military maneuvers in Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Oman, and Jordan they disturb the political atmosphere of the region, preparing it for the open invasion of Iran by the United States.

Worldwide imperialism headed by the United States is heavily preparing to crush the Iranian revolution. The coup in Turkey, encouraging Iraq for an open invasion of Iran, the effort to put together a regional military pact between the countries of the Persian Gulf and the Sea of Oman against Iran, the effort to arm Pakistan and the reactionary Arab regimes of the region, strengthening of the military bases and the creation of new bases surrounding Iran, the emergency military aid of $500 million to Pakistan along with a $2.5 billion loan from the World Bank to that country, and the open arming of the criminal Afghan gangs in Pakistan which are managed by the deposed Shah of Afghanistan, Bakhtiars and Oveysis of Afghanistan, and under the direct supervision of the CIA, are all preparations for the creation of a reactionary iron ring around Iran.

Diego Garcia is changing into the largest American military base in the world, and the 200,000-man army of the "rapid deployment" force has been ordered to confine its mission only to the Persian Gulf region. England is prepared to put its large military base in Cyprus at the disposal of this aggressive army. Neogtiations are taking place between the United States and Egypt and the United States and Pakistan for the establishment of two new U.S. military bases in those countries. The above are all but part of the infernal imperialist plan headed by U.S. imperialism directed against the revolutions of Iran and Afghanistan which, according to Brzezinski have disturbed the "balance" of power in the region.

Another part of this plan is the effort of all the organizations affiliated with U.S. imperialism and aided by the compromisers and submissive elements to carry out in Iran the "guidelines" of Brezezinski in clouding the relationship between Iran and the Soviet Union.

At present, more than 60 American, French, and British warships manned with tens of thousands of American soldiers especially trained for battle in the climatic conditions of Iran are prepared for invasion along with the obediently ready-to-act, affiliated armies of Israel, Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Jordan, Oman, Turkey, and Pakistan, showing off and calling out challenges all the time.

In South East Asia, the U.S. imperialism and its associates, i.e. Indonesia, Malaysia, and Singapore, with the aid of the Chinese traitors, have surrounded Vietnam, Cambodia, and Laos, and with their constant aggression on the northern and eastern borders across China and Thailand, they are trying to prevent the newly-liberated masses of these colonial-stricken countries from reconstructing their homelands. The same is true of the criminal actions of the imperialists in Black Africa, in the region of the Arab countries, and in Latin America. We are witnessing the best example of this criminal policy in El Salvador. And we see how ruthlessly the hired butchers of Washington have made freedom fighters for independence of this small nation the target of machine-guns and napalm bombs.

One of the other schemes of the imperialist circles to continue their domination over the developing countries and the deprived masses is to take advantage of every possibility for fomenting regional wars, racial, religious, and tribal conflicts, etc. The historical motto of colonialism, "Set the masses against each other and then rule them," is today used by neo-colonialism on a larger scale. Neo-colonialism knows that the consequence of such quarrels, especially if they develop into destructive wars, will in any event weaken the anti-imperialistic forces and strengthen the position of the dominators. Fratricidal wars between the masses who are tied in the chains of imperialism cannot end but in making these chains heavier.

Imperialism and worldwide reaction are systems which are condemned to die, and like wounded beasts are defending their criminal lives with their very teeth and claws. But the great forces of the deprived people and the working masses throughout the world who were put in motion with the great socialist October Revolution are undefeatable. This huge flood, which in a short period of time has destroyed a significant portion of the thousands-of-years-old palaces of the oppressive regimes of the plundering classes, is becoming day after day, more concrete, more united, and more powerful. The masses recognize the enemy much better, calculate more accurately the ways to overpower him and proceed towards their final victory with stronger and faster steps. The people throughout the world are realizing every day that imperialism and wordwide reaction, on the threshold of the historical destruction of its plundering criminal system, is ready for any new crime no matter how unimaginable to the human mind. Not surprisingly, one of those filthy germs and mercenaries of imperialism, who took part in the 18 Tir [9 July] coup attempt, confessed that the operators of the coup intended to impose their evil system on the Iranian people at any price, and if necessary, even to spill the blood of ten million Iranians.

The people of the world have not forgotten that World War II, which was instigated by bloodthirsty imperialism for the purpose of destroying the first and only socialist country in the world, left 50 million casualties and more than this number of invalids. The people of the world are discovering more and more everyday that the tragedy of the atomic war, being planned by the imperialists, will destroy hundreds of millions of people in the first hour of the war.

It is this increasing realization of the fact which strengthens the camp of the strugglers to secure world peace and the active supporters of the prevention of an atomic war.

The supporters of social change to the advantage of the working masses throughout the world are coming every day to realize more and more the importance of waging struggle for peace, of which the major element is to fight for the prevention of imperialist plots to escalate the disturbances in the political atmosphere of the world and participate in this struggle. The still enslaved masses of the deprived countries are coming to know every day that the best and most proper conditions for their victory in breaking the chains of slavery is the existence of peace in the political atmosphere of the world.

It is a fact that the greatest wave of victory of the national liberation movements in the 1970s was concurrent with the least chaotic post-World War II political period. The less chaotic the political environment of the world, the more the chances for the victory of the people over the plundering pressures of neo-colonialism increase. For exactly this reason, the world-devouring imperialists, especially the imperialistic military-economic monopolies, is greatly horrified by the lack of chaotic atmosphere and the existence of international peace and of the progress of worldwide supporters of peace, who are using all of their infernal energy of propaganda against world peace. The statement of Dulles, the great Satan of the imperialistic, aggressive policies of the United States in the 1950s, concerning the necessity of a "cold war," is the best illustration of this self-explanatory fact. Dulles openly and shamelessly stated:

> "In order to force [a] country to carry on its shoulders the heavy burden of maintaining a strong army, it is necessary that we create an atmosphere of excitement similar to that of the psychological wartime situation. It is necessary [for us] to create the supposition that apparently the country is subject to foreign threat."

This statement best represents the imperialistic propaganda fuss which, under the guise of the "communist danger" and "Soviet danger," imposes annually hundreds of billions of dollars in military expenditures on the people of the world. Simultaneously, these imposed heavy expenses which are one of the greatest sources of the plundering monopolies of the military-industrial setups of Western countries, contribute to the dominance of black reaction and the unending dependence of developing countries on imperialistic monopolies.

In the summer of 1979, that is, during the period when the foreign policy of U.S. imperialism began perceptibly to accelerate the intensification of disturbances throughout the world, the U.S. secretary of defense explained this policy with astonishing clarity in one brief sentence. In an interview with U.S. NEWS AND WORLD REPORT, Mr Brown declared:

"I think that we are being cured of the wounds of the excessive anti-war sentiments inflicted by the Vietnam war."

This clear statement by a professional belligerent aggressor, the same person who was the major operator of the attack at Tabas and the Novzheh coup in our country, as well as hundreds of similar conspiracies throughout the world, indicates how "anti-war sentiments," like a painful wound, were felt and are being felt by the plunderous imperialists.

Precisely for this reason, our people know that the preservation of world peace; efforts to stabilize, strengthen, and expand the gains of the efforts to keep the peace; struggle to strike imperialism and reaction by securing the victory of the national liberation movements which follow the path of freedom, independence, and social progress in the deprived countries; struggle to uproot any political, military, economic, and cultural dependence on imperialism; and ending any manifestation of reaction, all in all, are wounds inflicted on the plundering system of condemned-to-death imperialism, and neo-colonialism, [which is] the final external manifestation [of the former].

But our era is the era of the victorious progress for the universal front of anti-imperialist forces. Our era is one of the ever increasing blooming of the economy and culture in socialist and liberated countries, which have chosen the non-capitalistic or socialist orientation leading towards development. It is an era of more expanded and deeper victory for the national liberation movements, with an obvious goal of ending any domination and aggression of worldwide neo-colonialist imperialism. Our era is an era in which the superiority of worldwide suppressive military power of imperialism has ended, and the dominating advantures of imperialist circles are being most severely punished more than ever in regions such as Vietnam, Black Africa, Iran, and Afghanistan. The era of the parading of plundering colonialists has long passed and with every new day the parading possibilities of these forces are becoming more and more limited.

The praiseworthy heroic struggle for independence, freedom, and social progress in Iran has turned a new brilliant leaf in the glorious history of the battle of the deprived peoples of the world against colonialism, exploitation and backwardness. We, the Tudeh strugglers, are proud to have actively taken part in this historical heroism of the peoples of our country, and have always proceeded on the frontlines of this historical battle.

TWO IMPORTANT EVENTS IN WORLD POLITICS

In connection with all these world issues it would be appropriate to pay special attention to two important events of recent times. One is the presidential elections in the United States, and another is the 26th Congress of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union. With these two events, the reality and the nature of two systems and two contradictory encounters on the arena of world politics was presented to the people of the world in a dazzling light.

The presidential elections in the United States, in which the representative of the policy of war, aggression, racial discrimination, and the plunder of the national wealth of billions of people of the "Third World" countries entered the White House with little more than 26 percent of the votes of the American people, was an outspoken fact, indicating that world inspiration, headed by U.S. imperialism, has faced backbreaking problems which are the result of various political, economic, social, and cultural crises, and that its only hope is to obstruct the great flood of history which has shaken the foundations of the oppressive, plundering monopolies of capitalism and is destroying a portion of it every day, by escalating international crises, by resorting to the policies of the "cold war" period, by aggressive military actions, by creating regional wars in order to deviate public opinion, by the expansion of the arms race, and by strengthening the reactionary forces throughout the world.

On the other side, the 26th Congress of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union once again confirmed this reality, with an unshakable strength, that the new socialist system, which is the grave-digger of monopolistic capitalism, is proceeding bloomingly every day with firmer paces, and no crisis threatens it. The society of the socialist countries has become the determining force of the future evolution of our world, a guarding, protective force for universal peace, an obstructive force to imperialist aggression, and a great supportive force for the peoples who have risen for independence, freedom, and social progress.

In the 26th Congress of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union the economic, social, and cultural development plan was approved for the next 5 and 10 years. This plan shows that in the future too, the growth, expansion, and development of the Soviet socialist society will continue uninterrupted and without any crisis. The superiority of the socialist system over the decadent capitalist system will once again be clearly shown to the peoples of the world.

It is exactly in comparison with the reassuring plan that the stagnant economic system and the social, cultural, and spiritual relations of the declining capitalist societies are clearly seen for what they are. The United States, Western Europe, Japan, and other countries affiliated with worldwide imperialism have nothing to offer for the future of their societies but various crises. Moral and spiritual degeneration in these countries is increasing with a tremendous speed, and is spreading like plague. In the United States, the "leader" of worldwide imperialism, the rate of "inflation" in drugs, burglary, crime, prostitution and the efforts for Mafia domination of government institutions is increasing with a greater speed than economic inflation and unemployment.

In regards to the national liberation movements and the anti-imperialistic resistance in the "Third World" also these two events were the manifestation of two opposing encounters. The U.S. president, immediately after "ascending" the throne of command, used the most obscene insults, called these movements and any type of resistance against imperialism, anywhere in the world, "terrorism" and shamelessly declared war on all of them, including the Iranian and Afghan revolutions, the Palestinian movement, and the uprising in El Salvador. In the meantime, he declared his unsparing support for the Zionists of Israel, the racists of South Africa, the fascists of Chile, and all the reactionary regimes of the world.

But in the 26th Congress of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union we face quite a different position. In this Congress, the leaders of the Soviet Union once again decisively emphasized their unsparing and all-round support of all the national liberation movements seeking independence, freedom, and social progress.

We also face two quite opposite approaches concerning the vital issue of world-peace and the decrease of crisis. In order to obstruct the tension-easing efforts, the U.S. president is initiating a new "cold war" period, by preparing the most criminal weapon for the collective annihilation of the people of the world. That is, he includes the production of the neutron bomb in his governmental program, and plans to cover Western Europe with a network of deadly atomic missiles.

But, on the opposite side, the leadership of the Soviet Union, in supporting and strengthening tension-easing policies, and the stance of the people of the world opposing the threat of nuclear war, offered such new proposals that they were not even expected by the West. In accordance with these proposals, the non-nuclear region would extend from Western Europe through all of the European section of the Soviet Union up to the borders of Ural.

As regards the Iranian revolution, the position of the U.S. president and the leader of the Soviet Union are significantly expressive of the two opposing world camps. One is the world camp of imperialist aggression and crime headed by U.S. imperialism and the other, the socialist camp, which seeks peace, friendship, and social progress for all the peoples [of the world].

The U.S. president, who called the students following the line of the Imam criminals and murderers, on 19 Jan 81 (29 Dey 1359) evaluates the Islamic Republic of Iran as follows:

"Before everything else it must be made clear whether a government exists in Iran. I personally doubt it. I wish the intellectuals and competent politicians would take over the government in Iran. Then, yes, I think there would exist a legitimate reason for us to establish relations with Iran. . . I doubt that Ayatollah Khomeyni could still be called the man in charge of [that] government. . . ."

Again, in another speech, he states:

"I doubt that a government exists in Iran. Establishing relations with Iran will only be possible when moderate elements take over."

These are the assessments of the Iranian revolution by the actor of Hollywood's "violent" movies!

Opposite this evaluation is the position of the Soviet leader in his report to the 26th Congress. Leonid Brezhnev, in his evaluation of the Iranian revolution, states:

> "The Iranian revolution was a very important international event in recent years, which has its own characteristics. The Iranian revolution, despite all its complications and contradictions, is a revolution basically of an anti-imperialistic nature, even though internal and external reaction tries to change the nature of this revolution. The people of Iran follow their own particular way to attain freedom and prosperity. We sincerely wish the Iranian people success, and are prepared to expand our friendly relations with Iran on the principles of equal rights and, naturally through reciprocal efforts."

Apparently the case needs no explanation or interpretation. It shows which power is the irreconcilable sworn enemy, and which gives its unsparing support to the glorious revolution of our fatherland.

PART II

THE ACTIVITIES OF THE PARTY LEADERSHIP IN THE PERIOD BETWEEN THE 16TH AND 17TH PLENUMS

As evaluated in the report of the Executive Board to the 16th Plenum of the Central Committee, the period between the 15th and 16th plenums was one of the most tumultuous in our country. Now, two years have elapsed from that date, and it could be stated that this evaluation is still valid for the last two years in all its dimensions. The fact is that we are going through the most turbulent period of our ancient history. We are witnessing an old system collapsing, as in an earthquake, and the embryo of a new one being created and coming to life. We are witnessing the creation of a system based on national independence, freedom, and social progress, while a battle between the old and the new is being waged in all the arenas of social life.

As a consequence of the victory of our glorious revolution and after 30 years of deprivation and suppression, the Tudeh Party of Iran has once again found the opportunity to begin its free, legal activities. The activities of the new era of the Party began under very difficult circumstances. Today, we can say that given the exceptionally difficult conditions, the struggle of the Tudeh strugglers in this 2 years has in fact been one of the brightest parts of our 40-year history of struggle and the more than 70-year-old history of the struggles of the followers of scientific socialism, and has been a credit to the conscious strugglers of Iran's working class.

The Politbureau used all its power to carry out all the guidelines set by the 16th Plenum of the Central Committee. The following are the brief results of this effort, presented to the plenum for deliberation.

1. POLITICAL ACTIVITIES

The activities of the new era of our Party started in a very unfavorable atmosphere. This atmosphere was not the creation of the moment. In fact, it was the result of all the factors which had affected the minds of our people during the past 30 years, consisting of the creation of negative, sceptic, unfriendly prejudgments, and even hostile attitude towards the socialist countries, especially the Soviet Union, towards Marxism-Leninism as a new world outlook, and consequently, towards our Party. This atmosphere was the result of the following factors:

--the misguiding effects of 60 years of poisonous propaganda by the dependent and subservient regime of big landowners and capitalists headed by the corrupt, treacherous Pahlavi family. This regime which considered our popular movement its greatest historical enemy did not hesitate at any time in this long period of time to use any criminal means in its power to slander, suppress, and uproot this movement, especially during the 25 years after 28 Mordad [19 Aug 53] when it obtained absolute power with the aid of the infernal SAVAK, at a time when its endeavors reached their peak in all areas.

--the misleading effect of the nationalists who were affiliated with national capitalism, that is, the remnants of the National Front who turned their backs on the policies of Mosaddeq, and in order to defend their beloved capitalism, compromised with American imperialism and the regime of the Shah. In order to hide their infamous submissive compromise and by using the free platform that the SAVAK-dominated regime was putting at its disposal, this group tried to cover up its great responsibility in the defeat of the national and anti-imperialist movement of the years 1328-32 [1949-53]. In the meantime, it was trying to exonerate the United States as the major criminal enemy of the independence and freedom of our country by putting all the blame for the defeat of 28 Mordad on the group which, except for its mistakes during the first years of Dr Mosaddeq's activities, was the most active and most effective supporter of Dr Mosaddeq's anti-imperialist stance during the most crucial and sensitive period, between 30 Tir 1331 [21 Jul 52] and 28 Mordad 1332 [19 Aug 53]. For this reason, this group became the target of the most violent political pressures of the subservient regime of the operators of the coup, after the defeat of 28 Mordad. It is enough to mention, that after 28 Mordad, over 4,000 members of the Tudeh Party of Iran were arrested, of whom many were executed and the rest were held in SAVAK prisons anywhere from several to more than 10 years. But the number of those imprisoned and convicted from the National Front did not exceed the number of the fingers on one hand.

--the existence of an extremely belligerent dualism, that is, belligerency against communism from the standpoint of religious prejudice and belligerency against communism from the standpoint of capitalism manifesting itself as the belligerency against communism of the Westernized groups, trained in the United States and Western Europe, and another group simply the belligerency against communism of the well-to-do classes of the middle-class and small capitalists of the Iranian society.

--the influence of Maoism and deviant pseudo-Maoist ideologies in a significant segment of the anti-imperialistic, struggling young generation which has spread an anti-Soviet sickness-like belligerency, and with this outlook, stands against the Tudeh Party of Iran, which has revealed its ties to true international ideologies. The principle-based struggle of our party with the deviant, incorrect ideologies of these groups had reached a level of irreconcilable enmity during the peak of the present revolutionary movement.

--It must be added that the role of the traitors and apostates of the popular movement, whether those who showed weakness during the oppression and yielded to the enemy, or those who fell into the cesspool of Maoism and are today at the head of counterrevolutionary forces, had much influence in creating an unfavorable atmosphere for the Party.

--To all these unjust factors must be added another factor, which is the result of the mistakes of our Party between 1329-31 [1950-52], i.e. at the onset of our national movement to nationalize the oil industry, as well as the weakness of some of the leaders and responsibles of the Party after 28 Mordad [19 Aug 53], and the shortcomings and defeats in the efforts of our Party during the gloomy period of oppression until 1351 [1972-73], including the success of SAVAK in dominating a segment of the secret organization of the Party during that period.

Under such unfavorable conditions our Party began its new era of overt and legal activities. Today there are few who would doubt the significant success of our Party despite these and other new difficulties which have appeared during the past two years.

In this arena of activity, the leadership of the Party has made an effort to devise correct guidelines which correspond with the reality of the revolution of our country and which are firmly based on principles, and at the same time to implement with absolute moderation its program of political action. The 16th Plenum had adopted the main direction of the political activities of the Party as follows:

> The first and foremost important duty of our Party in this area (of political activities), is to make an effort in an all-out cooperation with all the true revolutionary forces of our people--the most important of all, with the forces which are under the leadership of Ayatollah Khomeyni--to strengthen the young tree of victory which has been achieved with the blood of tens of thousands of heroes, and to make this shoot grow deeper and more fruitful.
> We must try with all our energy to make irreversible this great historical success which undoubtedly is of great universal significance. On this path, we must relearn again and again from the contemporary history of the revolutionary movement of Iran, from the Constitutional Revolution up to this date, as well as from the revolutionary movements of other peoples, from those who have already planted the banner of victory in their countries and those who have been unsuccessful.

By fully supporting and accurately following, and scientifically evaluating the reality of the Iranian revolution, the leadership of the Party has concluded that it should support the line of Imam Khomeyni. We have recognized the following five major determining elements of this policy, and the events of the past two years have shown that we have not been mistaken in our judgments. These five elements are:

1. A decisive, unshakable policy aimed at ending the total political, military, economic and cultural worldwide imperialist domination, headed by American imperialism;

2. A decisive policy to uproot the despotic monarchical regime, and destroy the bases of its possible return;

3. A policy to secure individual and social rights and freedoms for the pro-revolutionary forces, who have always been deprived of freedom, that is, the deprived people of cities and villages, the ghetto dwellers and the downtrodden;

4. A policy recognizing the necessity of fundamental changes in the plundering economic and social system, in the interest of those plundered and to the detriment of the plunderers and the thieves of the national wealth and the wages of the urban and rural toilers;

5. Constant reliance on the necessity of the unity of all the genuine forces of the people, to attain the four objectives mentioned above.

The Tudeh Party of Iran had long before the victory of the revolution concluded, that this line of action reflects many of the vital needs of the toilers of our country, and decided to support its success with all its power.

In this manner, the struggle for the progress towards these goals and the struggle to bring about unity of action by supporting the formation of a people's united front was crystallized as the main line of political activity for the Party. On the basis of this orientation, the Party had made an overall effort to create an atmosphere of understanding and cooperation with other true pro-revolution forces who act, for the most part, for the attainment of these objectives, including the forces which are struggling under the banner of Islam as followers of Imam Khomeyni, or other forces whose stance is either revolutionary nationalism or are true supporters of scientific socialism.

Today, we are witness to the fact that in this connection, despite all the difficulties emanating from the unfavorable prejudgments about proceeding towards such goals, despite the plots of the various enemies of the revolution--that is, SAVAK, "Aryamehr" [former regime] counterrevolutionaries, the remnants of the plunderous ruling-classes, and the fifth column of imperialism manifested in the pseudo-leftist U.S. groups (PEYKAR and RANJBAR)--and despite the monopolism and self-centeredness of groups and influential personalities among the ranks of the revolutionary forces, our untiring efforts for unity of action have progressed significantly.

It would be enough to look at our Party's proposed program for a united people's front. We can readily see that many of the objectives of this program have already been achieved or are being achieved, and that some of the others which reflect the needs of tens of millions of the toilers masses have become the slogans and demands of the largest spectrum of the pro-revolutionary forces.

On the basis of this political stance, the Tudeh Party of Iran participated in the referendum to overthrow the decadent monarchical regime and in the establishment of the Islamic Republic. It participated in the elections of the Assembly of Experts and offered clear, distinct proposals for the completion of the compiled draft of the Constitution. And, finally, holding to its critical and reforming views, it endorsed the newly prepared Constitution, which had been compiled by the Assembly of Experts.

Despite the propaganda fuss created and fanned by the opponents and enemies of our Party against this political party-line, today, after the elapse of two years from the revolution, the accuracy and infallibility of this policy has convinced many of those who were condemning us for a long time, and has helped to heighten the political prestige of our Party in Iranian society. One of the most successful parts of the Party's political struggle was the exposure of the compromising and submissive nature of the liberal bourgeoisie, which, under the mask of Islam and a lame, conditional, limited participation in the struggle of the people against "despotism"--and only against despotism--had gained an important position in the leadership of the country after the revolution. Through these positions, the "step-by-step" transitional government, the liberal bourgeoisie tried to divert the revolution from its original goals, and redirect it towards the blind alley of compromise, not only with worldwide imperialism but with the leftovers of the "Aryamehr" regime, i.e. the runaway, plundering capitalists and landowners.

This struggle, as the ratified report of the 16th Plenum of the Party shows, began from the very first days of the revolution. For a long time, our Party was alone in this struggle, but the passage of time, the experiences of the true pro-revolutionary forces in the course of the struggle, the compromising, submissive stance of liberal capitalism, the increasing difficulties emanating from the termite-like economic policies of liberal capitalism in the overall economy of the country, the need to fight to end the access of these compromisers to the positions of ruling and economic power have become the most vital slogan of the entire spectrum of the revolutionary forces.

It was in accordance with this very orientation that the leadership of the Party evaluated the brave action of the students following the line of the Imam from the first moment as a profound revolutionary move in intensifying the fight against U.S. imperialism--the number one enemy of our glorious revolution--and as a struggle against the compromisers and submissive elements, who had even gone so far as to initiate a collusion with Brzezinski, the most vindictive conspirator against the revolution of Iran. The Party supported that action all along, and it continued its support of the students even when they were attacked by the imperialists, counterrevolutionaries, and the compromisers who were ousted from governmental power.

The exposing documents discovered at the American spy nest, i.e. the headquarters for the preparation of a counterrevolutionary coup to overthrow the regime of the Islamic Republic, have proved the unparalleled accuracy of our Party's views concerning the extent of subversive conspiracies of the imperialists, counterrevolutionaries, and the deceitful role of liberal capitalism in paving the way for the return to imperialist dependency.

For precisely this reason, these disclosures were on the one hand widely supported by the masses of socially deprived and, on the other, openly opposed and countered by anti-popular forces.

Our Party has the right to be proud of its great share in this struggle.

The third part of the very important political activity of the Party has been our continuous, uncompromising struggle against the counterrevolutionary conspiracies and the efforts to equip the struggling forces of the people to confront and crush these conspiracies.

The members and supporters of our Party--with their untiring day and night efforts on this battlefield in which on many occasions they endangered their lives, and in spite of the very limited possibilities and all the difficulties created by monopolistic forces and club-wielders on the right and on the "left"--were able to give valuable assistance to the revolutionary institutions in the discovery and neutralizing of the most dangerous conspiracies of the enemies of the revolution. We have performed and still are performing our revolutionary duty in this connection, and attach importance to its positive results rather than using it for propaganda purposes. We must repeat the fact that some of the political personalities and occasionally political organs, in spite of their complete awareness of our Party's unsparing support of the revolution, by mischievously repeating the accusations of SAVAK agents, and the submissive, Americanized Maoists, try to cast doubt upon the sincerity of our Party in this struggle. But we, the strugglers following scientific socialism, have endured a life of continual accusations and slanders along with more than 130 years of direct experience of struggle on the gallows, under torture, and living in horrible prisons. We know through historical experience that lies, accusations, and slander, even if they have been designed to deceive the public, will finally be notoriously disgraced in the face of history. It is this unshakable confidence that makes tempered steel out of the strugglers for the freedom of the workers' class.

Within the framework of the struggle to expose the variously colored imperialistic and counterrevolutionary conspiracies, we must point out the struggle of our Party to expose the true face of the American "left"--that is, the small Maoist, pseudo-Maoist, and Trotskist groups. The success of our Party in this regard is undoubtedly significant. Today, "Maoist" in the vocabulary of a large spectrum of the forces true to the revolution is attributed to the U.S. fifth column, and treacherous to the glorious revolution of our country. It is so infamous that the Maoists do not have the courage to admit that they are Maoists. They introduce themselves with grandiloquence and deceptive names.

One of the praiseworthy aspects of the political activities of our Party during recent times is its active participation in the popular resistance against the criminal U.S.-Saddam military aggression against our fatherland. In the early months of the victory of the revolution we exposed and warned against the conspiracy which finally was put into action in Shahrivar 1359 [Aug-Sep 80] as Iraq's military aggression. Most unfortunately, the responsible authorities did not apparently pay the slightest attention to our Party's warnings. Future history will reveal what hands in sensitive positions prevented the attention being paid to these warnings, all of which prepared the background for the early successes of this aggression.

In any case, our Party, with its correct evaluation of this conspiracy and aggression, recognized it as an imperialistic counterrevolutionary conspiracy to overthrow the Islamic Republic, and from the first moment stood beside the other true fighters of the revolution, on the frontlines of resistance to crush this aggression, by using all its resources for this cause.

This destiny-making battle presently continues. The aggression of Iraq has once more confirmed the evaluation of the Tudeh Party of Iran concerning the true pro-revolutionary forces and exposed the ugly face of the deceptive forces. It is strange, that the political organizations of liberal capitalism, such as the Office of Cooperation of the People with the President, the Freedom Movement, and the National Front, cannot even present the Iranian people with one martyr, while they organize demonstrations against the present government with tens of thousands of people in Tehran and the provinces following the orders of Reagan. The same is true of the ignominious situation of the insignificant ultra-revolutionary American "left," such as "Ranjbaran," "Peykar" and their associates.

The fourth part of the political activities of our Party consists of the constructive efforts to help resolve the difficulties and social problems. Our Party, from the very first day of the renewal of its legal, overt activity has avoided all kinds of "negativism" and by offering clear, constructive proposals in all areas, has contributed its historical share to the revolution.

The proposals of the Tudeh Party of Iran for solving the crucial social problems (such as land reform, saving the country's economy from crisis, unemployment, the nationality problem, particularly the Kurdestan issue, education, the cultural revolution, etc.), like our Party's views on foreign policy and safeguarding social freedoms, are still valid as the most clear and constructive proposals which correspond accurately to the realities of our fatherland, to the contents and major and fundamental orientations of our glorious revolution, and which reflect the requirements of tens of millions of the masses of the cities and villages.

The true value of these constructive proposals will be more clearly revealed when the opponents and the enemies of our popular movement devote hundreds of pages of their publications to insults and slanders directed at our Party, but are unable to logically prove their doubts about the correctness of our Party's proposals, even in one instance.

On the other hand, the events of the past two years have shown that lack of attention on the part of the influential government authorities to these proposals has always been coupled with the escalation of difficulties and complications. We hope that with the experience of the past and with the critical assessment of the errors committed by the administrative authorities of the Islamic Republic, the abstract approaches which are the greatest threat to the stabilization and the strengthening of the revolution, are replaced with realism and clear-sightedness.

These were briefly the efforts of the leadership of the Party in the political field. The Politburo is of the opinion, that these efforts have fully corresponded to the guidelines of the 16th Plenum of the Central Committee, and that the positive results of these actions have confirmed the correctness of those guidelines.

2. THE ACTIVITIES OF THE PARTY LEADERSHIP IN THE FIELD OF ORGANIZATIONAL AFFAIRS

The first duty on organizational affairs assigned to the Executive Committee by the 16th Plenum was to rapidly move the leadership of the Party to Iran, since it had for the most part been in a state of emigration. This guideline was carried out immediately after the plenum. Despite the difficulties created by the liberal government for the return of the members of the main leadership of the Party, who were mostly convicted by the criminal courts of the SAVAK-dominated regime, these comrades were able to return home and pursue their political activities within the country.

The main leadership of the Party was completed [as an organ] with some of the comrades who had been struggling within the country during the years of strangulation, and who had become like tempered steel in the dungeons of SAVAK, and were deeply respected and loved not only by the supporters of our Party but also by the ideological opponents of our Party. The combination of these two elements of the experienced activists of the Party created a strong foundation for the unity, solidarity and growth of the prestige of the Party leadership.

The guidelines of the 16th Plenum of the Central Committee concerning the creation of a general united organization, the admission of new members, and attention to the probable dangers of the victory of anti-freedom forces--be extremists or counterrevolutionaries--were all implemented with due consideration given to the existing visible conditions, means and numerous difficulties.

The leadership of the Party has tried always to find and overcome its mistakes and shortcomings in all fields by self-criticism.

3. THE PARTY'S ACTIVITIES IN THE AREAS OF DUTIES CONNECTED WITH PROPAGATION, PROPAGANDA, AND TEACHINGS

On the whole, despite the limited human and technical resources available to the Party, and considering the various difficulties created by pressures exerted on our Party to shut down its free and open activities--once in 1358 [1979-80) and once after the attacks of the "club-wielders" on the Party offices in Tehran and other cities in Tir 1359 [Jun-Jul 80], which, unfortunately, still continue--the activities and accomplishments of the Party are worthy of attention. In this period the Tudeh Party of Iran has been able to carry out its significant activities by publishing scientific and political, as well as politico-analytical and expository publications.

From the viewpoint of securing financial resources, as well as distribution of these publications among consumers and among the supporters of the Party, the Party's central organization received much more assistance than expected. This devotedly gracious aid is only a small part of the heroic struggle of the Tudeh fighters in the two-year period since the victory of the revolution.

One of the most significant successes of the Party in this area is the publication of MARDOM and the monthly DONYA. This newspaper and the monthly publication have rightly taken their place at the forefront of today's publications in their political, cultural, and social contents, in their profound understanding and stance on political lines, in their ideological positions, and in their correct evaluations.

4. THE ACTIVITIES OF THE PARTY IN AREAS RELATED TO THE MASSES

In this field, the work of the Party has been and still is confronted with various difficulties, the major decisive portion of which emanates from the peculiarities of the Iranian revolution. These difficulties have existed and still exist as a major hindrance to the organizing of the deprived laboring strata in the arenas of the guild and syndicate activities of workers, farmers, and other toilers, as well as the struggle for women's rights and the rights of the young people and students. In this fight, on the whole, we are confronted with monopolism and the dual organizational struggle of the right and the "left."

On the right we are confronted with the monopolistic religious groups, who are supported by the institutions of governmental authority and who refuse any guild-related cooperation with the other toilers who do not approve of their monopolistic attitude. This causes instability in the voluntary and free unity of all the toilers regardless of their ideological position, religious affinities, etc., and sows the seeds of disunity and dissension among them. On the other side of this monopolism of the right, in areas of popular activities, we are confronted with a policy of dissension adopted by left-inclined elements, such as the MOJAHEDIN-E KHALQ, and ramifications of FEDA'I-YE KHALQ organizations, who are following another type of "monopolism," and who would only agree to the unity of a people's organization if they were to control its leadership. And if they happen to be in the minority, they split and try to break apart that organization.

Alongside these two types of monopolism, or more precisely, due to the existence of these two monopolistic trends, the fifth column of the enemy of the revolution, that is, counterrevolutionary elements--SAVAK agents who pretend to be religious or pseudo-leftists, aided by dependent, American-made "leftist" elements--work to escalate disunity and chaos in the industrial units.

Most unfortunately, the toilers of our country, despite having various problems in their struggle to obtain their legitimate demands, and feeling the necessity for their own independent guilds, have been unable, in most cases, to overcome these three artificial obstacles, all of which work against the interests of the socially deprived, i.e. the urban and rural toilers.

The efforts of the Tudeh Party of Iran in affairs related to the masses have aimed, within the franework of its resources and through explanations and expository actions, to assist the Iranian toilers in all social sectors, including the farmers, workers, government and services-related employees, toilers of production and distribution units, young people, women, students, educators, artists, writers and intellectuals, to overcome these problems and to establish their own independent organizations.

In this framework, we must point out the noted efforts of the Party's women in intensifying women's activities to gain women's social rights, as well as the efforts of the Party's youth in the expansion of the activities of the Youth Organization and the Organization of Democratic Students which joined the Youth Organization of the Tudeh of Iran last year, and also the efforts of our Party's activists among the farmers.

THANKS TO THE TUDEH STRUGGLERS

One of the brightest characteristics of the Party's activities in the period following the victory of the revolution is the unprecedented revolutionary enthusiasm among the Tudeh strugglers on all levels of Party activities, beginning from the supporters and the regular members of the Party up to the higher authorities. In order to spread the Party's views in the society, the Tudeh strugglers have displayed and continue to display unusual selflessness and initiative efforts in financing and collecting aid for the Party and with their very lives in protecting and preserving the gains of the revolution and the regime of the Islamic Republic of Iran at the war fronts. Undoubtedly, this selfless effort of all the members of the Party is one of the major determining factors in all the successes of our Party.

Our Party has never before in its 40-year history enjoyed such ideological and organizational unity and such a sound internal party atmosphere. We must protect, as a precious belonging, these great historical gains of our Party's struggle and increase its quality daily.

The successes of our Party have been more in some and less in some other fields. In this regard, we must consider as one of the negative factors the unprecedented hostile atmosphere that the enemies of the revolution as well as those "friends" who consider our Party to be their rival, are escalating against our Party.

We must hope that the progress in the stabilization, strengthening, and expansion of the revolution, the necessity of confronting the problems emanating from the spread of the historical struggle against counterrevolutionary elements, the necessity of strengthening the unity and the unity of action of all the true pro-revolutionary forces in this struggle, and the growth in the recognition of the realities based on valuable experiences of the revolutionary battle will pave the way for the victory of the toilers over their problems.

Dear Comrades, this was the report on the activities of the Politburo of the Central Committee during the past two years.

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED BY THE TUDEH PARTY 17TH PLENUM

Tehran MARDOM in Persian 13 Apr 81 p 4

[Text] The 17th Plenum of the Central Committee of the Tudeh Party of Iran convened in Tehran in an atmosphere of sincere friendship and under conditions of political, ideological and organizational unity and solidarity. The plenum discussed and studied the report of the Politburo concerning the analysis of conditions prevailing in the country and the world, and the party's new program. The plenum finds it necessary, at the close of its work, to set forth the following points as fundamental conclusions:

1. The 17th Plenum of the Central Committee of the Tudeh Party of Iran greets the eternal memory of all martyrs, irrespective of their alignment to various institutions of the Islamic Republic of Iran or revolutionary events and groups of different political and ideological beliefs, and bows its head in respect, glorification and gratitude for their self-sacrifice. During the revolution, as well as the war against aggression, the heroic people of Iran added a golden page to their ancient record--something which can be considered as unparalleled in our country's history--under the prudent, decisive and unshakeable leadership of Imam Khomeyni. We believe that a people possessing such a spirit of sacrifice and perseverence will be able to withstand the difficulties of completing the revolutionary evolution and renovating the society, and will also be able to carry out its difficult responsibilities. We are rightly proud to belong to such a people and such a country.

2. The plenum once again expresses the Party's support of the just defense against the aggression of the criminal regime of Saddam, and conveys its sympathy and fervent greetings to the families of those martyred, disabled, and made homeless by the war. The plenum sends its greetings to the people of Khuzestan and the Western areas of the country, who have been subjected to savage aggression, destruction and other hardships, and praises the bravery and endurance of our beloved countrymen residing in war-damaged areas. The plenum is grateful to the progressive Iraqi forces who condemn Saddam's aggression. The plenum cherishes the hope that our country will achieve a decisive victory in the just fight against aggression and calls upon all progressive forces in the world and all institutions supporting peace, democracy and the rights of the masses to extend material and moral support to Iran in the war imposed upon it by imperialism and the Saddam regime.

3. As set forth in comprehensive and substantiated manner in the report of the Politburo, the anti-imperialist and popular revolution of our country, which succeeded in the overthrow of the decrepit regime of the despotic monarchy, the establishment of the Islamic Republic and in striking telling blows against the bases of domination of the plundering and tyrannical world-imperialism headed by U.S. imperialism, is now going through sensitive and difficult times because of the continuous intrigues of imperialism headed by world-devouring U.S. imperialism and domestic anti-revolution.

The revolution is now engaged in a vital struggle with imperialism and the aggressor Saddam regime on the one hand, and with the variously-colored forces of anti-revolution and/or the forces of compromise with imperialism, on the other, in order to open the way to advance toward strengthening and deepening the revolution. The forces of anti-revolution and compromise are trying to transform the revolution from within through the use of various means and masks. Despite numerous difficulties, the revolution has succeeded, by relying on the people of cities and villages, and by benefitting from the support of all progressive forces of the world, to protect its gains, set up governmental and revolutionary institutions, and to void the intrigues and devilish plans of imperialism and Zionism one after another.

The Tudeh Party of Iran has had an active and effective participation in the great revolutionary struggle of the Iranian people, in supporting the anti-imperialist and popular stand of Imam Khomeyni and the followers of his path, and in facing the forces of anti-revolution and in exposing anti-revolutionary intrigues. The members of the Party, with total sincerity, dedication and perseverence, have not and do not spare anything, on this road, not even their lives. The plenum considers the policy adopted by the Party in supporting the anti-imperialist and popular line of Imam Khomeyni as a stand of principle, and considers as correct the Party's persistent confrontation with imperialism, Zionism and anti-revolution as well as its struggle against liberalism, sectarianism and monopolism. The plenum considers as methodical and correct the Party's attitude based on unity and criticism endowed with our country's revolutionary democracy, which with a revolutionary Islamic viewpoint has played an important role in the revolution and now stands in resistance against the foreign and domestic enemies of our country and of the revolution and requires that the future Politburo use every effort and initiative in continuing this policy. The Politburo of the Central Committee of the Tudeh Party of Iran and other party organs under its leadership, have been able, during the revolution and the years which followed--with frankness and initiative yet persistence and firmness--to hold the correct positions in defending the revolution even as imperialism, reaction as well as conservative and compromising forces were subjecting the Party to slanderous assaults, nerve warfare and all-out attacks, and to carry out its difficult responsibilities on the political, organizational and ideological levels. The plenum expresses its reaffirmation and appreciation in this regard and considers essential the continuation of this path and procedure.

4. The plenum studied and approved the draft of the new program of the party. The question of ways of economic, social, political and cultural development of the country after this revolution, and the reconstruction of our society according to the interests of the people in a way that would insure the independence of the country and the growth, development, well-being and progress of its people, is the central issue for the revolution. The plenum considers that during the period between two plenums our party has made extensive efforts in this regard and has outlined in its new program the most logical ways to progress in various fields. The Party must try to bring about the utmost realization of this program which has been drawn up according to the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Iran. The plenum assigns the Politburo elected at this meeting the responsibility of completing and publishing the project according to the discussions held at the plenum and to transmit the elaborated views of the Party regarding various aspects of the program to the responsible organs of the Islamic Republic, and, as in the past, to defend democratic freedoms and social justice with full strength, by all means and in a practical manner.

5. World-devouring imperialism is endeavoring, with every devilish intrigues, to convert the Middle East into a dangerous inferno of war and provocation, so that it can protect its plundering positions there. Imperialism, headed by the United States, seeks to eliminate the results of those tension-reducing efforts which the anti-imperialist forces of the world, headed by socialist countries, have forced it to accept. Imperialism and its stooges seek to topple the revolutionary regime of our country. In such circumstances, the sacred duty of leading the thoughts and acts of the Party of the working class toward new successes, the duty of stabilizing, strengthening and deepening the gains of the revolution is facing all of the Party and its leadership. The plenum wishes the Party and its leadership success in this momentous task, and hopes that the Iranian Revolution will achieve final victory. This will be a great event in the history of the captive peoples and a major contribution that our people make to the general evolution of the history of our times. The members of the Tudeh Party of Iran, wherever they may be, must continue as before with the same spirit of self-sacrifice, permanence, logical patience and methodical self-possession to try to be worthy of the fame and traditions of our country's revolutionary movement, as vanguards of the movement, and to strengthen and reinforce the Party's rank and file especially by recruiting as many more workers and toilers as possible.

6. The plenum is deeply grateful to all international revolutionary, labor and progressive parties and organizations throughout the world which have defended and supported our revolution through various means against the incessant intrigues of imperialism and anti-revolution. It is only through such solidarity and joint efforts that the peoples of the world can remove the blood-sucking ogre of imperialism from the road of history and to open the way toward brighter horizons of the liberation of humanity.

7. The plenum fervently sends greetings to the brave fighters of liberation movements of the world, including the freedom-fighters of Palestine, El Salvador and Namibia, and to the noble people of Iraq who are fighting against the Saddam regime, and wishes them success in their rightful and just struggle.

PROGRAM OF TUDEH PARTY OF IRAN FOR CONSOLIDATION OF REVOLUTION

Tehran MARDOM in Persian 12 Apr 81 pp 3-6

[Text] The life and heroic battle of the Iranian toilers' masses has, within a short period of time, reaffirmed the correctness of the evaluation in the program ratified by the 15th Plenum of the Central Committee of the Tudeh Party of Iran [TPI].

This program which offered an overall realistic analysis of the situation of Iran and the world based on a scientific approach of Marxist-Leninist ideology showed that the way to securing the independence, freedom, and the progress of the Iranian society began with the overthrow of the regime of dependent despotic monarchy and the forced plundering rule of the treacherous regime of big landowners and capitalists, which was headed by the corrupt Pahlavi family and was dependent on imperialism.

With the victory of the glorious revolution of our fatherland which was achieved through the sacrifices of tens of millions of workers, farmers, craftsmen, and revolutionary toiling intellectuals, in other words, the deprived section of the society, a large portion of the objectives of the program of the party, which were mentioned as the most urgent goals of the revolution, have been achieved. The regime of dependent despotic monarchy was overthrown; SAVAK was dissolved; a large number of the operators of the detested regime and loyal servants of worldwide imperialism were driven out of the country, and a number of the mercenaries were captured by the revolutionary forces and punished for their crimes and treason; a large portion of the wealth plundered by these mercenaries was retrieved by the people, the Islamic Republic of Iran was established; devastating blows were inflicted on the political, economic military, and cultural dependence of the country and on the plunderous, corrupt, and decayed system of worldwide imperialism; Iran quit the CENTO and this treaty has been thrown into the trashcan; tens of thousands of American and West European advisers were expelled from the country; and an end was put to the enslaving military treaties, purchase of arms and spare parts, and to the U.S. espionage bases.

All of these gains were mentioned point by point in the program of the TPI as the urgent demands of the Iranian revolution. With these changes, the Iranian revolution has moved to a new stage with more extensive duties.

The TPI, the new-level party of the Iranian workers' class, which has chosen the Marxist-Leninist outlook as its guideline for action, is trying to study the issues of the Iranian revolution in the light of this scientific and revolutionary outlook, which is of an anti-imperialistic and popular nature, attempting to work out its program on the basis of this study, and then present it to all the toilers.

The ultimate goal of the TPI is the establishment of socialism and its blooming evolution. In other words, to secure the materialization of a social system in which the principle of ending the exploitation of individual by individual (which has been and is the basis of all plunderous and oppressive regimes from the era of slavery to imperialism, i.e. the final stage of capitalist evolution); to break the chains of subservience and slavery of the toiling masses to the plundering capital, and to create a society of true human freedom--not only for the oppressive classes as in class-societies, but for the tens of millions of deprived masses.

The efforts of the TPI are directed towards the creation of such a humanely superior society, in which all capabilities of its individuals are given equal opportunity for an overall, free growth toward promoting public welfare, culture, and morality.

On the basis of this scientific outlook, the TPI tries all the time to support the actually existing revolutionary movement of the country; in other words, it follows a policy at every stage and at every moment that would help strengthen the people's front against the front of the enemies of the people. The TPI believes that the revolution is the fruit of the actions of the masses, and that as long as the masses are not prepared for revolutionary changes, pseudo-revolutionary exaggerations and resorting to conspiratorial actions under the pretext of revolutionary wrath, no matter how sincere, can result in nothing but the defeat, disappointment, and weakening of the true forces of the revolution.

In the opinion of our party, the issues facing the revolutionary classes and strata of our country today, i.e., the workers, farmers, craftsmen, and hard-working intellectuals, are as follows:

1. To work with all their energy to consolidate, strengthen, and make irreversible the gains of the Iranian revolution; to neutralize through their conscientious struggle the subversive plots of the sworn enemies of the revolution, i.e., worldwide imperialism, worldwide and domestic reaction, headed by U.S. imperialism; and to prevent the submissive compromisers from taking deceitful advantage of weaknesses, shortcomings, mistakes and inefficiencies to deceive the masses, to turn them away from the revolution, and to pave the way for the return of dependence on imperialism.

2. To work towards the fulfillment of all the duties of the national democratic revolution, and to prepare the way for the elevation of the revolution of the level of socialist orientation.

All the efforts of the enemies of the revolution, i.e. the world-devouring imperialism, worldwide reaction, and counterrevolution headed by U.S. imperialism, move in the exact opposite direction of these urgent duties of the revolutionary forces.

The enemies of the Iranian revolution try to make impossible any consolidation and strengthening of the revolution of our fatherland, and in doing so they would not hesitate to resort to any crime. The most important and most practical indirect means the enemies of the Iranian revolution have is to disintegrate the revolutionary forces, to set them against one another, and hence to weaken the front of the revolutionary forces. The Iranian people have now witnessed for more than 2 years this practice of the enemies of the revolution, i.e. the universal and domestic enemies of their fatherland's independence, freedom, and social progress.

I. CONSOLIDATING, STRENGTHENING, AND MAKING IRREVERSIBLE THE GAINS OF THE REVOLUTION

The single most certain way to consolidate and strengthen the revolution is to equip the popular forces to preserve and protect it. The revolution achieved victory through the display of the greatest revolutionary self-sacrifice by tens of millions of urban and rural workers of Iran. Through this struggle they hoped that by overthrowing the criminal, plundering regime of "Aryamehr," the loyal servant of worldwide imperialism, the foundations of this system throughout the country (that is, despotic monarchy on a political level and large land ownership and capitalism on an economic level) would also be destroyed and would break apart the centuries-old enslaving chains of dependence on colonialism, and neo-colonialism.

Imam Khomeyni, the leader of the revolution and founder of the Islamic Republic of Iran, has many times pointed out the fact that the Iranian revolution has been a revolution of the ghetto-dwellers and the deprived people, and that the palace-dwellers and the privileged classes and strata of the "Aryamehr" society have had no part in it.

It is only possible to consolidate, strengthen, protect, and preserve the gains of this revolution and neutralize the grudging conspiracies of the irreconcilable enemies of the revolution and the plots of the submissive elements and compromisers--that is, the plundering capitalists and landowners who use thousands of tricks to divert the revolution from its course--by equipping these tens of millions of toiling masses. This operation is only possible if we move towards those goals for which tens of thousands of these masses were killed and hundreds of thousands crippled--in other words, fundamental changes needed to put an end to their various political, cultural, and economic deprivations.

Repeating unsupported slogans can only keep the masses in temporary expectation and hope. But the masses will finally turn away from these slogans. They will either continue on their own way or they will fall into the traps of those dangerous demagogues of the public who have won the "slogan"-chanting competition. This is a fact unquestionably proven in all the revolutions of the world with no exception, particularly in those of the past few decades.

Tens of millions of the urban and rural deprived masses (i.e. workers, farmers, craftsmen, and the hard-working intellectuals of our homeland)--the great majority who fought under the banner of Islam and those secular forces who took part in the destiny-making battle--both expected from the revolution:

A. To send the regime of despotic monarchy (which from the onset of colonial domination in the world has consistently been the most important tool for the suppression of nations and for keeping the door open for the unchecked plunder of worldwide or domestic plunderers) to the trashcan of history;

B. To end the domination of world-devouring imperialism headed by U.S. imperialism--which, with the help of the Pahlavi family and its classbase (dependent capitalists and big landowners) controlled all the vital arteries of our nation politically, economically, culturally, and in the armed forces--and to secure the overall independence of our homeland;

C. To overthrow the regime of political strangulation, which was the main tool of the domination by foreign and domestic plunderers, and to secure social freedoms for the [socially] deprived and those who struggle for the deprived in order to enable them to fight to end their deprivation;

D. To begin a revolutionary movement for fundamental changes to end the unbearable deprivation emanating from the dependent, plundering, autocratic, criminal regime--that is, all those political, economic, cultural, national, intellectual, ideological deprivations--and to pave the way for safeguarding social justice, the essential, determining core of which is to end the exploitation of individual by individual.

These are the goals for the attainment of which millions of the toiling masses of our homeland, ghetto-dwellers, the barefooted, and the hungry, have fought in this universal historical battle.

These are the goals, part of which our glorious revolution has achieved, and part of which it must still achieve.

The gains of the revolution in regards to these four principle goals are undoubtedly significant and noteworthy, but, unfortunately, it must be said that they are not alike. While great success has been achieved in the overthrow of the regime of despotic monarchy, in limiting the domination of the plundering, domineering imperialists, and in the eradication of the major operators of the dependent regime, no important step has been taken to secure true freedom for the socially deprived--freedom from economic plundering and exploitation as well as fundamental changes to the advantage of the socially deprived to bridle the remnants of plunderers of the overthrown regime. Capitalists and big landowners still control the most vital arteries of the economic life of the people of our fatherland and like leeches suck the blood of tens of millions of the plundered workers. This situation is the source of the greatest threat to the revolution. Large masses of the people, who have been and are still prepared for all kinds of sacrifices for the victory of the revolution, want the revolutionary government, the government which they have brought to power by spilling their blood, to take serious steps to prevent this plunder and to secure real freedom for the farmers in order to obtain their rights from the big landowners and for the workers to do the same from the capitalists.

THE PEOPLE'S UNITED FRONT--COUNCIL FOR NATIONAL UNDERSTANDING

The consolidation and expansion of the gains of the revolution can only be secured by preparing the masses to defend these gains and to obtain their rights from the plunderers. And the mobilization of the masses is only possible with a movement towards the unity and cooperation of all popular forces, regardless of any political or ideological differences, in a united front in which, on the one hand, they stand firmly and with all their power against the political, economic, military and cultural plots, conspiracies and aggressions of the enemies of the revolution, especially those headed by U.S. imperialism, and on the other hand, use all their power to struggle for the elimination of the principal bases of counterrevolution and imperialism, hiding behind the battlefront throughout Iranian society--that is, big land ownership, capitalism, and all the political or pseudoreligious activities affiliated with them.

Such a union can be lasting, stable and effective when it rises from within the ranks of the people and becomes tempered in the course of struggle towards these revolutionary goals.

Establishing the foundations of such a union will only be possible through the overall strengthening of popular general councils, which would include all the people, except the political and economic dependents and loyal servants of counterrevolution, and would be free of any sort of monopolization by one group or another.

In order to begin such a process, the TPI proposes the immediate formation of a council for national understanding to investigate the creation of a union of all the people. This council will include all political groups, parties and political personalities who sincerely accept the common principles of the protection and preservation of the revolution. These are the principles that have been reflected in Imam Khomeyni's political and social guidelines and were confirmed by tens of millions of the socially deprived masses.

With such a council or congress for national understanding, we can establish the foundations for an all-encompassing popular united front, a united front of the true forces of the revolution, or a united front of the people.

II. THE EXPANSION AND DEEPENING OF THE REVOLUTION AND THE BLOOMING OF THE ISLAMIC REPUBLIC OF IRAN

If the popular revolution of Iran should stop in its evolution and expansion, it would be condemned to destruction and regression. Based on this certainty, it is the duty of all truly supportive forces of this popular revolution to employ all in their power to spread it in all aspects--political, economic, cultural, social, and defense--and to make every effort and self-sacrifice along this path.

The Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Iran, which is undoubtedly the most important gain of the glorious revolution of our fatherland, a revolution judged by Imam Khomeyni to be the result of the countless self-sacrifices of the ghetto-dwellers, the barefooted, and the urban poor, despite various shortcomings and inefficiencies, it does reflect an important portion of the wishes of the people. Eliminating the shortcomings and inefficiencies, and enforcing the guidances of the Constitution which benefit the people can, on the one hand, block the return of the previous plundering, domineering, dependent regime and, on the other, pave the way for progress towards a popular regime in the country. On the basis of this evaluation, the party, while holding to its critical views, confirmed of this Constitution and employed all in its power to implement it.

The TPI believes in the possibility of the society's movement towards securing social justice, equality, and progress within the framework of this Constitution. It offers the following program for this movement, i.e. to spread the Iranian revolution, and is prepared to cooperate truthfully with all the popular forces of the society regardless of philosophical or social differences to achieve these objectives.

A. COMPLETE CONSOLIDATION OF NATIONAL INDEPENDENCE

1. Protecting the territorial integrity of Iran is the most important safeguard for the national unity of all the peoples of our fatherland, who have during the course of many centuries lived together, suffered together, and given their lives together to protect the independence of our common homeland. The TPI condemns any separatism under any name and any pretext, and believes that the Iranian people can obtain their legitimate rights in the best way in all aspects of social life, within the framework of this great national unity.

2. Our progress and social evolution rest in the consolidation of political independence, which was achieved after the revolution, and in expanding the great historical gains into the fields of economy, culture and defense in such a way that all the roads will be closed to the return of neocolonialist domination hiding behind a hypocritical mask of deceit.

3. Eradication of all dependencies, especially economic dependencies left over from the sinister overthrown regime, and freeing our defense forces from absolute dependence for arms on U.S. imperialism and Western Europe are essential to securing national independence.

4. Ensuring Iran's national security and international prestige is basic to the neutralization of all the plots and conspiracies by worldwide imperialism headed by the imperialism of the United States (which will never reconcile itself with the Iranian revolution) against our revolution, national independence and freedom of our fatherland.

B. STRENGTHENING THE COUNTRY'S DEFENSE CAPABILITIES

Imperialism and worldwide reaction--particularly regional reaction which was inflicted a painful blow by the Iranian revolution--will never give up their conspiracies to bring failure to this revolution. The defeated counterrevolution of Iran and the regional reactionary forces, under the command of world imperialism, are always prepared for any criminal conspiracy against the revolution of Iran. Only through increasing the country's defense capabilities and safeguarding its complete internal security could all kinds of conspiracy be blocked.

To defend the revolution, it is necessary for the armed forces to be prepared for defense against any kind of aggression both qualitatively and quantitatively. The quality of the armed forces depends on its unfaltering loyalty on all levels to the goals and objectives of the revolution, and on having at their disposal the modern weapons and the technical ability to use them along with combat readiness. In order to achieve this quality we must:

1. create the basis of a popular and revolutionary army by implementing fundamental changes in the internal system of the army and pave the way to the political growth and social comprehension of the cadres of the armed forces by securing the rights of all its personnel in the political developments of our country;

2. purge the military command and other armed forces of the loyal servants of the overthrown regime;

3. uproot any dependence on imperialism which is the principal, irreconcilable enemy of the Iranian revolution;

4. use every possible means to have a self-sufficient army;

5. provide arms which cannot be produced in the country only when no political or economic conditions are attached, and based on the best, most inexpensive, unconditional bids;

6. strengthen the revolutionary guards corps in all its aspects, including training, arms, equipment, modern light and heavy weapons and organizational improvement as well, so that it can take its proper place in defending the revolution.

C. INDEPENDENT, ACTIVE FOREIGN POLICY

Safeguarding national independence and security, and proper conditions for the prosperity of the country's economy is impossible without an independent, active foreign policy which would properly respond to the needs of the Iranian revolution. The foreign policy of Iran during the overthrown regime of monarchy was a subjugated dependent on the aggressive policy of worldwide imperialism. This policy must be changed from the roots up, and Iran's foreign policy should be based on the following principles:

1. the establishment of friendly relations with all those countries of the world which officially recognize our country's independence, and are prepared to support the efforts of our people to consolidate this independence;

2. efforts to be exerted by Iran to actively participate in the movement of the nonaligned countries;

3. Iran's support of the principles of peaceful coexistence and defense of peace;

4. Iran's persistent refusal to participate in any kind of aggressive imperialistic military or paramilitary treaty;

5. political efforts to free the Persian Gulf and the Sea of Oman from any interference by alien forces;

6. opposition to and active political struggle to prevent the conclusion of aggressive military agreements in the region of the Persian Gulf and the Sea of Oman engineered by the imperialists;

7. efforts to sign a collective security treaty in the Middle East, Near East, and throughout Asia;

8. overall support for national liberation movements in colonialized countries, especially for the movement of the Palestinian people, to crush the military domination of imperialism in the region of the Middle East and the Persian Gulf.

D. CONSOLIDATION OF THE FOUNDATIONS OF FREEDOM AND SAFEGUARDING THE SECURITY OF THE SOCIETY

The blooming of the newly-founded Islamic Republic of Iran is only possible with the free, active participation of all the people's forces--the masses of tens of millions of workers, farmers, craftsmen, and hard-working intellectuals--in determining the destiny of the country. Any attempt to force sectarian and narrow-minded views will slow down, even cripple, the progress of the society.

1. It is possible to secure popular rights and freedoms only when all the social, political and guild-related popular and progressive organizations are given the unrestricted, nondiscriminating opportunity for free and equal activity in publicizing and promoting their views, when no room is given to any sort of monopolism, exertion of pressure, imposition of views, or discrimination by any authority or individual, and when every violation of individual or social rights of individuals and organizations by anyone is subjected to legal prosecution.

2. The Constitution of the Islamic Republic--which is one of the great gains of the glorious revolution of our homeland and for this reason has been confirmed by the TPI--has created an appropriate framework for securing and safeguarding these freedoms. But this Constitution is not devoid of certain deficiencies and shortcomings. In order to eliminate these defects, this Constitution must be amended to secure the political, economic and social rights of the deprived masses and to make impossible any violation of these rights.

3. Within the framework of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic and its amendments, certain freedoms should be secured and any violation of these freedoms must be subject to legal prosecution, including freedom of thought, religion, expression of views [orally] and in writing, the press, social gatherings, parties, trade-unions, residence, travel, choice of profession, workers' right to strike, defense in the courts, and individual immunities.

4. The articles of the Constitution dealing with the formation of councils (the organs to exercise local administration on levels ranging from villages to provinces) must be fully implemented.

5. In addition to the deprivations suffered by others, the women of our homeland--who have had a great share in the victory of the revolution and are now equally as heroic as men in guarding the revolution--most unfortunately, are bearing the brunt of a series of additional social deprivations because they are "feminine." Although women are praised highly in the Constitution of the Islamic Republic, in practice these deprivations not only have not been eliminated, but the pressures have increased as a result of the actions of "sectarian" and "regressive" elements. The truth is that the women of our country still form the deprived half of our society. But the blooming of our country depends on securing complete equality with men for women in all the fields of the social life.

E. THE NATIONALITY ISSUE

Our country is a multinational one in which different peoples and nationalities with different languages, cultures, customs, and religious beliefs have molded together in the course of a long history to make a single nation. They have given their lives for this country and have contributed a valuable culture to the world. In this single nation, it is necessary to safeguard national unity, protect independence and territorial integrity, and ensure voluntary union without the domination of one nationality over another. To endorse any kind of restriction on, discrimination against, or humiliation of national minorities by majorities of the country is treasonous to national unity and independence. It will provide the opportunity for the enemies of the revolution and our people to sow the seeds of discord and to destroy the unity and interdependence of the people, to pit them against each other, thus weakening the newly founded republic of Iran, and pave the way for the revival of their oppressive domination.

For this reason, the recognition by the revolution of the right to administrative and cultural autonomy (or self-rule) and the elimination of backwardness--resulting from the reactionary policies of the overthrown regime--for all the non-Persian nationalities are some of the fundamental bases of national unity and among the most important safeguards of the country's independence and territorial integrity. This is the only possible solution to the nationality problem--which is to say, to put an end to one of the most painful deprivations of the plundering capitalist society. The past 100-year history of Iran indicates that deadly silence can be imposed through military suppression for a period of time. But under these circumstances, not even one step forward can be taken towards the unity of the people.

Religious minorities residing in Iran, whose rights have officially been recognized in the Constitution must live in complete security under the protection of the Islamic Republic and must be free to use their own language and expand their own culture and national traditions.

F. STRENGTHENING THE COUNCIL SYSTEM AS THE BEST WAY TO SECURE THE ACTIVE PARTICIPATION OF THE PEOPLE IN DETERMINING THEIR OWN DESTINY

In the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Iran, in the article concerning the system of government, we read:

"The Constitution is a safeguard to negate any mental or social despotism or economic monopoly, and it will work to break from the despotic system by placing the destiny of the people in their own hands."

The only way to truly implement this principle is to consolidate a system of councils on all levels and in all dimensions. By establishing such a system, masses of tens of millions of toilers will take their destiny into their own hands and will safeguard the security of the society in the best possible way.

Councils in the villages, factories, workshops, schools and offices to participate in management and program planning; executive councils in villages, districts, cities, townships, provinces, and regions inhabited by national minorities; and the Islamic Consultative Assembly as well, are all bases of true democracy for the people and will create the best organization for the people to participate in the management of the affairs of the country.

G. THE DEVELOPMENT OF THE COUNTRY'S ECONOMY

The economy of our country during the several decades of the domination of imperialism and its Iranian partners--the Phalavi family, big landowners and dependent capitalists--has distinctly evolved towards securing the interests of the privileged minority and maximum plundering of the country by imperialist monopolies and their partners in Iran and has been dependent on the economy of the imperialist world. The consequence of such a treacherous policy is what we are witnessing today.

In terms of natural resources, our country is among the richest in the world. It would be sufficient to point out in this regard that despite the oil resources being plundered by the blood-thirsty imperialist consortium, only in the 5 years prior to the revolution we received more than $100 billion, a sum which was only a small portion of the value of the plundered oil. This is only a small item of our great national wealth that can be used for economic growth.

In terms of national culture, ability, creativity and perseverance, the people of our country have no shortcomings in comparison with those of other nations. Our country has human resources and natural wealth, large arable lands, great resources for animal husbandry, in short, all the factors necessary for economic growth. But we see that as a result of the forceful domination of plunderous imperialism and its loyal servants, today our homeland is holding its hand out to imperialist markets for even needles, nails, bread, meat, cheese, and thousands of other small and large items.

What we are witnessing today is the result of 60 years of domination by the regime of big landowners and capitalists dependent on worldwide imperialism. The only way to escape this miserable situation is to put an end to the semi-feudalistic economy and dependent capitalism. The history of all those "third world" countries who have followed the ominous path of capitalistic growth and the history of our own country clearly prove the futility and inability of this road to growth in overcoming historical backwardness. The only way to destroy the roots of the misfortunes that dominate our present society is to follow a noncapitalistic path to growth--that is, to found a popular economy aimed at establishing social justice and ending the plundering domination of big landowners and capitalists and their cohorts, on the one hand, and spreading and developing the overall economy of the country to achieve maximum self-sufficiency and social well-being, on the other.

The Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Iran has laid a significant cornerstone for the foundation f such an economic orientation. We must build a popular, progressive economy on this foundation. As a move in this direction, the TPI finds necessary:

1. THE ISSUE OF THE OWNERSHIP OF PRODUCTION EQUIPMENT AND THE WAY TO GROWTH

The most important issue concerning the orientation of the economy of the country is determining the exact way to economic and social growth and to set the standards for the ownership of the means for industrial production, agriculture, land, and residential units. The Constitution has foreseen the three sectors--governmental, cooperative, and private--of the economy of the country and, to a certain extent, the functions of these sectors have been outlined.

The TPI believes that the blooming of the country's economy and securing social justice can only be achieved through the uninterrupted growth of the governmental and cooperative sectors of the economy and through limiting the activities of the private sector in auxiliary areas through moderate and small investments under the complete control of the government. This governmental control must include accumulation and increase of investments and the profit margins of these investments. Any other solution which would not limit the accumulation of capital and profit margins will pave the way for the return of the domination of plundering capitalism. Presently, capitalist trade operations and, to a certain extent, dependent capitalism in real estate and housing have threatened all the people, which has necessitated an overall struggle to uproot this plundering domination and has raised the issue of limiting capital investments in these areas by the largest strata of Iranian society.

The noncapitalist way to growth depends on limiting the field of capitalist activities in the private sector, and controlling the profit margins, on the one hand, and on the other, on the overall economic expansion of the governmental and cooperative sectors in industrial production, production of light industrial and agricultural goods, and the distribution of consumer goods.

2. THE OVERALL EXPANSION OF GOVERNMENTAL AND COOPERATIVE SECTORS

The one safeguard for orientation in a popular economy is the overall expansion of the governmental and cooperative sectors in all areas of the economy, i.e. industries, agriculture, and services. Only through the overall expansion of the governmental sector can we bring under control the private sector--which is always trying to expand and revive the plundering capitalist system--and redirect the total economy of the country towards satisfying the demands of the masses of tens of millions of urban and rural toilers, and the overall progress of the country towards complete economic independence.

Only through the expansion of the governmental and the cooperative sectors can the economy be managed according to a program, without which economic independence cannot be achieved.

The expansion of the cooperative sector will secure the opportunity of the large segment of the people, especially the toilers, to participate in determining their own destiny, and will provide them with the opportunity to free themselves both in production and in acquiring their means of living from the plundering claws of big landowners and capitalists. The expansion of the cooperative sector is one of the bases for the economic freedom of the toilers, which in turn is one of the bases of political and social freedom.

3. SCIENTIFIC PLANNING FOR THE ECONOMY COMPLEX

In our time, with the extensive growth in forces and resources for production, the increase in the everyday needs of the people, and the expansion of various connections with the outside world, the economy of the country has become a very intricate complex. Under such conditions, the coordination of all the effective constituent factors in this complex have become particularly important. The increase in various crises and the rise in the rate of various incurable diseases in the capitalist societies reaffirm the necessity and the importance of scientific planning to manage the economy of the country. Especially in the course of the future economic evolution of our country, which will begin to undergo a very difficult and complicated period of change, such scientific planning will play a determining role. In our world today, valuable experiences in planning economic programs based on scientific knowledge and specific goals have been achieved, which must be used in planning programs for the economic development of the country.

4. IN THE FIELD OF AGRICULTURAL AND ANIMAL HUSBANDRY ECONOMY

To create a sound and popular agricultural and animal husbandry economy in the interest of the peasants, the following steps must be taken:

a. The remnants of the feudalistic economy, which still exist in the form of the owners of large tracts of arable land, must be eliminated. The truth is that even after 2 years since the victory of the revolution, this major support-base of the overthrown regime, which squeezes more than 10 percent of the people in its claws, is still intact. Big landowners have retained their economic and political power in the countryside, and are still the most dangerous base of support for counterrevolution.

On the threshold of the victory of the revolution, more than 50 percent of the country's best arable land, and a larger percentage of water, agricultural equipment, and cattle, were under the control of the big landowners. And most unfortunately, no significant change has occurred as yet. The statistics of the Islamic Republic show that at the present time more than 50 percent of the Iranian rural population consists of landless farmers. Consequently, several millions of Iranian villagers have either no land or very little land for farming.

The latest statistics of the Islamic Republic indicate that of the 164 million hectares of land, only less than 10 million hectares are being cultivated, of which 6.3 hectares are used in dry farming and only 3.7 million hectares in irrigated farming.

The population of the toiling Iranian farmers amounts to 18 million, which is made up of approximately 3.5 million families. Hence, if all the arable lands were divided equally among the families, each five-member family would receive only 1 hectare of irrigated land and 1.7 hectares of dry farming land.

There are about 26 billion square meters of water available for agriculture. This amount can be used to irrigate about 4 million hectares of land.

These statistics show how necessary and urgent it is to find a solution to the land reform issue to satisfy the minimum subsistence of the poverty-stricken toiling villagers, who are the most deprived strata of our society.

These statistics also illustrate that the solution to the problem of increasing the arable land and provision of water through even ordinary scientific and technical means has become one of the most urgent issues of the economic foundations of our country.

The revolutionary decision of the Revolutionary Council concerning land reform, which was taken after the discharge of the bourgeois liberal government, was an important step toward eradicating this counterrevolutionary base. Most unfortunately, reaction, personified in the form of big landowners, capitalists, and a segment of the clergy dependent on them (the royal preachers), has been able to prevent the enforcement of this popular decision which benefits the deprived villagers by resorting to every means, especially taking advantage of the difficulties resulting from the imposed U.S.-Saddam war. The TPI finds necessary and demands the implementation of these reforms as a fundamental step in bringing about radical changes in the economic system of the country.

b. To form and strengthen, on an all-out scale, the farmers' agricultural production cooperatives on a voluntary basis is the second essential step in putting an end fo the misery existing in the Iranian villages.

Merely by giving land without helping to bring about the organization and cooperation of the farmers and without financial assistance for obtaining sufficient water, agricultural instruments, seeds, fertilizers, and insecticides, the agricultural economy cannot be saved from the present impasse. It is impossible to raise agricultural production without the use of scientific and technical methods (i.e. without employing agricultural machines, chemical fertilizers, insecticides, and new advanced agricultural methods). And within the framework of small, single-family agricultural units the use of such methods is also impossible. Only by forming production and various other cooperatives (such as credit, sales, and consumer cooperatives) to support the toiling farmers, and by providing them with the necessary agricultural insurances can we approach the goals of the revolution in agricultural areas.

c. Buying the surpluses of agricultural production from the farmers and from the agricultural production cooperatives by the government, and eliminating speculators, middle-men, "wholesale merchants," and those who work for them.

d. Basing the price of the purchase of agricultural products on precise economic assessment, such as weather and production conditions, in such a way that unfavorable atmospheric conditions for agriculture would not disasterously pressure the weak rural and the cooperative economy.

e. Using financial resources to employ the latest scientific and technical findings to provide new water resources and prevent the waste of available water. Using subterranean water resources and desalinating salt-water for use in cultivating certain agricultural products. This is another vital step for the agricultural development of our country.

f. The creation of centers for agricultural machinery, repair shops--in general, moving towards the mechanization of all segments of agricultural production in order to effectively help rural economy--conservation in the work force, raising agricultural yields, and, in later stages, helping the cooperative economy are of vital importance in achieving self-sufficiency.

g. The TPI believes that simultaneously with the full-scale strengthening of agricultural cooperatives in all areas (production, provision of raw materials, sale of surpluses), to a degree embracing the major part of rural economy, special attention must be paid to the governmental segment of the agricultural economy, both in farming and animal husbandry. The maintenance and development of large agricultural and industrial units, like Dasht-e Moghan, the lands in the vicinity of the Dez Dam and the establishment of similar units in other parts of the country should be of high priority in the government program.

h. One of the country's greatest shortcomings is in the domestic production of meat, chicken, fish, dairy products, eggs, etc. In order to overcome these shortcomings and to prevent the loss of large sums of our oil revenues spent on these items while importing from other countries, the three fundamental segments of raising and keeping domestic animals--traditional natural (tribal), single farm family, and industrial breeding--must, through precise planning, be strengthened and developed in cooperatives and large governmental units. Only through developing the raising of animals can we achieve self-sufficiency in all these areas.

i. The tribes of the country make up a mass population of several million, who play an undeniable role in the country's animal husbandry and agricultural resources. It is an important revolutionary duty to study and identify their particular problems and find clear solutions while taking into account all their particular economic cultural, traditional, and political concerns. We must provide this nearly 6 million people with the fruits of civilization, development, and scientific and technological findings. But even before that, they should be provided with the most primary living conditions worthy of the revolutionary era. Without haste and simple-mindedness, we must prepare the ground for the continual growth of tribal production and for overcoming backwardness; we must value the role of the tribes in providing the country with many of its economic needs and we must improve this role both qualitatively and quantitatively.

j. Our forests are a great and valuable source of wealth. If they are cared for and preserved, they will provide us with unending useful benefits. We must do our utmost to preserve and develop the forests, transform forestry into an active and effective institution in our national economy, prevent any uncontrolled plunder of the forests and the cutting of trees, and devise a detailed scientific program for responsible use of the forests as a self-perpetuating resource.

k. The creation of a basic change in the agricultural loan and credit system is another important and necessary step. In other words, at present, loans are to be given collectively (to cooperatives or village councils), on the spot, under supervision, at proper times and in sufficient amounts to be effective in production. The agricultural cooperative bank can plan an important, effective role in revitalizing our agriculture, in improving the living and working conditions of the farmers, and in strengthening the real units of rural cooperative institutions in the villages.

l. Rural construction, renovation of the villages, and building rural roads are among the issues which have a direct and immediate impact on the revitalization of our economy. The existing situation is so tragic and the standards so low that without a change at least in housing conditions, improvement of the villages--putting an end to the horrible educational and health conditions--as well as a minimum improvement in the living environment and the creation of secondary roads, there is no hope for serious, fundamental change in the agricultural economy. To achieve these objectives urgently, cooperation and coordination between the revolutionary institutions and corresponding governmental establishments following a definite program and time table will be required.

m. The creation of an agricultural planning system on short-, medium- and long-term bases in various fields with regards to the priorities and the requirements of the revitalization and growth of a healthy, independent agricultural economy with regards to variety in production and with regards to the roles and the share of the three sectors--governmental, cooperative, and private--must certainly be put into action in order to achieve the planned goals of the revolution.

5. INDUSTRY AND MINES

The process of industrializing the country during the domination of the dependent monarchy was only carried out with adopting a direction to secure the maximum profit for the capitalist monopolies of the imperialist countries and the dependent plundering capitalist class of Iran, and it is sick from top to bottom. Such was the objective of uncontrolled expansion of assembly industries, which make up the major part of the country's industry. Today, when our country is trying to break the chains of economic dependence, we feel the painful consequences down to our very bones.

The only way to secure the economic independence of our homeland (which is the basis for securing independence in other fields) begins with the overall development of heavy industry and making the most of the natural wealth and resources of the country. The significance of this approach is exemplified in the most positive role of the only important industrial units created in the country, such as the steel-mill industrial complex at Esfahan, the machine-tools factories of Arak and Tabriz, and the tractor factory, all of which were built with the technical and economic cooperation of socialist countries, and some of which were mutilated as a result of neocolonialist policies.

On the basis of the above, the TPI believes that the process of industrialization of the country must begin with giving priority to heavy industries, all of which will be concentrated in the governmental sector based on a precise scientific program. Any deviation from this only orientation directed toward economic development will endanger the economic independence of the country, and will pave the way for the return of dependence on the imperialist world.

With even limited oil and natural gas exports, our country has the necessary capital for creating heavy industries while simultaneously taking care of the people's daily living needs. We are able to build the basic structure of the Iranian economy by employing all the resources in the world which are favorable and appropriate to the Iranian revolution, especially the favorable possibilities that socialist countries and other countries, which are free from imperialist domination, can provide for the Iranian revolution.

The national wealth of our country enables us to develop light industries along with heavy industries--particularly metallurgy, petrochemistry, and machine-tools manufacturing--and to expand light industries, i.e. by manufacturing consumer goods, and to rapidly move towards self-sufficiency.

Regarding the expansion of economic activities utilizing the natural wealth, especially oil, natural gas, and other mineral deposits, the TPI believes that this wealth belongs to the future generations of our homeland as well, and that the value of these materials will increase every day. Mines must only be exploited to fulfill our needs for investment in heavy industries and attaining self-sufficiency. Any use of these resources to make unnecessary luxury items is an act of treachery to the future generations of our people. Maximum conservation in this area is a great national duty.

6. FOREIGN TRADE

Worldwide experiences and the experiences of the past 60 years in our country confirm the fact that foreign trade is one of the major channels of the domination of imperialist monopolies over the country's economy, one of the channels that enables the joint plunder of foreign and domestic plunderers and the unobstructed drain of the most significant part of the national wealth and the fruit of the labor of workers.

On the basis of precisely this understanding, the Constitution of the Islamic Republic considers the nationalization of foreign trade as one of the important economic principles.

The complete enforcement of this principle of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic is one of the most important demands of the Iranian people in securing economic independence.

The TPI believes that this principle must be enforced in the shortest possible time and in all its dimensions. The TPI is of the opinion that with nationalized foreign trade, all economic transactions with the outside world must be based on the following:

a. For imports: quality of merchandise and a reasonable price, with no political ties or conditions whatsoever.

b. For exports: a reasonable price, accepting no imposed ties or conditions whatsoever.

7. DOMESTIC TRADE AND DISTRIBUTION OF GOODS

Domestic trade and the distribution of general consumer goods are of utmost importance to the economy of the country and are determining factors in the economic complex. Before the revolution, this segment was almost totally monopolized by capitalists and petit bourgeois merchants. It was controlled by big capitalists who were dependent on the regime of absolute monarchy and on imperialism, and enabled the unrestricted plunder of the fruits of the labor of tens of millions of urban and rural toilers. And since the revolution, except for some very limited steps (such as the distribution of sugar), not only has no significant change occurred in this situation and no effective action been taken to limit unnecessary imports, but lack of control of and restriction on big merchants--that is, the operators of the bazaars, dealers, and middle-men--robbing the people through raising the prices of everyday consumer goods has taken on dangerous and threatening proportions. Most unfortunately, the government of the Islamic Republic has thus far only given advice and preached, thinking that in this way they can change the nature of these leech-like thieves. Obviously, this method only serves to make the uninformed people hopeful for a short time, and to pacify them.

The fact is, taking advantage of the economy by the capitalists whose existence is threatened, not only invites plunder but is used as a political lever to spread discontent among the people and to turn them away from the revolution.

The victory of the popular revolution in this battlefield is possible only when:

1. the provisions apparatus--that is, the purchase of major manufactured goods from factories, workshops, and small manufacturers--is taken away from big capitalists and transferred to the governmental sector and large cooperatives;

2. all middle-men, both in the areas of provisions and distribution, are eliminated and the centers for the wholesale of provisions are connected directly with the lower ring of distribution, that is, with retailers, distribution cooperatives, and the network of government stores;

3. the creation, parallel to the small distribution network, of an extensive and all-encompassing governmental cooperative distribution network, which is the sole factor in the stabilization of prices and fighting inflation and speculators.

8. SERVICES

As we are witness, services, with their many branches are expanding daily in our ever-growing society and are already an important factor in the economy, which affects the daily lives of the largest strata of the society. Until now, this sector has grown within the framework of the unbridled, uncontrolled developed economy and has gradually become an uncontrollable part of the economy.

Public well-being demands that in this sector just regulations and proportions between the services performed and wages received be established to secure the needs of the people. The only possible way to achieve these goals is to create a governmental network of services to stabilize and set wages and an all-encompassing cooperative for this sector. At the same time, these cooperatives will help to effectively provide the provisions needed by the services sector.

H. SOCIAL REFORMS

1. JUST DISTRIBUTION OF NATIONAL INCOME

The just distribution of national income which has been anticipated in the Constitution is one of the most important duties of the people's revolutionary government.

The rule of the monarchical regime of the big landowners and dependent capitalists was based on the plunder of the national wealth and the deadly subjugation of the tens of millions of toiling masses by the ruling class. The ultimate victory of the revolution depends on the overthrow and uprooting of this plundering system and the establishment of a just system for the distribution of the national income in its place. Achieving this lofty goal can only be possible when:

a reasonable balance is established in accordance with the conditions and resources and taking into consideration scientific standards and calculations--between the part of the national income set aside to help raise the level of the society's economy, and the part to be set aside for consumption, which will be divided scientifically and reasonably into two parts, that for public use and that for private use;

based on the national income as well as the requirements for economic growth, a just balance and proportion is established between minimum and maximum incomes not only in the governmental and cooperative sectors but also in the private sector; accurate taxation laws are enforced decisively and continuously in order to regulate the just distribution of income and as a preventive measure against the unjust accumulation of wealth. The government's budget must not be an instrument for the revival of the distribution of the national wealth to the advantage of the plunderers but a means to redistribute the wealth to the advantage of the toiling people.

2. WORK, WAGES, SALARIES

In the Constitution of the Islamic Republic, the question of providing jobs and the tools of work for all individuals of the society who have the preparedness and ability to work has been considered as a principle.

It is certain that given the continual growth of the country's population, limited job opportunities in villages, and the continual migration to the cities, the population of the cities and subsequent demands for jobs will increase daily; hence, what has become an extremely difficult problem for the government today will become more difficult day after day. Thus, it is the duty of the people's revolutionary government to implement the following:

a. providing jobs for these millions of masses;

b. expanding the expertise of workers with the increase in technical resources and job training;

c. minimum wages and salaries dependent on urgent needs and appropriate to the working and geographic conditions, and which fluctuate to prevent any undesirable effects on the lives of the workers due to the fluctuating economy, as well as living allowance to workers and employees with large families, depending on family size;

d. progressive labor laws based on the rightful demands of the workers;

e. safeguarding retirement salaries for all urban and rural laborers;

f. reducing the maximum working hours per week, depending on the progress and development of the country's economy, immediate reduction of the work hours of heavy labor (such as working in mines, at furnaces in steel mills, and the like), and of jobs hazardous to health (such as sanitary institutions, chemical plants, etc), and equal annual leave for workers and employees;

g. official recognition of the collective contracts for the workers of industrial and agricultural units;

h. enforcing the principle of equal wages and salaries for equal work for female workers;

i. the creation of an overall network of nurseries and kindergartens to assist working women providing the opportunity for the social training of youngsters in preschool years, and the establishment of maternity wards for several villages in the proximity of each other, in order to aid the villagers.

3. PUBLIC HEALTH AND SOCIAL INSURANCE

The Constitution of the Islamic Republic has provided for free public health and social insurances for all the people.

But the reality in our society is that our national health services are in a very backward state. Only the well-to-do and wealthy social strata are able to use these services. Only with a true revolution can an end be put to this painful backwardness. For this, it is necessary to:

a. nationalize all areas of the health services sector, and to have the government undertake the responsibility for health services and their just implementation in cities and villages;

b. take steps to eliminate the great shortcomings in the health services area by expanding medical schools and sanitary colleges, and by creating a network of schools to train medics, admitting local students for training in medical and health-care based on local needs and requirements;

c. move towards the elimination of this painful backwardness by creating throughout the country and for all the people a large network of dispensaries, hospitals, maternity wards, and recuperation facilities;

d. create a complete network of mobile laboratories and dispensaries for places with small, scattered populations;

e. provide special establishments for the handicapped, the aged, and patients who are incurably ill;

f. eliminate the shortcomings concerning social insurances, with its very limited provisions made in the laws of the country that by no means respond to the vital needs of the toilers of our country. This can be done by devising and implementing a progressive and full-scale social insurances law to benefit the urban and rural toilers, laws that respond to all the treatment and health services requirements, in unemployment, in illness, infirmity, old age and inability to work.

4. THE SOLUTION TO THE HOUSING PROBLEM

One of the greatest difficulties of the tens of millions of the deprived masses of our society is the problem of housing, which is at the same time one of the uncontrolled areas plundered by "build and sell" and rent-sharking capitalists. During the 50-year rule of the previous regime land sharks, headed by the Pahlavi family, stole billions and billions of rials of the national wealth, the national income, and the fruits of the labor of toilers by artifically raising the price of land in the cities, either transferring the money abroad or reinvesting it internally to replunder the country. During that period of the plundering regime, all building activities were devoted to the creation of palaces, large and small, for the plunderers and their operators, and in creating urban establishments for the urban rich, the wealthy, well-to-do strata of the society. But no changes were made in the miserable housing conditions of millions and millions of urban and rural toilers. There are still millions of people living in ghettos and ghetto-like places resembling Zurabad, Hasirabad, and Halabiabad, or in damp clay houses in villages.

Most unfortunately, the fact must be mentioned that since the victory of the revolution even considering the existing resources, no effective action has been taken to solve the problem of housing through the just distribution of existing residential buildings. In Tehran alone, there are more than 100 thousand spacious, empty, unused residential units belonging to large leech-like "speculating" owners while thousands of toiling families are looking for houses and millions of the socially deprived live miserably in holes they call houses and rooms.

The solution to the housing problem is one of the most important duties of the people's government. It must be viewed as one of the most important economic concerns of the people's lives and be concentrated on as a major determining issue in the governmental and cooperative sectors. Only through the preparation and implementation of a comprehensive, long-term program can we overcome this social problem, and only through the overall development of the activities of the governmental and cooperative sectors in low-priced housing for toilers can we control the private sector, which is active in building houses, and use its resources within the framework of a general planning.

Assistance to builders of private homes as well can only yield positive results if it is within the framework of such a general planning, which would make reasonable use of building materials, manpower, and city planning requirements.

5. EDUCATION

One of the most painful and enraging legacies of the dependent, colonialized regime of the Pahlavi family is the backwardness in public education. Still more than 60 percent of our people are illiterate. Of village women, who make up more than 30 percent of our population, more than 95 percent are illiterate.

Vocational, high-school, and higher education, too, are similarly backward when compared to the ever-increasing needs of Iranian society. It would be sufficient only to compare the number of students enrolled in medical schools in 1358 [1979-80] with the number required to meet the needs of our society.

In order to eliminate this shortcoming, a great struggle should be started. The efforts of the government of the Islamic Republic in building schools in the villages, closing down "privileged" schools, and teaching the illiterate are commendable, but these drops cannot quench the educational thirst of our society. These objectives can only be actually achieved when:

a. the completion and expansion of the educational network throughout the country--with priority given to the backward regions--are considered among the most important and urgent duties of the revolutionary government;

b. eight years of compulsory education is provided for all children of cities and villages alike;

c. in non-Persian regions, native languages are taught in keeping with existing possibilities;

d. a large network for vocational training is created throughout the country to afford all the young people the opportunity for vocational training;

e. the network of high schools is expanded to fulfill the needs of the country;

f. the institutions of higher education are expanded both qualitatively and quantitatively, especially in technical, scientific, and medical fields, devising and implementing a program for self-sufficiency in these fields at the earliest opportunity;

g. the creation of an academy of sciences of Iran, the establishment of a large network of scientific and technical research centers, and taking total advantage of the findings of science and technology accomplished throughout the world.

6. SOCIAL CULTURE

Cultural gains are among the most valuable fruits of the historical struggles of the masses, peoples and nations in the course of their movement towards progress and human civilization.

The people of our homeland are proud to have been, in the course of their long history, in the forefront of the peoples who have created the world's culture and enjoy a rich treasure of national culture.

The great duty of the revolutionary and progressive forces of the society is to hold dear this rich popular and national culture of the people in all its colorful, beautiful, fabulous and valuable dimensions, and to help its advancement more than ever before, and with all their energy.

One of the most painful consequences of the criminal domination of the regime of dependent monarchy in the past century has been the free access given to the domination of colonialist culture in our country, and the efforts of the treacherous ruling classes to abandon our national culture into oblivion. For this reason, the cultural revolution--a decisive fight against illiteracy and semi-literacy, purging the society and the cultural atmosphere of the country of various colonialistic and imperialistic cultural weeds--is one of the most important duties of the glorious revolution of our fatherland. We must ensure that the fight of decolonization of the cultural atmosphere not be accompanied by various maladies of deculturalization on a large scale, and the domination of regressive ideologies. This danger actually and undoubtedly exists, and we are presently witnessing its unpleasant consequences in our society.

It is true that the national culture of the peoples of our country has historical ties with the cultures of many of Iran's neighbors, but this does not mean that we should negate the distinct historical personalities and identities of the national cultures of the peoples living in Iran in all areas including literature, music, theater, painting, etc., and try to bury them in the bed of the general culture of other peoples. The motto of all true revolutionary forces must be: let us dry up the roots of colonialistic, imperialistic culture in the cultural atmosphere of our country, and prepare the ground for the unprecedented development and growth of our national culture, that is, the cultural treasure of all the brother peoples of our country, i.e. the Persians, the Azarbayjan is, the Kurds, Baluchis, Arabs, and Turkomans.

The TPI considers any attempt to imprison the national culture as a sign of cultural backwardness, and believes that such backwardness can only give rise to the growth of regressive inclinations, and will have painful consequences for the social progress of our homeland.

7. THE ADVANCEMENT OF SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

The overall advancement of the social life of our homeland in all areas is impossible without taking advantage of the findings of science and technology. The era of paying backbreaking prices for these findings as imported goods must be brought to an end. This is only possible when progress in these areas becomes one of the most important points of the program of social development, and all the enslaving chains of regression and fogyism are torn from the limbs of the overall growth of science and technology.

The TPI believes that the academy of sciences--which includes natural, social, medical, and agricultural sciences and the humanities, etc--as well as scientific and technical research centers in all important technical fields should be established, and sufficient resources for their expansion be provided.

8. SPORTS

In civilized, developed societies of today sports have become not only one of the most important means of public health but also one of the most important means of nurturing humanitarianism as well as entertainment and relaxation after hard work. Sports are vital for the physical well-being and moral soundness of the youths.

The TPI believes that sports should become a general pasttime of the young and the old, and that providing the means and the opportunity for this pasttime should be a duty of high priority for all executive organizations and social institutions from village councils to the central government of the Islamic Republic. Sports must be freed from their present narrow framework and should be made available to the general public in schools, factories, government institutions, townships, and villages.

9. TOTAL TRAINING OF THE YOUTH

In order that the children and the young people of our country become prepared to carry out their historical duties in the future, attention must be paid to providing opportunities for their overall development. The experiences of developed countries have shown that in addition to organized education in schools, the creation of a large network of sports, research, artistic, scientific, and technical establishments and organizations contribute greatly to the free, voluntary activities of the youth.

The TPI believes that the establishment of youth clubs which would provide the young people with all the necessary facilities is one of the urgent duties of the government and all popular social institutions.

The TPI thus presents its program, which expresses the national and democratic wishes of the masses of tens of millions of the deprived and toiling people of the cities and villages of our society at the present historical stage. The struggle to achieve the goals of this program is the duty of every patriotic Iranian who supports all-round social progress.

The TPI calls on all its members, the supporters of the party, all the progressive strata and classes of the society, especially the workers and their allies--farmers, craftsmen, hard-working intellectuals, and all the Iranian people--to exert efforts to implement this program which is the only way to secure the freedom and prosperity of the Iranian people, and a guide for proceeding towards the overall development of our country.

TUDEH PARTY 17TH PLENUM CONSIDERED 'HISTORIC EVENT'

Tehran MARDOM in Persian 18 Apr 81 pp 3, 6

> [Text] The 17th Plenum of the Central Committee of the Tudeh Party of Iran, which was held this month in Tehran and of which ratified documents as well as the announcement were published in NAMEH-YE MARDOM, is a historical event for our Party. We have not used the term "historical" as an adjective for this event incidentally or rhetorically. In fact, the work of the 17th Plenum, its role in the life of our Party, and the documents prepared will undoubtedly be recorded in the history of the Tudeh Party of Iran, the modern party of the working class, as the manifestation of a distinct stage in the evolution of the Party, the beginning of a new stage, and a guideline on the difficult winding and glorious road that our Party has left behind.

Our ancient country is presently going through a stormy, era-forming stage. During this most sensitive, vital period, our Party has been able to, despite problems and unfavorable conditions, to play its proud role in defending the revolution and strengthening the Islamic Republic of Iran, and in the hard struggle to deepen the revolution and to solve the vital problems of its destiny, which moves along an anti-imperialistic, popular anti-exploitation, democratic, goal. The 17th Plenum was a significant manifestation of the place, role, and mission of the Tudeh Party of Iran in the process of the great revolution of Iran.

The report of the Central Committee's Politburo concerning the activities of the Party since the 16th Plenum (Esfand 57 [Feb-Mar 79])--immediately after the revolution until today--and the program of the Tudeh Party of Iran which contains the essence of our views and proposals for the protection and preservation of the revolution as well as its overall deepening and expansion are examples of scientific and realistic analysis, political depth and foresight, dignity and farsightedness in action, revolutionary zeal and social courage, all of which have characterized our Party during this period of time.

ANALYSIS OF PAST EVENTS

The 17th Plenum was able to respond to our vital needs and concrete demands during this destiny-making period in the history of the revolution and our country. It was able to carry out meritoriously the great duties which were assigned to the leadership of the Party and were to be discussed and decided upon in a gathering of the principal and consultant members of the Central Committee with a number of responsible and cadre-members of the Party present, i.e., the plenary session.

The overall analysis of the situation in the country and the process of the Iranian revolution, with all its complications and numerous peculiarities, and an investigation of the Party's activities in various fields, an important undertaking, was concluded based on the Politburo's report. This analysis became the cornerstone of our future activities. The Tudeh Party of Iran's forty years of experience and struggle in defending the independence, freedom and progress of Iran and the interests of the toilers of our country, and the unfaltering loyalty to the teachings of Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism was the strong foundation upon which our Party was able to devise and carry out the correct class policy of stabilization, strengthening, and expansion of the anti-imperialistic and popular revolution, and of the stabilization and strengthening of the organizations of the Tudeh Party of Iran, as well as improving its activities in the course of the ebbs and flows of the last two years, in the heart of the great complications of the Iranian revolution, and faced with all those peculiarities which would negate any kind of simplistic, mechanical copying. It was also as a logical consequence of this policy that the 17th Plenum was able to successfully complete its work of adding up, evaluating, and analyzing the many experiences of this two-year period.

The comrades who were present at the 17th Plenum, the original and consultant members of the Central Committee, as well as the responsible comrades and the cadres, were inspired by the lives, struggle, and the courage of those comrades alongside and with whom they had started on this difficult, heroic path. The comrades at the plenum emphatically agreed that the memory of those comrades shed a light of confidence, hope, courage, and intelligence over the work of the plenum. It was not merely a ceremonial act when the 17th Plenum began its work with a moment of silence as a sign of deep respect for those comrades who were not among us anymore, but whose memories and the fruits of whose efforts and devotion remain forever--those who passed away, those who were martyred, those who were killed in the battlefield of imposed war their exemplary lives, battles, and the message that they will forever give to the Tudeh members--as they will make us more decisive in continuing along the path to the stabilization, strengthening and deepening of the revolution, will help us think more clearly, and will fill our hearts with more enthusiasm.

THE FUTURE PROGRAM AND LINE

Furthermore, the 17th Plenum is also of historical importance because it opened the way for the future activities of the Party. We are at the threshhold of a qualitative change to deepen the revolution, and we must bring our policy and our activities to a level appropriate to this stage. Our previous party program which was ratified at the 15th Plenum in 1354 [1975-76] centered around the axis of a struggle to overthrow the dependent monarchy and the creation of a republic based upon the foundations of defending the interests of the toiling masses and upon independence and freedom. At this moment, when the Iranian peoples under the leadership of Imam Khomeyni have created a proud historical epic through a glorious revolution in a persistent bloody battle, that program can no longer respond to this new stage in the evolution of the revolution. Life itself has presented us with the necessity of devising a new program. The 17th Plenum ratified the Party's program for the future social forces whose goal is the overall stabilization, strengthening and expansion of the anti-imperialistic and popular revolution. This program is now the basis for the action of all the party comrades and all the friends and supporters of the Party, and is presented to all the true revolutionaries and all interested in the destiny of our revolutionary country for their judgments. This document clarifies the future direction of the Party and is based on the experiences of the past as well as an accurate clear analysis of the present situation.

Our views and proposals for the strengthening and expansion of the gains of the revolution, and for making the revolutionary process irreversible, that is, the way to confirm the gains of our great revolution as well as its decisive and final victory, are expressed in this document. Also, the document contains a clear,concise, accurate summary of what, in our opinion, must be done in various political, economic, social and cultural fields in the future. This, in fact, shows the way for the future growth or our country towards the expansion and deepening of the revolution.

The 17th Plenum, in accordance with its new duties, has decided that [the number of] the principal and consultant members of the Central Committee should be completed. Also, the members of the Politburo, the Board of Secretaries, and the First Secretary of the Central Committee were elected. The implementation of the resolutions of the 17th Plenum is now the responsibility of this leadership, which must display its competence at this sensitive, vital stage of the evolution of the revolution and the Party.

All of these considerations concerning the future activities and guidelines for those activities,--in reality the sign of a new beginning--show another aspect of the historical significance of the 17th Plenum.

WORLDWIDE CREDIBILITY

The credibility and prestige that the Tudeh Party of Iran enjoys in the great fraternal family of parties is not without reason and it has not been achieved easily. The 17th Plenum, as a manifestation of the new stage in the life of our Party, once again reaffirms this highly respected and valuable position among the communist and workers' parties of the world. The work and the documents of the 17th Plenum, as well as its encounter with its mission of the Party towards the Iranian masses and the destiny of the revolution, strengthen our ideological ties and interdependence with all the toilers of the world, all anti-imperialistic forces, all progressive groups, and all national liberation movements. Our Party is loyal to the teachings of Marxism-Leninism and the principles of proletarian internationalism, which today have become the guiding force of a number of counties, are playing a decisive or important role in the national liberation movements of numerous countries, and are the main trend of workers' movements in many countries. In this connection also the 17th Plenum announced its unshakable attitude towards its proper historical position.

It is by no means incidental that all decisions of the 17th Plenum were taken unanimously. The general resolutions of the 17th Plenum, the messages and the report of the Politburo were ratified unanimously. The number of principal and consultant members was completed by unanimous vote. The First Secretary of the Party's Central Committee was elected unanimously. In the 17th Plenum fruitful discussions took place and various views on the completion and ammendment of the documents were either expressed orally or presented in writing. Each time, at the conclusion of the discussions, the votes and decisions were unanimous. This in itself reflects the political, organizational and ideological unity which distinctly characterizes the Party at the present stage, both in the leadership and within the Party in general.

The work of the 17th Plenum of the Central Committee has showed everyone that unanimity of views in the Party of the working class is neither, by any means, instructed or mechanical, nor is it the result of blind discipline or obeying orders, as imperialist propaganda claims. It is the outcome and the reflection of the nature of the Party as the conscious, pioneering force of the working class. Backed by united ideological and one and only organizational principles, following a vital, sound policy, and with persistent and truthful efforts, unanimity is achieved quite naturally.

Such unanimity of opinions and votes is in itself another great success which will be registerd in the reportcard of the 17th Plenum. Our Party has gone through difficult and complicated periods as regards this issue. Now, in contrast to the past, we are able to understand the difficult, long, complicated but fruitful road to maturity and observance of principles that our Party and its leadership have traveled and, we are able to consciously comprehend (and make this comprehension the basis of our policies and activities in the future) that such unanimity of views and atmosphere of sincere comradeship and friendly cooperation can only be attained in a healthy and natural way as a result of the political, organizational and ideological unity of the Party.

This concept is of critical and decisive importance in the life of every working class party. Precisely for this reason, one must pay maximum attention to the 17th Plenum in order to understand its importance and historical role in the life of the Tudeh Party of Iran, the modern party of the working class of our homeland.

Both the general resolutions of the 17th Plenum and the communique of the secretariat of the Central Committee for the formation of the plenum rightly speak of "political, organizational and ideological unity" in the leadership and throughout the Party. This essential unity, which is unprecedented in the 40-year history of the Party, reveals another aspect of the historical significance of the 17th Plenum.

POLITICAL UNITY

We might add that the Tudeh Party of Iran has matured to the point of having a single, concrete, political interpretation and a single point of view. Sometimes, even our friends are surprised that not only the members but also the sympathizers and friends of the Party are acquainted and agree with the writings and political interpretations and orientation of the Party. They all state the same thing, and they are astonishingly united in their thoughts, views and analyses. This unity is not easily achieved within a party. It is the result of a long process of maturity, passing through the stages of childhood and immaturity, and overcoming haste and superficiality. The sources of the present political unity in our Party are the foundations of scientific socialism, our rich experience of 40 years, our ability to make use of these experiences, and the creative application of this ideology. This significant political unity which, friends and enemies agree, is unmatched by any other political party or organization, has made the Tudeh Party of Iran able--as a united body and as a conscious, organized pioneering force of the working class and all toilers--to participate in the scenes of intricate battles and difficult conditions of our revolution and, with the power of this political unity, to play a significant qualitative role in the evolutionary process of the revolution.

The members of our party have come from different social classes and levels; they belong to different nationalities of our country; they have been reared in families with different religious beliefs and traditions; they have different occupations and different levels of education; they live in different provinces, and they have various partisan background. But all of them, men and women, young and old, city-dwellers and villagers, despite the variety and differences resulting from the above factors, have a single political stance, express one party line, one interpretation, one conclusion, one program, and one political view. This unity in majority, this oneness in variety is the source of the strict, conscious discipline and the breeding-ground for that amazing, pride-creating unity of action which is one of the distinguishing features of the Tudeh Party of Iran. The members of our Party function effectively with a concrete goal in the great army of the Iranian revolution, with revolutionary zeal and dignity, with wisdom and exemplary generosity, with clear logic and perseverence in the face of difficulties, with complete attention to revolutionary moral and spiritual values and standards in their lives and behavior, every day in the heat of quickly changing events, with a united political stance. This great gain must be preserved as dearly as the pupils of our eyes. This unprecedented political unity is the fruit of active and conscientious participation of the party members in the political life of the country and the internal life of the Party. It is the fruit of a strong and ever-increasing tie of the Tudeh members with the masses. It it the result of not being drowned in the whirlpool of minor and misdirected issues. It is the result of being kneaded with the needs of the toilers of cities and villages. It is the fruit of avoiding any kind of group prejudices, self-centeredness, and spinning [a web] around themselves. It is the result of rejecting any separation from the masses and their basic national and class interests, and any abstractionism and separation from the actual evolutionary process of the revolution.

The leadership of the Party devises the united policy of the Party on the basis of scientific teachings and past experience by relying on the daily activities and struggles of its members in all areas, and by generalizing the obtained results thereby. In fact, this powerful, sound body of the Party is based on the complete and mutual ties between all its organs and members who create, form, and devise the policies of the Party through experience and action, directed by practical guidance, i.e. scientific socialism. And efforts should be made to have the leadership devise it more conscientiously and more actively than ever before. Political unity is based on strong foundations and undoubtedly it will become stronger, given the theoretical and revolutionary party-line and its ratification by the 17th Plenum.

The present political unity is a great achievement for the Tudeh Party of Iran and a great success for the Party not only in comparison with other political organizations, but also in the history of the party of the Iranian working class. Its existence is a historical success and its preservation and strengthening is the great duty of all the Tudeh members as well as all the true followers of scientific socialism, who are interested in the stability, solidarity and evolution of the party of the Iranian working class.

ORGANIZATIONAL UNITY

The Tudeh Party of Iran, in the wake of the victory of the February revolution, has ended a very difficult period of a quarter of a century in its life, a period which was full of hardships for us from an organizational standpoint. The self-interested, dependent regime of the cursed shah had inflicted devastating blows on the organizational body of the Tudeh Party of Iran. The major objective of the regime of violence, oppression and governmental terrorism--first, the military government and then the royal SAVAK--was the destruction of our Party's organizations. The 25 years between the coup and the revolution were years of the slaughter of a number of the most distinguished leaders, cadres, and members of the Tudeh Party of Iran, the years of beastly tortures aimed at the physical annihilation of the Tudeh members, and long years of imprisonment, confinement and exile. The United States had commissioned its puppet regime not only to declare the Party of the Iranian working class illegal, but to abolish and annihilate it completely. The enemy used every infernal means of murder, strangulation, perversion, disappointment and submission, but did not succeed, and it was certain that it would not. Our Party, like the legendary phoenix, once again pushed aside the 25-year-old ashes and ignited the embers that had never died and could not die.

The two years between the 16th and 17th plenums were years of organizational revival and, in some cases, revitalization of the organizational existence of the Party. Our overcoming organizational disunity, decentralization, and disharmony--in the form of separate groups and local and regional organizations, which were characteristic of the past--and the creation of a smooth-operating, harmonized party organization which would respond to our needs after the revolution, in a period of overt, all-out activity under contradictory and difficult conditions prevailing at present, has been a great success achieved within these two years.

The 17th Plenum became the bright manifestation of this qualitative creation and evolution. Our Party is now totally united and harmonious on all organizational levels. Everyone talks about our organizational formation and unity, which is a powerful weapon that the Tudeh members have gained. The great events of the past two years, our basic, correct, revolutionary policies, and our strong ideological foundation were the reasons for the Tudeh Party of Iran to be proud of its organizational unity at the convention of the 17th Plenum of its Central Committee. The Tudeh members who had spent half their glorious lives in the prisons of the cursed shah and were freed after the revolution; the Tudeh members who joined the Party in prisons; the Tudeh members who were bravely active in secret, underground organizations independently; the aged Tudeh members who, despite all the difficulties and obstacles, had remained loyal to the Party to the last cell of their bodies; the Tudeh members who had joined the Party in the course of the bloody combat and difficult battles of the revolution; the Tudeh members who earlier formed the group which branched out from the Feda'i-yl Khalq guerrilla organization and who had chosen the correct line years before the victory of the revolution; the young Tudeh members who became experienced during the past two years in defending the revolution and in confronting false or deviant views; the Tudeh members in foreign countries who realized that the Tudeh Party of Iran was right, who matured in the course of serious struggles, especially against Maoism, and as a result of struggling against the previous regime were forced to live in exile; and the Tudeh members who returned from political asylum--all of them now form the Tudeh's united column.

The 17th Plenum when evaluating the organizational states of the Party, the latter was no longer a simple collection of all those Tudeh members who had joined the organization through different ways and at different times. The Party had already attained a higher qualitative organizational level, and had secured its organizational unity. This is a valuable gain. This great union and astonishing welding together is the fruit of our scientific teachings, political unity, our correct and realistic analysis, and a sign of the correctness of our path. Different streams which come from various life-giving springs have now formed a single life-creating river and have become a force of change. The organizational unity of our Party has become an important factor in the future evolution of our Party's life, which in turn helps the political and ideological unity of the Party. In the future, too, we must try with all our energy to preserve and safeguard the Party's organizational unity and protect it as though it were our very precious eyesight.

IDEOLOGICAL UNITY

The ideological base and doctrinal foundation of the Tudeh Party of Iran is the scientific teachings of Marxism-Leninism. For many years American imperialism, this cruel enemy of our fatherland and our people, and the Pahlavi court, its various "ideologues," and all those dependent on it, sharply attacked not only our organization but the ideological foundation of our Party. From left to right, through distortion and falsification, they tried to weaken and destroy us also by that means. They took the utmost advantage of Maoism and all its varieties--which had grown like mushroom because of the atmosphere of terror and oppression, and which was both covertly and overtly supported by the previous regime, as well as the imperialistic and Chinese propaganda apparatus and espionage organizations--and penetrated the minds as weeds in a field. The regime of the cursed shah wished to sterilize, stupefy, prostitute, or deviate the minds. And in order to prevent the potential and active revolutionary strugglers--especially the youth--from following the right road of class and popular battle, it encouraged them to take the mistaken, pseudo-leftist, pseudo-revolutionary path. This situation required an intense and overall ideological battle, and the confrontation with the large spectrum of deviant views demanded proper ideological strength and unity. Furthermore, some of the Islamic thinkers, too, unfortunately, sought their antagonist only in Marxism. Although, undoubtedly, exchanges of views, doctrinal and ideological debates are beneficial, fruitful, necessary, and unavoidable, singling out Marxism for attack and ignoring the principal enemy which in this case, as well, is imperialistic ideology, created a peculiar situation. Some of the Islamic scholars only chose to confront the teachings of scientific socialism. And in this, too, unfortunately, they used what the imperialistic propagandists and bourgeois daydreamers had said as grounds for their judgments and yardstick for evaluation of Marxism. Thus, they rejected Marxism as if true Islam, under the banner of which the Iranian revolution was launched, and which was the legacy of Mohammad, 'Ali, and Abuzar, and a leader such as Imam Khomeyni, has had no enemies, such as the Omayyed-style, tyrannical, pro-American Islam, and a variety of capitalist, dominating, hypocritical, imperialistic ideologies.

The reason for the sincere support of the true followers of scientific socialism for the anti-imperialistic people's line of Imam Khomeyni, and the efforts to find a common language with the struggling Moslems following the line of the imam, who are the disciples of the anti-imperialistic, popular, anti-subjugational path, was to defend the reality of Marxism and the truth of its teachings and demonstrate its revolutionary and evolutionary essence. And battling all sorts of anti-Marxist deviations which were carried out in the name of Marxism was a vitally important duty during the course of which the Tudeh Party of Iran strengthened and tempered its ideological unity. Today we can use what we have acquired in the years immediately before and after the revolution as a sure basis for our future ideological progress.

Under our revolutionary complicated, changing conditions, the Tudeh Party of Iran, the present generation of Tudeh members, showed that they are the worthy inheritors of Heydars, Arzanis, and Ruzbehs, and they are able to defend the originality and purity of their scientific teachings. They are able not only to use these teachings creatively under the particular conditions of Iran, but by generalizing the valuable experiences which they have gained in their distinguished lives and in the process of the peculiarities and the complications of the revolution, they are able to enrich those teachings as much as possible and help to elaborate some of its concepts.

The ideological unity of our Party at the time when the 17th Plenum was held is so strong that not only in comparison with other political organizations but even in the history of our own Party it can be considered an important achievement. And it is the duty of all Tudeh members to protect it as they would do for their precious eyesight,because without it the political unity and the organizational unity of our Party would be impossible. And it is also true that without them, this unity will not take root.

Political unity, organizational unity, and ideological unity are not three separate, independent concepts. They are so interrelated that they form one single concept. Hence, we are correct to speak of the political, organizational and ideological unity of the Party. This is another aspect of the historical importance of the 17th Plenum which sets for the Party the very important duty of preserving and strengthening it.

> The outcome of the work of the 17th Plenum of the Central Committee of the Tudeh Party of Iran is now before us in the forms of Resolutions, Messages, Party Program, the Report of the Politburo, and other documents.
> Great duties and heavy responsibilities are also before us.
> We must perform our duty well in this new and sensitive stage of the history of Iran, the revolution, and the Party.
>
> Series of struggles are before us.

TUDEH PARTY 17TH PLENUM MESSAGE TO PARTY MEMBERS

Tehran MARDOM in Persian 13 Apr 81 p 3

[Text] Dear Comrades and friends!

The 17th Plemun of the Central Committee of the Tudeh Party of Iran which has been held during our country's sensitive historic circumstances--under conditions of the expanding and deepening of the Revolution on one side, and the unprecedented intensity of the intrigues of its foreign and domestic enemies led by the world-devouring US imperialism on the other-considers it duty to send its warmest greetings to all comrades, supporters and friends of the Party in various parts of our ancient and extensive country which has been the birthplace and nurturing ground for diverse peoples and the scene of their epic battles. During the Revolution and in the period which followed, you were able to play a worthy and effective role--a role which even the sworn enemies of the Party cannot dispute--by marching in the first ranks of the heroic people of Iran and by supporting the methodical policy of the Party and the anti-imperialistic and popular line of Imam Khomeyni [adopted] in the Revolution. As with the blood of other martyrs, the soil of our country has been painted with the blood of Tudeh martyrs shed in the battlegrounds of the Revolution and on the battlefields of the righteous war against the aggressive regime of Saddam; and the Tudeh members have proved and are proving over and over the highest level of political awareness and ability for self-sacrifice. It is not without reason that members, supporters and friends of the Party--men and women, young and old, urban, rural dwellers and tribesmen--on the one hand, are accorded the ever-increasing affection and trust of the real friends of the Revolution, while, on the other hand, bring upon themselves the beastly wrath of the enemies of the Revolution.

Endurance, self-possession, clear logic, wisdom as well as realistic and scientific comprehension, patience in adversity, avoidance of the use of illogical and unethical methods, perseverence in battle to the point of ignoring danger to one's life, more than ever are becoming the basic characteristics of the Tudeh members who wish to become super human beings, who give priority to the highest spiritual human qualities over calculated personal egoisms.

Dear Comrades and friends! As you see in the various documents of the Plenum, our Revolution, our people, our homeland and our Party are entering a sensitive phase in which all perseverent and genuine forces of the Revolution supporting the Imam's stand must succeed in strengthening and deepening the revolution by relying on the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Iran, and by aborting variously-colored plots of imperialism, regional reaction and Iranian anti-revolutionary forces within and outside Iran. At this stage the Party calls on all its members, supporters and friends to be vigilant and ready for struggle and perseverence in continuing to proceed forward.

The Plenum considers it its duty to sincreely thank all dear comrades, supporters and friends of the Party who have not spared the least effort in their various activities to strengthen the Party and the common cause of the Revolution. The elevation and liberation of any people are linked to the existence of such women and men, girls and boys who consider the concerns of society and the public to be above personal affairs.

The Plenum honors the memory of the Party's martyrs and sends its warm greetings to the survivors of these heros of the movement of workers and toilers of Iran.

We hope all followers of scientific socialism in our country can overcome their dissensions and disputes so that increased steadfastness and pride of the new-level Party of the working class can be achieved in the best manner and the shortest time.

We hope followers of the scientific socialism, side by side with the followers of the perceptibility of revolutionary Islam as well as all other forces who are concerned about the Revolution, the independence, freedom and progress of Iran, will succeed in creating a united peoples' front against the enemies of independence, freedom, progress and social justice.

The continuous plots of imperailism and its domestic agents against the forces of Revolution are warning signals. We do not have the right to let down our revolutionary vigilance for a moment. Yet despite all these complications we look to the future with hope because there are favorable conditions in Iran and the world for the achievement of the noble aims of the revolutionary and heroic people of Iran; and with the victorious and rapid progress of the collective front against world imperialism, these conditions become more favorable each day.

Dear Comrades and friends! Once again accept our warm and sincere greetings.

TUDEH PARTY 17TH PLENUM MESSAGE TO ALL ORGANIZATIONS

Tehran MARDOM in Persian 13 Apr 81 p 3

[Text] Dear friends! The splendid Bahman [February] Revolution, under the farsighted and persistent leadership of Imam Khomeyni, and with the self-sacrificing and total participation of tens of millions of the masses of our country was victorious against the sinister Pahlavi regime and its imperialist masters, headed by the United States, the great Satan, and is now in its third year [of existence] after neutralizing various plots by imperialism, the anti-revolution and forces of compromise. But the Revolution is still on the road and has yet to reach its definite and final stability and strength. With the United States in the forefront, world imperialism, along with all reactionary forces of the region, all domestic and foreign anti-revolutionary forces--by using the liberal capitalist forces of compromise, and by taking advantage of the self-serving or erroneous methods of some individuals and groups within the revolutionary camp--is trying to destroy the Iranian Revolution either through transformations from within or by overthrow, thus repeating a much more sinister tragedy in Iran than that of 28 Mordad [Mosaddeq's overthrow] and to bring to nought the results of the great movement to which the people have given so much.

During the past regime, imperialism plundered the huge oil resources of Iran and imposed billions [of dollars] of military equipment in return for a large share of our oil revenues, it took advantage of the 'open door' policy to fill our country's huge market with its consumer goods, and at the same time it made the despotic shah's monarchic regime its gendarme of the region against the people of Iran and progressive movements and systems and a close collaborator of Zionism. Now it is highly angered over Iran's Revolution and, as is its nature and has demonstrated many a time in history, it will not turn away from any conspiracy, deceit and criminal act to regain its lost positions in our country.

The defeat of past plots of various hues never made U.S. imperialism understand that it must face the Iranian people and the Iranian Revolution on a footing of equal rights. On the contrary, US imperialism, and its other Western allies as well as Zionism, superiority-seeking China and reactionary governments of the region, have increased their efforts tenfold to gradually weaken and isolate the Revolution and its leadership through economic encirclement, creation of dissension, suspicion and discord among revolutionary forces and through the use of terror, unrest, rumor-mongering, slander and all other weapons they have in their devilish armory, aimed at paving the way for their sinister aims.

Only and only unity of action by all revolutionary forces, organizations and revolutionary institutions under the wise, experienced and resistant leadership of Imam Khomeyni can bring to the desired conclusion the great work which was started: that is, to establish an independent, uncommitted, free Iran, a country endowed with justice in this ancient land, and to convert our country to a base of peace and stability in the Middle East and in the world as well. That which is truly a source of worry to all friends of the Revolution in our country, is the success of the visible and invisible agents of imperialism in creating dissension and discord in the ranks of the revolutionary forces, organizations and institutions in setting them against each other-occurences which unfortunately can be seen in various parts of the country. The reactionary forces of our society, such as big landowners and capitalists, encouraged and supported by imperialism and Zionism, and by using the forces of Iran's liberal bourgeoisie, are trying their utmost to make a reality of the wishes which Reagan, the US president, has expressed about our country.

With a feeling of deep responsibility, the 17th Plenum of the Central Committee of the Tudeh Party of Iran expresses deep concern over this situation and invites all genuine revolutionary forces, institutions and organizations, governmental or non-governmental, whatever their beliefs and viewooints, to rally around the experienced leadership of Imam Khomeyni, and to refrain strictly from wasting their strength and weakening each other by various means.

Whether during the period of the overthrow of the despotic monarchy, or in the fight against imperialism and anti-revolution, or in the present war against the aggressor Saddam, the Iranian Revolution has suffered tens of thousands in killed, wounded and disabled, and hundreds of thousands in refugees. This unprecedented revolution of our history has paid a high price for liberating our people; and weakening or harming it is a big sin. This Revolution was a revolution of the toiling masses of Iran, and ghetto-dwellers gave their lives for it. Its social results must be beneficial to millions of masses of workers and peasants.

We believe in democratic freedoms and the need to insure the legal means of existence and activity for all genuine popular and revolutionary forces, organizations and institutions (as specified in the Constitution of the Islamic Republic) but at the same time we believe that the question of defending the Revolution and securing its victory, as well as insuring the legitimate rights of urban and rural toilers is a matter of common interest for the people, with no individual having the right, because of harmful aims and miscalculations or narrow-minded monopolistic views, to damage this common and sacred cause. Such attitudes which in reality facilitate the work of the criminal enemy of the Revolution must be strictly avoided before it is too late.

The 17th Plenum of the Central Committee of the Tudeh party of Iran hopes that genuine revolutionary forces, institutions and organizations can overcome difficulties by mobilizing all their strength, and benefiting from support of the anti-imperialist and popular policy of Imam Khomeyni within the framework of respect for the Constitution of the Islamic Republic--thereby taking the Revolution to the stage of strength and depth so that the hands of big landowners can be removed from lands which rightfully belong to the toiling Iranian farmers, putting an end to feudalism in Iran once and for all. And by removing from the nation's overall economy the plundering hands of leech-type big capitalists and their agents, to open the way for an all-out blooming of the economy in meeting the rightful needs of tens of millions of the deprived urban and rural masses, in practice to nationalize foreign trade (in accordance with the Constitution of the Islamic Republic), so that the toiling people of the cities and villages can be freed from strangling inflation and the economic difficulties caused by this boundless plunder. Foreign policy should be non-committed, realistic and wise, distinguishing friends and enemies or our Revolution from each other, while domestic policy should respect freedoms specified in the Constitution without leanings toward any monopolistic and sectarian attitudes, thus to ensure the national rights of the peoples living on Iranian soil.

Our Revolution which relied on the unity and widespread movement of the urban and rural toiling masses from the very start, now more than ever needs these two basic and indictative characteristics.

The 17th Plenum of the Central Committee of the Tudeh Party of Iran takes the opportunity to send its warmest greetings to Imam Khomeyni, the leader and founder of the Islamic Republic of Iran, and to all genuine revolutionary forces, organizations and institutions (whether governmental or social) and wishes them success in enhancing the progress of the sacred cause of the people of Iran.

ARAB LOANS TO DEVELOPING COUNTRIES CITED

Kuwait KUWAIT TIMES in English 29 Oct 81 p 11

[Text]

KUWAIT — The Arab funds for development provided loans totalling $1117 million during the first half of this year to needy nations in the Arab world, Africa, Asia and Latin America, an official report said.

In the first quarter of 1981, 41 loan agreements were concluded with 30 developing countries totalling $579.08 million in addition to eight technical assistance loans costing $2.97 million, the report added.

Over 69 per cent of the allocations were approved for infrastructural projects while the remainder of the appropriations were made to improve the balance of payments, financing foreign trade operations and to the agro-industrial sectors.

During the second quarter of the year, Asian countries received $ 253.36 million compared to $208.9 during the first quarter.

Arabs' share in the second quarters decreased from $263.07 millions in the first quarter to $125.86 during the period April-June.

The share of African countries increased from $66.01 millions in the first quarter to $189 million in the second, the report added. A $10 million loan was made to a Latin American country during the first half of the year.

PROJECTS

During the first quarter of 1981, Abu Dhabi Fund for Arab Economic Development (Adfaed) concluded loan agreements totalling ($25.39 million) for financing electricity projects in South Yemen and Niger, the development of an airport in Rawanda and a Sudanese cotton industry.

The Arab Bank for Economic Development in Africa (Abeda) finalised two agreements totalling $20 million during the second quarter of the year.

Abeda funds were utilised in an airport project for Congo and a chemical industry for Senegal.

In the first quarter of 1981 the bank concluded a $9 million agreement to finance a road project for Cameron and a feasibility study of a Senegalese animal project.

The Arab Fund for Economic and Social Development (Afesd) concluded three agreements during the second quarter of 1981 totalling $24.85 million compared to four agreements ($62.26 millions) in the first quarters.

The funds were used in financing communications, sewage, electricity, fishing and water projects in various parts of the Arab world.

STUDY

During the first half of the year Afesd also provided technical assistance for a number of projects including a study on the future of development in the Arab world.

During the first quarter of the year, the Islamic Development Bank (IDB) concluded agreements for loans totalling $203.18 million (157.18 Islamic dinar units).

Nine IDB loans to six Arab states were mostly used in financing foreign trade operations while seven credits were made to four Asian countries, the report added.

The Islamic bank had also made four loans to three African states in addition to $600,000 in the form of technical assistance to Djibouti.

Kuwait Fund for Arab Economic Development (KFAED) concluded loan agreements totalling $266.08 million (KD 74.95) during the second quarter of 1981, the report said.

The figure compares to a total of $70.30 million (KD 19.42 million) in the first quarter.

Over $130 million were allocated for energy projects in addition to $32.30 million for Arab and $25.42 million for African states.

The Saudi Fund for Development (SFD) increased its loan commitment from $112.14 million in the first quarter to $157.65 in the second.

The funds were utilised in financing water, sewage, irrigation and rural development projects, mostly in Asian countries.

Opec's special fund provided loans totalling $112.14 million in the first quarter compared to 157.65 in the second, the report added.

The greater part of the fund was used in improving the balance of payments in Asian, African, Latin American and Arab States.

MARITIME FRAUD LINKED TO GULF WAR

Paris AN-NAHAR ARAB REPORT & MEMO in English No 45, 9 Nov 81 pp 11,12

[Text]

The International Maritime Bureau (IMB) reports an upsurge in marine fraud sparked off by the Iran-Iraq war. Ships bound for the Gulf have been diverted from their official routes to other ports in the area and the cargoes have found their way to Iran or Iraq by illegal means.

An official of the London-based Bureau told An-Nahar Arab Report & MEMO that at least one case a week was coming to light involving false letters of credit being cashed by the consignors before the goods are shipped to the Gulf.

Another problem directly linked to the war is that of cargoes disappearing as a result of overcrowded ports. There may, in fact, be no actual deceit involved, but ports such as Aqaba are not geared to handle the enormous volume of transit traffic it currently receives and mistakes occur which result in the loss of cargoes.

Efforts to combat marine fraud in Lebanon are still coming up against problems as the various interested parties find new ways to get around the latest measures brought in to tackle fraud, the IMB says.

Arab efforts to improve coastal monitoring have not yet come to fruition; meanwhile two high-powered boats used by the Lebanese Army appear to have been taken over by the right-wing Phalangist militia group.

As import taxes are totally ignored, a thriving contraband business is being carried on in Beirut. One customer recently ordered a printing press from West Germany and this was delivered within a week complete with guarantee. The IMB has also noted reports of a couple of 10,000-ton "floating warehouses" in the eastern Mediterranean, on which goods are stored after being hijacked to order. The ships avoid the major shipping lanes and can provide anything from heavy construction equipment to the latest colour television set at a knock-down price of £20 (about $37).

The Lebanese Embassy in London, however, believes that the situation has improved. A spokesman commented: "We are doing our best and are confident that we are containing the situation."

The Lebanese government has recently strengthened regulations covering oil supplies to ships in an attempt to curb smuggling. Ships taking on gas oil or fuel oil will have to have a licence issued by the Lebanese Shipowners' Association confirming the vessel's identity. Fuel supplies will have to be registered on a special document.

These matters will have to be discussed in further detail in London from November 9-20 when the 12th session of the General Assembly of the Inter-governmental Maritime Consultative Organisation (IMCO) meets in London to draw up and pass various resolutions to further combat marine fraud, barratry and piracy.

BRIEFS

KUWAIT LOAN TO IRAQ--Kuwait agreed in principle last week to lend Iraq $7 billion, according to the president of the Kuwaiti Parliament's Financial and Economic Committee, Jassem al-Khorafi. Mr al-Khorafi said the Kuwaiti Parliament will soon consider a draft bill on the loan, which was requested by Iraq. Kuwait lent Iraq $2 billion in April as part of a $14 billion package Iraq had sought from Kuwait, Saudi Arabia, Qatar, and the UAE to help repair damages suffered in its 13-month-old war with Iran. The April loan was repayable over 10 years without interest or commission. [Text] [Paris AN-NAHAR ARAB REPORT & MEMO in English No 45, 9 Nov 81 p 3]

IRAQI LOANS TO YAR--Baghdad--Two loan agreements have been signed between Iraq and North Yemen. Under the first agreement the Iraqi Fund will finance the construction of three medical centres in 'Aab' governorate in North Yemen. The second is for 100 hospital beds in the same government. ADVANCES REPORTED IN VARIOUS PUBLIC SERVICES

Cartography Project

Kabul KABUL NEW TIMES in English 21 Oct 81 p 3

[Text]

In a developing country such as Afghanistan the success of development projects depends often on the availability of suitable mapping. Due to the efforts of the Afghan Geodesy and Cartography Department, assisted by the United Nation, projects ranging from agriculture to communications, and geology to archaeology have all benefitted from improved mapping.

This assistance, has continued since the early 1960's. The present phase of the UNDP-financed project is planned to terminate at the end of 1981. From 1976 to the end of 1981, UNDP will contribute nearly $1.2 million to the project. There are now four UN experts working at the Department and the workshop in Khair Khana: a geodesist (who is also the Team Leader), a photgrammetrist, a cartographer, and an instrument mechanics expert. In addition, on short-term contracts, a printing specialist, and two instrument constructors, are also engaged.

At present, the Project has directed its activities to those which can be carried out in the relevant branches of the Department and to training of national staff. One important activity now being carried on is that of improving the basic geodetic frame for Afghanistan; through hiring of equipment at a cost of approximately $100,000, tracking of the Doppler satellite at eight different points of the country by different Afghan crews, and then computing the results; a new high precision system of basic points will be established in Afghanistan. These points will create a very precise frame which will give the possibility of uniform mapping of the country.

In photogrammetry, the Department has become one of the most developed organizations in the region. Topographic maps, due to modern photogrammetric equipment, and modern methods implemented with the assistance of the UNDP photogrammetric expert, can be produced.

The workshop at Khair Khana now houses approximately $200,000 worth of equipment supplied by UNDP. One of the tasks of the instructment mechanics expert is to train national staff in the many precise uses of this complex equipment.

The Institute now hopes to install its own minicomputer system by December 1981, and training of national staff, which to present has been limited to theory and pocket computers, must be expanded and the real data processing by means of computer implemented.

Future activities and ways of achieving them will be determined in a review of the project which will take place shortly. One way of assisting the Afghan Geodesy and Cartography Head Office in the future may be by a twinning arrangement with an equivalent organization, which would ensure continued technical assistance. Whatever form future assistance takes, efficient mapping of Afghanistan will lead to efficient development in the years to come.

Commercial Loans

Banke Millie Afghan made a total profit of Afs. 281 million during the Afghan year 1359, which compared to the year 1358 shows 96 per cent increase, an unprecedented figure in the history of the Bank, Mohammad Akram Khalil, Executive President of the Bank told a reporter of the Kabul New Times in an interview recently.

The accounts and deposits of the people with the bank, including savings, deposits and current accounts has been considerably increased during the same year compared to the last two years. About Afs. 2758.22 million was held in these accounts in 1359 and in 1358 it was Afs. 2267.56 million. There has thus been an increase of 31.8 per cent in saving accounts, 18.7 per cent in profit-bearing deposits accounts, 71.8 per cent in non-profit bearing deposit accounts and 13.9 per cent in the current accounts.

Answering a question Khalil said: Granting of loans and credits is part of the active transactions of the bank, like other commercial banks of the country through sale of afghanis and hard currency loans. The total volume of loans in afghanis covering loans for carpets and karakul skin exporters, barter, credit, shares and miscellaneous and amounted to Afs. 563.81 in 1359.

The volume of hard currency loans including dollars, pound sterling and DM after conversion into afghani amounted to Afs. 1140.68 million during the same year.

As far as passive activities of the bank is concerned, noted Khalil, efforts will be made to attract more capital through various possible means and provision of facilities. Likewise, in active transactions, efforts will be made to see that the bank plays a major role in further financing of commercial items. Of course, the scope of activity of the bank will be determined by the credit plan of the respective year.

Assessing the balance sheet of 1359 of the bank, Khalil said: The balance sheet of the bank in 1359 is an indication of the fact that the total benefit would have amounted to Afs. 311.74 million if the incomes of the affiliated organisations of the bank had reached the figure of Afs. 48 million like last year. However, with a decline of Afs. 30 million in affiliated incomes the total profit of the bank amounted to Afs. 281.01. On the contrary the foreign based affiliated incomes of the bank in 1359, compared to previous years, shows a considerable increase. The incomes of Afghan American Trading Company in 1357 was for instance Afs. 13.20 million and in 1358 it was Afs. 25.54 million and in 1359 it was increased to Afs. 31.85 million. A glance at the incomes of other foreign branches of the bank shows the accelerated operations of these branches.

There has not been any marked change in depreciation, salaries, advertisements and publicity, maintaining cost of computer etc. However there has been a sharper increase in the expenditure column in view of rise of interests paid to clients. In 1359 the figure standing for interest paid amounted to Afs. 106,90, while in 1357 it was Afs. 86.79 million. The rise in interest as far as expenditures is concerned is attributed to increase in volumes of saving and interest-bearing deposit accounts, which again manifests the success of the bank, he declared.

The executive president of the bank said that after the victory of the Saur Revolution, especially its new phase, the confidence of people in the bank has increased greatly and they now feel secure enough to deposit their money in the bank.

The coming of increasing number of people to the banks is a sign for the confidence as well as the added facilities provided for them.

In the past, each bank in the country drew individual plan on the basis of which they regulated their activities. However, now a credit plan, based on the new banking system has been introduced in the country. It is followed by all banks in the country, said Khalil. Banke Millie Afghan also pursues this credit plan and tries to implement it totally. The bank also translates into action the credit guidance and consultative views of the Finance Ministry, to render more effective services, he added.

Kabul Sewage System

Kabul KABUL NEW TIMES in English 26 Oct 81 p 8

[Text]

"Preliminary work for the Kabul city sewage, covering three residential projects and the central part of the city, seeking ways and means of financing the project and its design were among the important topics discussed at the first meeting of the technical consultative board of the Kabul city held recently. After scrutiny and deliberations on these issues, the participants at the meeting took effective and useful decisions."

Stating this in an interview with our reporter, Eng Sediq Ebadi, president of the planning department of the Kabul Municipality, elaborated on the need for formation, the strength and methods of work of the Kabul City Technical Consultative Board in coordinating the work for expansion and balanced development of the city.

He said: "The board is composed of representatives of the Ministries of Public Works, Communications, National Defence, and Water and Power, Mines and Industries, Education, Agriculture and Land Reforms, and Transport and Tourism, the State Planning Committee and the cartography department". The first meeting of the board was held under the chairmanship of Eng Adeena Sangeen, the Mayor of Kabul.

Subjects discussed at the first meeting included organisation and assessment of a regulation governing the Kabul Master Plan, the project for determining the site for first stage of residential services and other constructions during the five years, issues relating to designing of the purification plant and, most important of all, the first stage of the sewage system for three residential projects and the central part of the city.

In its first meeting, the board also approved its provisional charter which, after the due legal process, has been made effective and is being enforced. The charter calls for monthly meetings of the board under the chairmanship of the Kabul Mayor.

It provides for consultation on: Problems related to implementation of the Kabul Master Plan, consultations on design and determination of the site for construction of the projects by various plants, on solving problems in relation to construction and engineering networks drawn up by Government organisations, and in relation to sites where valuable Government projects are planned to be built.

"The objective of formation of the board", said Eng Ebadi, "is to coordinate the work of interested organisations in solving the problems concerning the implementation of the Master Plan as far as determining the site of construction, kind of design, industrial and residential construction, ensuring greenery and engineering grids etc is concerned."

"The Master Plan is designed and drawn up for all-sided development and expansion of the city and ensuring the welfare and comfort of nearly two million people. This great plan was legalised in 1978 and its implementation began in the following year", noted Eng Ebadi.

"On the basis of the endorsement of the DRA Government, the implementation of the Master Plan began for the first time in 1979 with the construction and asphalting of roads and distribution of plots for residential quarters in Khushal Khan Mena, Khairkhana Mena, Third Parwan, Rahman Mena, and Wazir Abad Mena as part of the work of the Kabul Municipality. All this work continues regularly and in accordance with the Master Plan", he said.

In accordance with the Master Plan, the Third Parwan, Karte Ariana and Wazirabad are earmarked as residential areas and, for many years, a great number of citizens have built themselves houses, as defined in the detailed plans. However the table of subterranean water in these areas is so high that, during the first months of the year, it submerges the roads, bridges and culverts and even the residential houses, directly threatening the residents.

"Similarly, those of our compatriots who have received plots for housing in these areas cannot build themselves houses due to accumulation of water on the plots", he noted.

"This problem has been there for many years and the residents have repeatedly voiced their complaints, which unfortunately in the past went unheeded, with no action taken to solve this problem", he recalled.

"Under the present conditions when the Government organisations deem it their duty and obligation, in accordance with the policy and directives of the party and Government, to be sincerely responsive and at the service of the people, and strive to solve the people's problems and meet their needs, the Municipality as an organ directly responsible for construction and daily life of the people, put forward a proposal in this regard which was approved by the authoritative sources", he added.

An agreement was signed with the Water and Power Ministry on drawing up an designing a canal in Wazirabad.

"With the construction of the canal and channelling of water which, during the winter and spring causes, heavy financial damages to the residents every year, and threatens their lives due to humidity, life for the people in the four residential projects will become more comfortable", he pointed out.

The 18-km long canal begins from Karte Ariana and enters the Third Parwan residential area and there crosses from the middle part of Wazirabad and Khairkhana residential areas into Lagons area earmarked for city sewage and, running from the vicinity of the Kabul International Airport, it enters an area behind the industrial plants in Pule Charkhi. And finally it is to be linked with Kabul river.

The depth of the digging is estimated at 450 cubic metres. In addition. to design and mapping expenses, the total spending on the the canal is to reach some two million Afghanis.

The starting point of the canal will be 11 meters wide and, in some areas, the length will reach 25 metres. The completion of the canal will greatly help the first stage of the planned sewage.

The residential projects of the Housing Cooperative in third Parwan. and apartment houses belonging to the National Defence Ministry are scheduled to be completed soon. Work has begun on the Shahrara residential project, making all the more necessary the construction of the first stage of sewage system for the residential projects. The Municipality hopes that the interested organisations will pay due attention to this project.

"The water for the city is supplied by the water supply and sewage department of the Public Works Ministry and it is hoped that, with the completion of Afshar pottable water project, the needs of residents of Khairkhana Mena and Wazirabad for this essential is totally met", Eng Ebadi noted.

"The first stage of the Kabul sewage for three residential projects and central part of city drew greater attention of the members of the board and views were exchanged on possibilities of financing of the project and its design", he recalled.

"It was thus resolved that the project requires more careful research and study. It ought to be determined whether a technical or a natural purification system is more useful and economic. And it was decided that, in the future meetings, specific proposals should be prepared on these alternatives".

On the basis of Article 8 of the regulation governing the board, the following, after voting, were elected and appointed as members of the leading body:

—Eng Adena Sangeen, Kabul Mayor, Chairman,

—Hamid Barna, Technical Vice-President of Kabul Municipality as member and secretary,

—Daoud Saroosh, president of the City Projects Institute, member,

—Abdul Satar Ureya, president of the water supply and sewage department, member, mber, and Eng Abdul Satar Safi, president of the Kabul electricity department, member.

Loans for Housing

Kabul KABUL NEW TIMES in English 28 Oct 81 p 8

[Text]

The Mortgage and Construction Financing Bank has so far extended 1239 loans to workers, employees, officials, military officers and retired officials, who have met the conditions for benefitting from such loans, for construction, completion and repair of houses located in one of the housing projects of Kabul.

Faiz Mohammad, president of the bank talked to the Kabul New Times reporter on terms of the loans, the volume of loans, and the number of recipients in 1359 as well as on the method of activity of the bank in serving the homeless people in the country.

He said: "The bank's loans, ranging from Afs. 30,000 to Afs. 50,000, are paid to the applicants after due legal procedure and, after the needs and requirements of the recipient are found to be compatible with the conditions under which loans are extended.

The loans are meant to help the workers, employees, officials, military officers and retired civil servants to construct and complete their half-finished houses to become owner of a house—an important contribution towards implementation of the housing projects in the city."

The workers, officials, military officers and retired civil servants whose period of services in Government organisations is at least 10 years and have a plot of land in one of the housing projects in the city are entitled to the loans provided they have already begun the construction work on the plot.

To make sure that the loans are repaid on a regular basis, the bank seeks to obtain a verification from the concerned Government departments about the official engagement of an applicant and as well as a commitment about the monthly payment of the instalment and transferring it to the bank account. The applicants are required to have served their military service.

Before agreeing to loans for applicants, the bank makes all necessary inquiries about them, as part of the precautionary measures to make sure that the loans are paid on time and without any hitches. The recipients are required to present proof of the ownership of the half finished houses in one of the housing projects. Before making a final decision, the bank also ascertains if the applicant is really in need of such loan.

Towards the end of 1358, the total amount of loans not repaid or settled amounted to Afs 87.82 million and, by the end of 1359 it stood at Afs 104.75 million, which shows an increase of Afs 16.93 million or 19.27 per cent.

At present, the total number of recipients who have utilised the loans, the period set for repayment of whose loans has not expired or, in other words, who have not settled their accounts is more than 5,000. In the course of 1359, loans was extended to 881 applicants and in 1359 to 1239—an increase of 358 recepients or 40.63 per cent.

The bank is a specialised one and the scope of its activities is confined to extension of loans for construction of houses, completion of half-finished and repair of houses belonging to workers and civil servants. The loans bear a low-interest compared to those of other banks in the country.

Unlike in the case of other banks, the loans extended by this bank are long-term and repaid in monthly instalments, deducted from the monthly salaries of the recepients.

The bank charges an eight per cent interest on its loans while the interest charged by other banks is 12 per cent.

The net profit of the bank in 1359, compared to 1358, was 46.89 per cent more, and this rise is attributable to the increasing credit activities of the bank and banking services and partly also to improved and sound management.

The profit recorded during the 1359, one year after the new phase of the revolution, was considerable not only compared to 1358 but to the four preceding years.

The bank was established in 1947 under the name of Construction Fund with Afs 30 million. In 1954, its name was changed into Mortgage and Construction Bank and its capital was raised to Afs 60 million. In 1976, when the banks in the country were nationalised, the permissible capital of the bank was set at Afs 200 million. However, its paid capital now is Afs 100 million.

Technical Standards

Kabul KABUL NEW TIMES in English 31 Oct 81 p 3

[Text]

The Norms and Standards Department was established for the first time in 1973 within the framework of the Mines and Industries Ministry. The department has carried out a series of studies and research on problems caused by lack of standardisation in various fields of life especially the sectors of industries, trade, services, and agriculture. Despite problem of shortage of experienced cadres and financial difficulties, the department has carried out, with the assistance of scientific and research institutes, a series of major tasks.

These include setting up of 23 standards and standard recommendation forms for textiles manufactured in public and private sectors, standards for raisins and the hygienic standard for fruit processing plants in the recommendation forms, standard specifications for the Ghor Cement Plant, determination of the norm for expenditure of fuel for vehicles and various machinery, publication of 13,000 copies of procedures for sorting ginned cotton for cotton-growers and gin and press plants, determination of the norms and standards for a number of products such as sample standard of cotton boxes. The department has also conducted a series of courses and seminars and determined a series of norms for various sections with the cooperation of interested organisations.

The performance of the department is better organised in the light of the Saur Revolution, its new phase in particular, and positive steps have been taken towards determining the norms and standards for products. For instance, it has determining the norms for 674 kinds of transportation vehicles and 108 kinds of machinery, held seminars and training courses for cotton sorters in the cotton-growing provinces, reintroduced the subject of standardisation principles and control of quality of products at the Polytechnic Institute, and introduces the subject for senior students at the vocational schools and technicums in the current Afghan year with the help of the vocational education department of the Higher and Vocational Education Ministry.

Stating all this in an interview with the Kabul New Tiems, Eng Taj Mohammad Yarmand, director-general of the department, added: "The standard in its scientific form was introduced at the start of 20th century when the first norms and standard institute was established in Britain in 1906. Presently there are thousands of national, regional and international standards being enforced throughout the world in various sections of life especially in industries and technology."

In Afghanistan, the standard in its local form has a history of 5,00 years and its relics can be seen at the Kabul Museum, excavations of Hadda, Tela Tapa, Ai-Khanum and in the historical structures such as Congregational Mosques of Herat, Bost Arch and Ghazni minarets. However, practice of standardisation in its modern form began in our country in 1974. And, with the victory of the Revolution, especially its new phase, the concerned authorities are paying more attention to popularisation of standardisation.

On the basis of its charter, the department is assigned to prepare standards for the products, materials, the methods and systems, taking into view the international progress and the conditions and requirements of the country, and strive for their popularisation and enforcement at the national level.

The development and popularisation of norms and standards requires a long time as it poses complicated scientific, technical and economic problems. What accelerate the process of development and popularisation of standardisation in a country are education, publications, and scientific research as well as practical experiences, said Eng Yarmand.

Notwithstanding the numerous difficulties, the department has achieved some successes in its work under the guidance of the interested authorities and cooperation of scientific and industrial institutes. In this connection, familiarisation of students with principles of standardization and quality of products is noteworthy. Some 2,500 students, who have graduated until this current Afghan year from Polytechnic Institute, College of Economy, and vocational schools, are estimated to have learned the subject with the cooperation of the ministry. Similarly, through seminars and courses, some 43 personnel have been trained in the field until 1360.

The number of skilled employees, who have enriched their knowledge in the field through participation in seminars and international training, programmes reach 14.

The problems of quality are manifold and each one has to be tackled in view of its economic importance and the possibilities and means available. For instance, determining the sortment and standard of cotton with scientific and technical methods to raise the quality of cotton, sound guidance of newly established institutions and enterprises in production of such products as shoe cream, soaps, and pressure-cookers by laboratory analysis as well as technical specifications for interested organisations are among the problems to be tackled.

"By further equipping the norms and standard sections and staffing them with experienced and highly educated personnel and availability of equipment for assessment and quality-testing with the cooperation of the concerned organisations, those standards will be enforced which have a high economic priority and whose enforcement is in the interest of the toiling people of Afghanistan", said Eng Yarmand.

In the first stage, the activities of the department will be focussed on provision, compilation and determination of locally manufactured products and exportable goods as well as on chalking out scientific quality control methods aimed at restricting the import of inferior quality goods.

Eng Yarmand recalled that, on October 14, 1970 for the first time the World Standard Day was marked, when Faruk Sunder served as the President of the International Standard Organisation (ISO), to draw wider attention to the activities of standardisation, generally, and world standardisation in particular. Since then, every year, the day is being marked by members of the ISO.

The ISO is entrusted with development of standards in all technological fields except electro-technical looked after by the IFC, an affiliate, of the ISO. The ISO was established in 1947 following the Second World War on the basis of the International Standardisation Association (ISA), which was established in 1926 for engineering activities.

The ISO has some 90 members. Its main tasks are drawing up of drafts of international standards and international recommendations and approval of interntional standards. It also carries out scientific research and training programmes for the benefit of member institutes.

ACCOMPLISHMENTS REPORTED IN AGRICULTURAL DEVELOPMENT

Loans to Cooperatives

Kabul KABUL NEW TIMES in English 29 Oct 81 p 2

[Editorial: "Agriculture Posted for Major Advance"]

[Text]

Afghanistan has rich natural resources and favourable climatic conditions for growing crops and breeding livestocks. Eighty-five per cent of the country's manpower is engaged, directly and indirectly, in farming and livestocking. Thus, the agricultural and livestock products and by-products constitutes one of the prominent sources of the national income, making agriculture the major economic sector in Afghanistan.

The DRA Government, in pursuance of its progressive policy, has undertaken, planned programmes aimed at enhancing the agricultural output in the interest of the vast masses of the farming population in the country and with the active participation of farmers.

As part of its efforts for development of agriculture, the Government is providing bank credits to farmers for purchase of tools and machinery, improved seeds and chemical fertilisers, to help them increase their land productivity. Increasing numbers of farmers are organised in agricultural cooperatives. By joining the cooperatives the farmers and livestockers can utilise the considerable facilities available for better production methods.

The farmers can obtain a better price for their products sold through the cooperatives. Through them, again they can obtain required loans on time and on favourable terms. They can also get inputs of a high quality at reasonable prices.

Individual farmers find it difficult to market their surplus produce and get desirable prices as farms are located far away from the market places. There is a lack of motorable roads in some areas and irregularity in transportation, as well as a lack of storage—and finally of marketing knowledge on the part of farmers. These are factors that reduce the income of the peasants.

The cooperatives provide a solution to most of these problems and help put an end to the illegal practices of middlemen who can thrive only at the farmers' cost.

Through the cooperatives, the farmers can easily establish contacts with the interested organisations such as the Agricultural Development Bank, the Afghan Chemical Fertilizer Company and the Afghan Seeds Company which provide the essential inputs for farmers and contribute to popularisation of mechanised farming in the country, to replace the old and primitive methods of farming.

Other major steps taken by the Government to raise the farming produce in the country are launching of spring and autumn sowing campaigns and increased distribution of improved seeds to farmers to help these campaigns.

As a result of efforts made by the Government and the wise plans drawn to augment agricultural output in the country, as well as the untiring efforts of the farmers and livestockers with the help of material and technical assistance of the Government, the overall agricultural yield as well as the livestock produce is reported to have increased compared to the last year.

The Minister of Agriculture and Land Reforms, in an interview on agricultural production and development as well as the future plans of the Government, has termed the over-all farm production in the country as "satisfactory". According to him, the total output of crops this year will reach 4.5 million tons, out of which wheat will account for 2.85 to 2.9 million tons. He also expects the raw cotton production will increase by 15,000 tons and that of sugar-beet by 10,000 tons —or by 23 and 28 per cent respectively—compared to last year.

Similarly, some two per cent increase is expected in livestock production.

Now that the land reforms programme is being implemented with the massive participation of farmers on the basis of just and democratic land and water distribution to the benefit of the toiling peasants in this country, it is hoped that the farmers will do more and make the maximum use of all facilities provided to them by the Government to raise their production and thus play a major role in the overall development of of the national economy and improvement of their people's living standards.

Increased Cotton Production

[Editorial: "Cotton Output Reflects Overall Farm Growth"]

[Text]

The DRA Government, as the true protector of the rights and interests of peasants and the farming population in the country, is exerting revolutionary efforts to secure a decent life for the toiling masses. For the prosperity of peasants and in an effort to help them increase their land productivity, the Government is providing gigantic assistance to farmers.

Following the Saur Revolution, and its new phase in particular, there has been a marked increase in distribution of improved seeds, chemical fertilisers and agricultural tools which has enabled the farmers to augment the per unit productivity of their lands.

As part of efforts to develop agriculture, where some 85 per cent of the country's manpower is engaged, the Government has undertaken all-sided and comprehensive programmes. Through interested and concerned organisations, it has increased technical and financial assistance to the farmers as well as provided them with technical guidance.

The Agricultural Development Bank, the Afghan Chemical Fertiliser Company, the Afghan Seeds Company have increased the scope of their activities in providing the farmers with easy-term credit, provisions of agricultural tools, improved seeds and fertilisers as part of the plans to develop agricultural production in the country and at the same time achieve the aim of popularising mechanised farming in the country.

The Agriculture Extension Department of the Ministry of Agriculture and Land Reforms has also intensified its activities to provide necessary guidance for the farmers to help them increase their land productivity by acquiring new and modern knowledge and methods of farming.

These are but a few examples of the Government's plans and its massive efforts to help the farmers in the country and to fullfil the tasks set by itself for further development of agriculture.

As a result of all these comprehensive and constructive plans as well as the hard and concerted work put in by the Afghan peasants and stock-breeders, the overall agricultural yield and livestock output have registered increases over the figures of the last year as was revealed by the Minister of Agriculture and Land Reforms.

Among other things, the harvest of cotton, an important industrial, crop in the country, is also expected to surpass the last year's figure by 15,000 tons and the sugar output by 10,000 tons.

As reported the other day, only in the course of the last Afghan month of Mizan, 628 tons of cotton, worth Afs. 11,000,000 have been purchased by the Spinzar Company, a major buyer of cotton in the country, from cotton-growers in several northern provinces.

The projected increase in cotton output is particularly welcome news, for it constitutes not only an important raw material for the growing number of textile mills in the country, but also, stands prominent among the export items of Afghanistan.

Large areas in Afghanistan are under cotton cultivation. The cotton-growers are provided all necessary technical and financial help to encourage them to bring more and more land under cotton cultivation. In order to enable the cotton growers to raise their production and cultivate more lands, the Government has raised the purchase price of this important industrial crop.

The Norms and Standard Department of the Ministry of Mines and Industries has also taken measures relating to sortment and standardisation of cotton, which will prove useful to the growers to sell their produce at much higher price to the consumers.

With the added facilities as well as technical and financial assistance provided by the Government, it is hoped that the cotton growers, and the sugar beet cultivators, will be able to produce more.

It is also hoped that the overall development of agriculture in the country will be accelerated as result of continued and large-scale assistance provided to farmers by the Government.

More Wool Exports

Kabul KABUL NEW TIMES in English 31 Oct 81 p 3

[Text]

"An amount of 12,000 tons of unwashed wool at an estimated value of Afs 60 million has been purchased from various sources by the state and private sectors during the first six months of the current Afghan year and were readied for export."

Stating this in an interview with the Kabul Times, Dr Mohammad Zahir Barez, general president of the wool enterprise department of the Commerce Ministry said: "Generally the campaign for the purchase of wool in the country starts from the month of Hamal and continued till the beginning of the month of Sonbula", though the campaign period has ended.

Detailed information the enterprise has received from the main wool producing centres, reveals that another amount of 15,000 tons of unwashed wool worth Afs. 750 million could be collected from these areas. And, relying on these informations the enterprise, it has intensified its efforts to collect more wool and ready it for export to the foreign markets.

In response to a question, Dr Barez stressed that the main sources for the purchase of wool in the country include the Kandahar, Herat and Balkh provinces. Usually, the wool purchased from the stockbreeders and in the markets of these province are in the form of unwashed wool, which is being sent to the washing plant of the enterprise and then exported to the potential foreign markets. The wool so far purchased by the enterprise are of the kinds of karakul wool, white sheep wool, and coloured wool. The three kinds of wool exported are in demand in the foreign markets, but the white sheep wool is in greater demand in the foreign markets, he said.

The department, he added, was established for the purpose of promoting the production and export of this important item of export. The idea behind the enterprise was also to strengthen the economy of the wool producers and market their produce on time and earn them reasonable price for their production. As a state trading firm, this enterprise has the responsibility of controlling and supervising the collection and export of wool in the country, both in the private and state sectors. And, as a matter of fact, since the establishment of this enterprise, not only have greater facility been provided for the wool producers and their economy boosted, but the production and export of wool also been further promoted earning greater income for the producers and the state respectively.

The enterprise is three years old. Over the three years since the establishment of the enterprise, the export of wool in comprison to 1356 has increase by 100 per cent. In accordance with the plan, greater amounts of wool are to be readied, standardised and exported to the foreign markets and sold at reasonable prices. Likewise, the enterprise plans, for further promoting the process of collection and purchase of wool from the local sources, to open its branches in the Ghazni and Kunduz provinces as well. The enterprise hopes that, with the help of these branches, it would be in a position to collect and purchase greater amounts of wool.

From the beginning of the current year's campaign till now, around 2,500 tons of wool have been processed and exported to the Soviet Union, Dr Barez said.

Successes of Land Reforms

Kabul KABUL NEW TIMES in English 1 Nov 81 p 8

[Interview with Fazlur Rahim Momand, minister of agriculture and land reforms, by Bakhtar]

[Text]

"As a result of hard and concerted work of the Afghan peasants and live stock breeders, and due to the material and technical assistance provided to them by the Government of the DRA, overall agricultural yields and the output of the livestock products have registered an increase over last year", Fazlur Rahim Momand, Minister of Agriculture and Land Reforms told Bakhtar in an interview.

Evaluating the autumn harvesting which is nearing 'completion, the Minister said that the grain production this year amounts to 4.5 million tons, and in it, wheat yield alone reaches to 2.8-2.9 million tons. It is expected that the cotton harvest will surpass last year's figure by 15,000 tons and sugar beet will exceed by 10,000 tons, that is, by 23 and 28 per cent respectively.

He predicted a two per cent increase in the livestock output, both in the numbers of cattle heads and poultry and in the quantity of animal proteins.

Pointing out to the development of agriculture and cattle breeding in Afghanistan, the Minister likened them to the problems faced by every other developing country.

DEVELOPMENT

The ever increasing need for the development of industries demands improved supply of agricultural raw materials. The export of traditional items like cotton, karakul skin,, wool, carpets and fruits must also be developed he said.

Momand said that for increasing agricultural production, modernization of the infrastructure of the socio-economic relationships, and among them the elimination of the remnants of fedual and pre-feudal systems, and turning the primitive form of agriculture into a modern and mechanised one through scientific methods of using chemical fertilizer, providing and distributing improved seeds and fighting pests and plant and veterinary diseases was necessary.

The minister of agriculture referred to the enormous aid that the DRA is receiving from the Soviet Union in the form of improved seeds, chemical fertilizers, machineries and equipment for mechanisation of agriculture, insecticides, pesticidis for use against plant diseases, and advisors for training of personnel and other necessary facilities.

He also referred to the four mechanised agricultural stations that have been set-up with the economic and technical assistance provided by the Soviet Union.

Emphasising the vital role of public sectors in the future development of agriculture in the country, he said that the establishment of state farms occupies an important place in our agricultural activities, particularly for the production of cotton, sugar beet, vegetables, reproduction of improved seeds, production of meat, butter, egg and other farm items.

Work on the setting-up of new agricultural cooperatives and the strengthening and consolidation of the existing cooperative which are becoming more and more popular among the people will continue.

In reply to a question as to what measures have been adopted to continue further implementation of the present stage of the democratic land reforms in the country, he said that at present, in accordance with the decisions of the Politburo of the Central Committee of the PDPA and the Council of Ministers of the DRA, the evaluation of the results of the first stage of the implementation of land-reforms on the basis of the study of land in the country, distribution of material and financial assistance to the farmers and agricultural cooperatives, and effective regulation of the system of land ownership including the distribution of the land and related items will continue.

He said that the programme of land reforms, with the active participation of the vast masses of peasants, based on the just and democratic distribution of land and water to the peasants which would be to their interests will continue to be put into practice.

SOVIET ACTIONS--London, 31 Oct (AFGHAN NEWS PRESS)--Since Soviet troops arrived in Afghanistan, some 280 mosques have either been destroyed or damaged in the three northern provinces alone. According to the agency, in the provinces of Qonduz, Baghlan and Samangan, through which the highway from Shir Khan port on the Oxus passes and which the Soviet Army has been using, along with the road through Herat, the Soviets have destroyed or damaged mosques all along the route. The Soviets believe the mosques serve as hiding places for the Mujahidin. The Soviets have destroyed about 100 mosques on the stretch of road between Shir Khan through Pol-e Khomri to Baghlan. On the road between Pol-e Khomri and Samangan 180 mosques have been destroyed. In the village of 'Aliabad in Qonduz Province the Soviets killed 37 persons, including the famous mullah Maulana Shirin, when they were standing at prayers. Maulana Shirin was such a prominent clergyman that even Radio Kabul had to announce his death although it was careful not to mention the cause of it. Mr Sargardan, who was the only man to escape death in the incident and is at present commanding Mujahidin in a sector of Baghlan Province, said that for him there was no choice left but to begin fighting after that incident. Narrating the incident, Mr Sargardan told the AFGHAN AGENCY reporter that it was afternoon prayer time when Soviet tanks were heard approaching. There was a hail of bullets and rockets. The mosque became one heap of human blood and flesh and he was wounded. The villagers came to the spot after a while but he was the only one left alive. PLIGHT OF KARMAL GOVERNMENT--Rawalpindi, 1 Nov--A former high-ranking official of Afghanistan, Mohammad Yusaf Farzand, has stated that the Karmal administration is in a state of siege. Its power extends to 10 km [around Kabul] during the day and to only 6 km at night. In fact, there is no government in Afghanistan. Mohammad Yusaf, who was an adviser in the Afghan Ministry of Finance, in an interview said that government officials cannot move from one place to another without a military escort. On the other hand, the Mujahidin move freely through the country. The Karmal administration has no support from the people. Not one percent of the government officials supports the Karmal administration. Government officials are secretly connected with the Mujahidin. Mohammad Yusaf said that the Karmal administration fully realizes that it cannot remain in power without the help of outside military help. Therefore, it favors keeping foreign forces in the country. MUJAHIDIN ACTIVITIES--Peshawar, 2 Nov (PPI)--The Soviet High Command is reequipping its forces against the Mujahidin for a winter offensive, says a HEZB-E ESLAMI source. According to this source, a convoy of 800 Soviet military vehicles was ambushed by the Mujahidin on the road between Kabul and Lowgar last week. The Mujahidin blocked the road in several places and created difficulties for the Soviets. In one attack the Mujahidin destroyed 17 tanks and armored vehicles. A report from Paktia says that another convoy of 200 military vehicles including tanks and armored cars which was moving from Ghazni through Paktia Province was ambushed by the Mujahidin in the Soltani region at (Kharera). Fifteen tanks and armored vehicles were destroyed. On another occasion when 35 Soviet helicopter gunships assisted by jets bombarded a hill at (Shoikamar) to support Soviet troops moving between (Mathro) and Soltani, the Mujahidin blocked the road, but the Soviet troops changed plans and moved toward the (Chaharbaran) region. On 23 October, the Mujahidin mined the road to (Chaharbaran) and blew up two tanks. A bitter fight ensued and 35 helicopter gunships and jets strafed Mujahidin positions. The battle began at 0700 and lasted until 1800. In the battle the Mujahidin killed many Soviet soldiers and in the end only 12 tanks reached the (Tabut) area. The Mujahidin destroyed 4 tanks in this battle, set on fire another 5 and killed more than 50 Soviet soldiers. [Text] [GF061859 Karachi MASHRIQ in Urdu 2 Nov 81 p 1]

FOREIGN MINISTER DISCUSSES GULF DEFENSE

Paris AL-NAHAR AL-'ARABI WA AL-DUWALI in Arabic No 232, 15-19 Oct 81 pp 20-21

[Interview with al-Shaykh Muhammad Mubarak Al Khalifa, Foreign Minister of Bahrain by Rafiq Khalil Ma'luf; in New York; date not given: "Foreign Minister of Bahrain Says, 'We Are Making Preparations To Defend the Gulf; War in Lebanon Is Threatening Others' "]

[Text] Al-Shaykh Muhammad Mubarak Al Khalifa, Bahrain's minister of foreign affairs and the head of his country's delegation to the UN General Assembly spoke with AL-NAHAR AL-'ARABI WA AL-DUWALI in New York about Arab conditions. He spoke about matters that concern the Gulf: the war between Iraq and Iran, the Lebanese crisis and the Palestinian question. The text of the interview follows:

[Question] There is considerable discussion in the United States about a strategy in the Middle East. What is your view of this idea?

[Answer] First, there is an Arab strategy that pertains to the Arab nation as a whole. This is the strategy that was in the Common Arab Defense Pact which comprises all the Arab countries. As is the case in the Gulf region, the Arab countries deal and interact with each other through a council of cooperation. This cooperation is regional, and it takes place in an Arab context in order to devise a strategy to defend the area. That strategy is an Arab strategy and it serves the interests of the Arab nation and the regional areas. We believe that this strategy must keep its distance from the two superpowers in their struggle over centers of influence.

I believe that there is an Arab strategy and not a strategy that is affiliated with a group or with one of the superpowers. This is my understanding of strategy, and this is our understanding of our strategy.

[Question] What do you think about the alliance policy and the attempt by both the Soviet Union and the United States to establish facilities and centers of influence in the Middle East area? What is your view of these actions?

[Answer] The statement that was issued by the Gulf Cooperation Council [GCC] of the Gulf Countries emphasized that the area must keep its distance from the struggle and that the people of the werea are the ones who were responsible for its defense.

[Question] What do you think about the AWACS deal and the strong opposition it is facing in the United States?

[Answer] The AWACS deal concerns the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia in particular. This is due to Saudi Arabia's geographic location and the vast area of land that requires this kind of modern equipment. I believe that any Arab country has the right to acquire advanced weapons to defend itself. This deal should pass or should be approved in favor of Saudi Arabia and all the countries of the Gulf.

[Question] What is your view of the situation in the Gulf at the present time? Has tension increased due to the continued Iraqi-Iranian struggle and to the fact that most countries of the world look upon this area as [the world's] principal source of energy? Do you have the feeling that danger is imminent?

[Answer] There is no doubt that the importance of the Gulf area to the world is increasing every day. The Gulf area has become one of the most significant and sensitive areas in the world due to the essential oil resources which God has bestowed on it; these resources are essential to the development of societies particularly in the west and in many countries of the Third World. We also believe that the security of this area is the responsibility of its people. Therefore, we thought of establishing a council of cooperation so that this action can be collective instead of unilateral. Yes, we must make preparations. Our area, like any other area in the world, may face dangers and threats. What is most important is that we make preparations. We are proceeding in that direction, and we are developing the frameworks and the capabilities that can defend this area. Defense must stem from the faith of people and of society. We are therefore unifying the ranks and establishing this cooperation in order to move this area away from the international struggle.

[Question] Some people feel that Israel threatens not only the confrontation countries, but that its conduct--bombing the Iraqi nuclear reactor and its strong opposition to the sale of AWACS--indicates that it harbors hostile intentions toward the countries of the Gulf. Do you have this feeling?

[Answer] We are always saying at all levels that the Israeli expansionist policy is threatening the Arab nation in general and not, as is being said, only the countries that are close to it. This has recently been established by the terrorist operation, which Israel carried out against the Iraqi nuclear reactor, and by the threats that are made every day by Israeli officials. Therefore, we believe that Israel's policy is an expansionist policy that threatens not only the Middle East, but also peace and security in the world. This is because Israel's ambitions are unlimited. Unless this policy is curbed, the Middle East area will continue to be a volatile area.

[Question] What is your view of the Arab situation?

[Answer] The Arab situation is not what we would wish it to be. There are differences, and these differences are now threatening the Arab nation itself. It is the weakness of the Arab nation as well as its differences that are making it possible for the enemy to expand. I believe that we are now engaged in communicating with each other in preparation for the next Arab summit. There will be bilateral communications between the countries to reduce this tension and to restore the Arab rank to its former state. The unity of the Arab rank is the only strong weapon that the Arab nation has. Without it we will remain as weak and as fragmented as we are [now].

[Question] What is your view of the Lebanese situation, and are you trying to offer assistance?

[Answer] Lebanon is part of the Arab nation, and it interacts with it. However, Arab differences are reflected here and there. It is unfortunate that these differences are reflected in Lebanon more than they are in any other Arab area. However, Lebanon itself is partly responsible for what is happening. I believe that there are two sides in this matter: an Arab side and a Lebanese side. If Arab cooperation and intra-Lebanese cooperation are not proportionate, we cannot achieve the solution that is required. It is essential that Arab and Lebanese efforts be intensified, for if these efforts achieve the level [of agreement] that is required, it will then be possible to stop the bloodshed and the destruction which are breaking all our hearts. Lebanon has paid too much. I believe that Kuwait and Saudi Arabia are playing a positive and an effective role in this regard. In a spirit of affection, brotherhood and responsibility I would like to say that there must be a strong posture of solidarity in Lebanon. We in the Gulf countries are doing everything we can to stop the bloodshed because what is happening in Lebanon is not confined to Lebanon. The fire which is burning in Lebanon may destroy others. Accordingly, the two parallel courses of Arab action and Lebanese action to which I referred are proceeding together. There is no doubt that Arab differences were the principal cause of that situation, but we must avoid talking about the past, and we must work for the future.

[Question] What do you think about the effect which the failure of the AWACS deal would have on Arab-American relations and on Saudi-U.S. relations?

[Answer] I believe that if the United States does not comply with the Arab countries' request for weapons to defend their land, the effect of that will be significant and meaningful. We believe that the matter of AWACS will have a major effect if the deal is not approved. But we will wait before we pass judgment on the matter.

[Question] It seems that attempts are being made to put the Palestinian question on the back burner and to go ahead with the subject of strategic consensus. What is your view of this matter, and what is your evaluation of this situation?

[Answer] I believe that the Palestinian question now is in a position unlike that in which it has been for the past 10 years. It has become evident that the substance of the struggle in the area is the need to solve the question of the Palestinian people. [It has become evident that] without such a solution, there can be no real strategy to keep the Middle East area away from the struggle.

The cease fire that happened in south Lebanon recently was an event in which Palestinians and Israelis took part for the first time. Palestinians now have a political and a military role which is recognized by the world. I mean the Palestinian question has become a recognized fact, and it has emerged in an unprecedented fashion. I believe that today all the powers in the world are focusing on a solution to that problem more than they ever did in the past. We, the Arabs, have to strive to bring about the withdrawal of Israel from all occupied Arab lands and [to establish] the right of the Palestinian people to determine their own destiny, including their right to establish their independent state.

The Palestinian question is a question of time. I believe it is a fundamental question which cannot be ignored because this would mean that the attainment of a comprehensive solution in the area was being ignored.

In this context, countries that have been helping Israel are to stop supplying it with weapons and giving it economic aid so that Israel would reconsider its actions because its conduct is not even like that of the superpowers. Never in history has a country behaved the way Israel has been behaving.

NEED FOR CLOSE COOPERATION EMPHASIZED

Paris AL-NAHAR AL-'ARABI WA AL-DUWALI in Arabic No 233, 20-26 Oct 81 pp 27-28

[Article by 'Ali Hashim: "The Assassination Increased Enthusiasm for Cooperation; the New Egyptian Regime Is a Temporary Extension of Its Predecessor"]

[Text] Anwar Muhammad al-Sadat died, but Arabism is not dead.

This is what a Gulf official told AL-NAHAR AL-'ARABI WA AL-DUWALI when he heard the news that the Egyptian president had been assassinated.

The brevity of that simple sentence epitomizes many things. However, the simplification does not solve the problem; in fact, it increases its mystery and its complexity not only as far as the Middle East question as a whole is concerned, but also at least as far as the situation in the Arabian Gulf is concerned.

The problem of the Arabian Gulf is a problem. Its condition is that of an area which is being courted by the whole world and at the same time looked at wrathfully as though it were responsible for the inflation, for the high prices, for the decline of the economy, for the famine, for the tragedies and even for the cholera.

The situation of the Gulf is such that if there were a storm in Poland, the Gulf would tremble.

If there were tension in Afghanistan, it would shudder.

If President Reagan becomes tense and if Soviet leader Leonid Brezhnev's nerves are strained, the Gulf exclaims, "Good heavens!"

In other words the Gulf now feels that it is the target of all the maneuvers and dialogues that take place in the world, not because it is powerful and awesome, but rather because it is a storehouse of the energy which the world needs. Without this energy there can be no industry, no progress and no civilization would develop. Quite simply, the problem of the Gulf lies in the fact that it has become the key to everything. Everyone wants to have this key in his pocket and to use it whenever he wishes.

The Gulf and the Cause

Even though the Gulf itself is a problem, it is to a large extent related to the greater problem, that is, the question of the Middle East.

On the major question the Gulf neither jests nor indulges. It has offered and is offering everything it can materially and morally offer. It is using its clout internationally in the interests of the cause, and it is using energy, which is oil, to serve the cause.

When al-Sadat embarked on a course that contradicted the beliefs and convictions of the Arabs, the Arabs of the Gulf stood against him but maintained their strong relations with the Egyptian people and with the Egyptian institutions that were not totally related to the Egyptian regime and its men.

The Sultanate of Oman was [the only country in the Gulf] that maintained its relations with Egypt's president, with Egypt's regime and with the Egyptian people, saying that Egypt had taken a step to regain its land and to regain the rights and the sovereignty of the Palestinian people on their land. When this step fails, the situation will be dealt with then on the basis of circumstances at that time. Oman asked the Arabs who boycotted and opposed Egypt to come up with an alternative, affirming that ultimately it would support any Arab consensus and a clear, objective Arab plan that would yield positive results, even if this step involved embarking on a real and not a verbal war.

Only once did the sultanate assume a firm position vis a vis al-Sadat's regime. That was when Israel declared that Jerusalem was a unified city and the capital of Israel. A year ago Oman issued a statement warning that it would assume a negative position on the Camp David accords if Israel did not retract that step which it had taken.

Therefore, with the exception of the sultanate's position, the position of the Arab Gulf on the question remains clear. It is a position that is trying to close the case in a manner that would preserve Arab rights; it is devoting its capabilities and its diplomacy to the interests of the cause. Even the invitation that PLO Chairman, Mr Yasir 'Arafat received to visit Japan was made as a result of an initiative by one of the Arab emirates, and it was arranged by Minister of Petroleum and Mineral Resources Dr Mani' ibn Sa'id al-'Utayba.

Anwar al-Sadat is dead. With his assassination an era comes to an end. As far as the Gulf is concerned, what is the next era?

The commentaries that came from the Gulf countries about what happened denounced the assassination incident itself but not the end of the Camp David period to which these countries were fundamentally opposed.

What is disturbing the Gulf countries in particular is the violence involved in devising or changing stages, policies and positions. For this reason, what happened and what may happen in Egypt is beginning to attract the attention of Gulf countries. It is causing Gulf officials to become tense out of fear that the area may become unsettled and that it may experience difficult periods of tension and instability that would affect their area as well. This area, that is the oil area, is a sensitive area that would not withstand shocks or hot winds.

Therefore, some time before the assassination the countries of the Arabian Gulf had one option: to find a just solution. This was summarized in the plan of Prince Fahd ibn 'Abd-al-'Aziz, the crown prince of the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia and first deputy prime minister.

The Saudi peace plan focused primarily on the rights of the Arab people of Palestine and did not involve itself in the intricacies of eastern or western international struggles.

All the countries of the Gulf adopted Prince Fahd's plan and decided to bring it up for discussion at the Fez Summit Conference in Morocco next month. With an Arab consensus the plan would eventually become an initiative that the countries of the European Common Market would adopt and thrust onto both the Soviet Union and the United States of America.

The recent events in Egypt occurred after the proposal was made.

Anwar al-Sadat was assassinated, and Husni Mubarak became the new president. The Gulf countries' insistence on their plan grew after what happened in Egypt. Following the meeting of the ministerial council of the Gulf Cooperation Council in al-Ta'if 2 months ago Prince Fahd's plan became a Gulf plan; it was no longer either Prince Fahd's or Saudi Arabia's plan.

Diplomatic circles in the Gulf are now convinced that the new regime in Egypt, despite its declaration that it was an extension of the former regime, will neither be similar to that regime nor represent an extension of its policy except for a period of time. This is the period in which the final Israeli withdrawal from Sinai will be achieved in April 1982.

The Battle of Diplomacy and Oil

The restoration of the rights of the Arab people of Palestine requires major effort and involvement in a vicious battle behind which the Arabs would place all their clout. Numerous judgments have been and are being made on this battle. The most recent such judgments in the Gulf was one which stated that the Arabs have waged more than one battle but have not achieved anything. The time has come to use diplomacy and oil as weapons and to stay away from succumbing to this or the other country so that we would not have fragmentation [among the Arabs], turning the battle to one of loyalties and alliances and thereby wasting the effort. If diplomacy and oil are reinforced by moral and material support, it is inevitable that they will accomplish something.

Accordingly, the Gulf decision is to polarize the largest number of countries in the world that have clout so that in time this or the other superpower can be induced to produce results.

There is one effort, and Gulf officials say it is simple and may appear childish at the outset. However, they are convinced that this effort will not hurt. In fact, in their opinion, it would bring all the Arabs together. If there is an Arab official who has other proposals, he should come forward with them or put them to use, for they may provide a solution.

Those officials add that not a single eastern or western country has so far stated that the Gulf countries' proposal is wrong. No country has opposed it either secretly or publicly. Even Arab countries themselves--the moderate ones and the strict ones--have supported the Gulf effort or at least proclaimed that it was appropriate as a beginning, [even though they acknowledged that] there was a need to "tighten it" in some places.

Self Security

So far this is the position of the Gulf countries. In the aftermath of the events in Egypt and the effects these events have on the question of the Middle East, the situation in the Gulf area itself remains the same.

Gulf officials feel now, more than they did before, that the destiny and the future of the area are tied only to the will of its people.

Those officials had begun making preparations for the security of the Gulf by relying on a country and its capabilities. [Recent] events have increased their conviction that they must become more rigorous in establishing the security zone away from struggles and alliances. The Riyadh Summit on the 10th of next month will be decisive. The plan is now ready, and it bears the imprint of Saudi Arabia, of the Sultanate of Oman and of Kuwait. It also has the approval of the three other countries that are members of the council. These are the United Arab Emirates, Qatar and Bahrain.

The Gulf is now concerned about protecting itself and about participating extensively, or rather taking the initiative, in solving the major problem [of the Middle East], which in its opinion is the powder keg that may explode at any moment.

GOVERNMENT PLANS TO IMPROVE ECONOMIC INFRASTRUCTURE

Spare Parts for Tractors

Tehran SOBH-E AZADEGAN in Persian 27 Sep 81 p 9

[Text] Predictions are that in the current year 20,000 tractors will be distributed among farmers throughout the country. Farmers in our country will not have any difficulty getting spare parts next year. The imposed war has made it necessary and possible for us to produce all wheat harvesting machines for dry farming areas by means of Iranian industry. Mahmud Jamali, Head of the Agricultural Machinery Distribution Center, in an exclusive interview yesterday with the PARS NEWS AGENCY, while announcing these matters, said that statistics which have come to hand show that despite economic restrictions that have existed in various parts of the country, in 1980-1981 around 13,517 tractors were distributed among farmers throughout the country. In the year 1358 [21 Mar 1979-20 Mar 1980] this figure was around 12,000 tractors, and in 1978-1979 the figure was around 7,700. He added that predictions are that in the current year 20,000 tractors will be distributed in the country, because statistics show that during the first 4 months of this year [21 Mar-21 Jul 1981] 6,800 tractors came on the market. Jamali said that in addition to procuring tractors for farmers, on the basis of planning that is underway the Agricultural Machinery Center will also procure their spare parts. Not only will we have no limitations in the procurement of tractor spare parts, but spare parts will also be procured for machinery such as combines and others. He added: In the current year there was not the slightest problem with harvesting, because around 300 combines carried out the harvest throughout the country. Even in the war zones this important task was carried out despite bullets and mortars.

He said: Combines were under government control this year and were not sold to anyone. Their usage was under the complete control of the Reconstruction Crusade, the seven-person councils, and the rural cooperatives and they carried out the harvest in places where the farmers had fled. He said: In the procurement of agricultural machinery 2,000 tillers were sent last year to the country's northern provinces. It is our aim to increase this figure to 10,000 this year. Around 5,000 agricultural machines of this type will be built inside the country and the rest will be imported from Japan. Jamali then said: At the beginning of the imposed war we resolved in our planning for achieving self-sufficiency to build machinery that requires less technology. On this basis equipment like ploughshares has been placed in the direct custody of this center, so that in the current year 7,000 ploughshares were purchased domestically. An Iranian company has also contracted to build 10,000 3 to 5-ton trailers [sic] this year. This center has also signed a contract for construction within the country of 2,000 manure spreaders and 1,500 bulldozer blades. Referring to the important role played by the procurement of spare parts in Iranian agriculture, Jamali then said: Only 8 million dollars in spare parts for Romanian tractors was foreseen for the past 2 years, while this figure has increased several times over the next 3 years. He gave assurances to our dear farmers that in the coming year there will be no problem with respect to the procurement of spare parts. He said that around 4 million pounds of spare parts have been imported for Massey Ferguson tractors. In general the imposed war has forced us to think of spare parts every time we conclude a contract, and while concluding these contracts to take steps in the direction of self-sufficiency with respect to agricultural machinery. With the money that the government has made available to the center, the cash flow in the water pump and agricultural machinery factories has increased so that they have not had to close down. The imposed war has also forced us to take effective steps in the training of manpower. For this purpose, trainees have gone to Romania and West Germany for further training and to acquire specialized knowledge. Technicians from the Massey Ferguson Company have also held classes in Iran. Jamali said: I must mention that this war has forced us to develop the capacity to manufacture 100 percent of the wheat harvesting machinery used in dry farming areas in Iran. Jamali said: This center's work is based on the policy of neither East nor West, so that even now the machinery needed for harvesting wheat in dry farming areas and the machinery needed for next year's rice cultivation has already been foreseen. Assistance has also been obtained from revolutionary organs and groups in the matter of training. Among these groups and organizations are the Reconstruction Crusade, the seven-person councils, and the rural cooperatives. A group has gone to Austria, West Germany, and Italy for the purpose of technical training. A high-level machinery committee has studied the issues in order to get a factory started in Tabriz, and it will make a decision on the quality, kind, and quantity of the equipment. In conclusion he said: So far this center has received the request of 36,000 farmers for agricultural machinery. It is our view that this figure is incorrect. This number of petitioners is being studied by the Reconstruction Crusade and the seven-person council.

Rehabilitation of Former Kurdish Stronghold

Tehran KEYHAN in Persian 7 Oct 81 p 2

[Text] Urmia--KEYHAN Service--A group composed of administrative officials and West Azarbaijan military commanders, during a trip to the liberated city of Bowkan, studied the issues and needs of this area and made decisions on various matters.

Mojtaba Hashemi, aide to the Governor-General of West Azarbaijan, who was with this group, said in a talk upon his return to Urmia: The present atmosphere in the city of Bowkan is ready to accept all the policies and procedures of the Islamic Republic of Iran.

He added: In its present situation Bowkan is in need of reconstruction. With this intent, following the installation of military outposts and checkpoints in order to safeguard the aims of the Islamic Republic of Iran and also the establishment of a lieutenant governor and a mayor, the preliminaries for which have been accomplished, all government organizations have been reopened and will begin their work in this city.

The West Azarbaijan governor-general's aide then said: A decision will be made in the future on the installation of a police headquarters to secure the city.

He also said the government has opened a separate account for the reconstruction of Kordestan. In order to carry out reconstruction plans, considering that there is only a short time remaining in the area's work season, the best possible effort will be made to repair and restore part of the destruction caused by the idol-worshippers and the counterrevolutionaries. A complete reconstruction program will be undertaken in the implementation of long-term and far-reaching plans, which need precise planning and the expenditure of sufficient time.

Concerning the manner in which the people of Bowkan received the forces of the Islamic Republic of Iran after entry into the city, Hashemi said: In the several instances in which we talked with the people of Bowkan they said they had been prepared with expectation and longing to receive and accept the forces of the Islamic Republic of Iran. An old man even cried and said "how happy I am to see the forces of the Islamic Republic of Iran in the area at last instead of infidel forces."

During his remarks the West Azarbaijan governor-general's aide pointed out that preparations have begun for reconstruction of hospitals, treatment clinics, organizations for teaching and training and other government organizations, and for the restoration of damages caused by the presence of counterrevolutionaries in the area.

He added: Upon inspection of Bowkan's health facilities and schools, we saw that their equipment, especially in the Bowkan health clinic's operating room, had been stolen by counterrevolutionaries, and immediate steps must be taken for their reconstruction.

Concerning Bowkan's present situation, Hashemi said: Revolutionary forces, composed of the army, the revolutionary guard, and the mobilization staff, have taken control of the city upon becoming established there. They have alertly placed all counterrevolutionary movements in the area under surveillance. After entry of the warriors of Islam into Bowkan and the clearing of the area, now the counterrevolution's organizations and installations in the Bowkan area have been destroyed. Renewed formation of counterrevolutionary forces will be prevented with the continuation of purging operations, and there will be no opportunity for them to build nests of corruption.

Concerning the matter of procuring supplies for the people of Bowkan, the West Azarbaijan governor-general's aide said: The Commander of Mian Dow Ab has to a certain extent procured general foodstuffs and other needs of the people of Bowkan such as flour and fuel. God willing, and with the establishment of full security, this assistance will continue in the area.

Colonel Azadi Talab, West Azarbaijan Regional Gendarmerie Commander, who was also with the group, said in a talk: Gendarmerie outposts and checkpoints will soon be set up at sensitive points in this area to provide security and peace for the villagers around Bowkan. Counterrevolutionaries will no longer have the courage to make trouble for the area's noble Kurds.

He said: All the forces of the Islamic Republic of Iran are at the disposal of the oppressed people and tormented Kurdish brothers and sisters. They have no other desire but to serve the oppressed people.

At the conclusion of its inspection of the city of Bowkan this group returned to Urmia yesterday evening.

A Message From the Imam's Representative in the Western Part of the Country to the People of Kordestan

Hojjatoleslam Musa Musavi, the Imam's representative in the Western part of the country, also sent a message to the Muslim people of Kordestan on the occasion of the liberation of the city of Bowkan. The text of the message is as follows:

In the name of God. God will not allow infidels to bring harm to believers.

Respected Muslim people of Kordcstan, brothers and sisters of Bowkan, American groups, acting on the orders of their world-devouring bosses, capitalizing on the unawareness arising from the oppression of the masses, and in the shadow of liberal rule, have kept this region embroiled in turmoil, corruption, and increasing deprivation for more than 2 years, to the benefit of East and West colonialism and despite past oppression, but through the will of God, their oppression and obvious corruption, their direct complicity with the American hireling Saddam, and their despicable American and counterrevolutionary face has been shown to the Kurdish Muslim masses. Now, with the help of God, your sincere cooperation, and the unsparing efforts of the fighters of the army, the revolutionary guards, and Kurdish Muslim martyrs, their last strongholds in Bowkan have fallen to the Islamic front. While congratulating the Imam of the nation, the brave fighters, and you, the Muslim people of Bowkan on this great victory, I expect all of you, in the form of fervent service, because of the martyrs' Islamic commitment and solemn sanguin prophecy, after exposing to the satanic face of these traitors to Islam and the Kurdish people, to overthrow the real agents of the counterrevolutionary movements in the area more than before through your full presence in the field, and to help your Islamic, revolutionary, people's government completely clear the area of the contamination of self-prostituting foreigner-worshippers and to help with the area's material and qualitative reconstruction. You may be sure that those deprived deceived people who now penitently take refuge in Islam are forgiven by order of the Imam and will benefit from the revolution's magnanimity. In conclusion, I am desirous of the alleviation of the area's difficulties and the full occupation of Islamic land in the presence of God Almighty.

Peace be upon you and the mercy and blessings of God.

The Reconstruction Crusade of the city of Bowkan also renewed its activities in this area after a hiatus of 2 and 1/2 years. These activities have begun following the liberation of the city of Bowkan by the brave fighters of Iran.

"Bozorgi," an official of the Kordestan Province Reconstruction Crusade, while announcing this, said: The Reconstruction Crusade has decided to rebuild its installations in this deprived city and to undertake the restoration of losses and deficiencies brought on by anti-people's groups. Accordingly, a place for the Reconstruction Crusade was immediately selected, and this city's Reconstruction Crusade was set up with the sending of a number of self-sacrificing members of the Mahmud Abad Reconstruction Crusade and three vehicles to Bowkan.

The official of the Kordestan Reconstruction Crusade added: Bowkan was one of the first cities in the Kurdish areas where the Reconstruction Crusade began working after the triumph of the revolution, but only a few months after their work began American groups gradually penetrated Kurdish areas and prevented the continuation of the Crusade's work. He added: Now that the revolutionary fighters have again taken this city out of the clutches of the imperialist hirelings, once again the headquarters of submissive groups like the Democrats have been converted and will be converted to places belonging to the Reconstruction Crusade and other peoples' and revolutionary organizations.

In this same connection an announcement from the Reconstruction Crusade to the People of Bowkan was issued.

The text of the announcement is as follows:

In the name of the Almighty--Moslem, suffering people of the city of Bowkan, during these 2 years you have lived under the domination, pressure, and suffocation of counterrevolutionary groups and you have not been able to do agricultural, development, and reconstruction work, but now, as in the past, the Reconstruction Crusade, with all its ability, will be ready to cooperate and struggle with you brothers and sisters in the reconstruction of the area. Return to your work and go back to your normal lives. You may be sure that the government of the Islamic Republic of Iran will help you, as in the past. It will put an end to your shortages and decisively confront counterrevolutionary agents.

An Attack on the Bowkan Revolutionary Guard Headquarters

The headquarters of the brothers of the Islamic Revolutionary Guards of Bowkan was attacked night before last with RPG-7's and hand grenades by American hirelings of the disbanded Democrat and Kumeleh parties.

PARS reported that this attack was repulsed by fierce return fire from revolutionary guard brothers and the counterrevolutionaries were forced to retreat after giving up a number of dead and wounded casualties.

According to this report, no injury of any kind was inflicted upon the brothers in the revolutionary guard.

According to the same report, the day before yesterday one concrete-piercing shell and five single-barrelled weapons were found and confiscated by the brothers in the revolutionary guard.

Seven-Year Water Program

Tehran KEYHAN in Persian 12 Oct 81 p 13

[Text] Three-hundred million tumans credit has been designated for small-scale government programs.

Engineer Ma'sumi, general manager of water planning of the ministry of power, in an exclusive interview with PARS, talked about the priorities of the water distribution plans, the overall plans of this ministry, and the limitations of water sources.

He began by discussing the resources and limitations of the country's water reserves, saying: Expansion of industry and agriculture, population increases, and increases in the urban standard of living have increased the country's need for water and the use of water reserves. He stressed that the country's greatest need is to obtain water for agriculture for the purpose of attaining self-sufficiency in food production and the production of other needs for the people. Ma'sumi added: Water for agriculture, comprises 90 to 95 percent of the water consumed by the country. The country's water sources consist of runoff water in surface and underground channels, which are always interrelated.

He added: Studies show that the volume of water runoff in the country averages 400 billion square meters annually. Of course this figure fluctuates between 200 and 600 billion square meters and it is irregularly distributed in time and space. The general manager of water planning then said concerning priorities for water distribution: In general 73 percent of the area of the country faces severe water shortages, and the principal factor in agricultural, industrial, and housing shortages arises from these very shortages.

In this regard all the water distribution planning for areas with little water receives top priority at the Ministry of Power. This ministry tries to create every kind of facility for water distribution for these areas. These measures include the construction of runoff tunnels and canals, dams for reservoirs, transporting water from major rivers, and other things which have special importance.

Concerning this ministry's overall plans, the general manager of water planning for the Ministry of Power said: The Ministry of Power has a seven-year water procurement plan, which started about a year ago, and for which 17 billion rials' worth of credit has been projected for this year. This program is mostly directed towards creating small water reservoirs, redirecting river water to the land by way of irrigation channels, construction of streams and channels, and covering canals to prevent water waste. He also added: For small government plans around 300 million tumans in credit has been projected which will be divided among 11 regional water organizations.

In conclusion, Mohandes Ma'sumi said: At the present time the construction of some dams is being completed and they will probably be ready for use by the end of the current year. Also the construction of semi-completed dams will be finished in the future with the help of the Sabir Company, which is one of the companies affiliated with the Ministry of Power.

TEHRAN RESTORES ORDER IN FORMER KURDISH STRONGHOLD

Tehran KEYHAN in Persian 25 Oct 81 p 14

[Text] With the establishment of the rule of the Islamic Republic in the western regions, a deep gap has been created among armed groups.

In the joint session of Kumeleh leaders, 60 persons of the armed elements of this minigroup were purged.

Six occupants of an automobile were killed upon hitting a mine.

The people of a village killed three counterrevolutionaries in an attack on the stronghold of the [Kurdish] Democratic Party.

Counterrevolutionaries injured 21 persons with hand grenades thrown into a group of people of Baneh.

The victims of the recent skirmishes in Bukan will be compensated for their losses.

The people of Uramanat marched in support of the revolution.

With the liberation of Bukan by the revolutionary forces, the police department of Bukan was once again established in this city after two and a half years.

Reports from the western part of the country indicate that after the establishment of the rule of the Islamic Republic of Iran in these regions, a deep gap was created among counterrevolutionary minigroups. These differences have resulted in the purge of 60 persons of the "Kumeleh" elements.

These reports also mention the attack of the people of a village on the stronghold of the abolished [Kurdish] Democratic Party during which three members of this party were killed by the villagers.

Also, four passengers of a minibus carrying villagers were martyred when the bus hit a mine and in a similar accident, two military brothers attained the high rank of martyr.

This report also states: Counterrevolutionary elements threw grenades into a group of people of Baneh injuring 21 passersby.

/Kermanshah, KEYHAN correspondent/ [in boldface]--With the establishment of the rule of the Islamic Republic of Iran in the western regions of the country, a deep gap has been created among the counterrevolutionary forces affiliated with the Kumeleh minigroup. As the public relations office of the revolution guards of Marivan reports: In a joint session of the leaders of the outlawed Kumeleh Party around Marivan, this difference escalated until one group was disarmed by another. Sixty persons, of whom 15 reside in Marivan, were purged. This report adds: Last week, 12 persons of the deceived individuals affiliated with the outlawed [Kurdish] Democratic and Kumeleh Parties turned themselves in to the Kamyaran guards and after repenting their past actions, were given amnesty.

Another report states: At 9:30 on Thursday, 30 Mehr [22 Oct], the people of the village of Gelin in the region of Zhavrud attacked the stronghold of the outlawed [Kurdish] Democratic Party in that village and killed three members. This report also states: These skirmishes continued until 5 am last Friday, yesterday.

The revolution guards of Kamyaran also report: As a result of a minibus carrying the people of the village of Takht-e Zangi destined for Kamyaran hitting a strong mine set by the pro-American minigroups, four of the passengers of the minibus were piteously martyred and seven persons were injured. The injured were transported by the patrol group of the revolution guards to Kamyaran, where they were treated. This report adds: On the same day, two anti-tank mines were discovered by the brothers of the revolution guards and were disarmed. Also, last Friday afternoon, when a jeep carrying four military brothers hit an anti-tank mine at the beginning of Radio Mahabad Street, two of the brothers were martyred. The Islamic revolution guard corps of Mahabad confirmed this report and added: In this explosion, military brothers Hasan Qaribi, a student of the cadre, and Reza Peymani, a conscripted soldier, attained the honor of martyrdom and two others, 'Abdollah Safari and Mohammad Seyfollahi, were injured.

Throwing Grenades among the People

A report from Sanandaj states: A grenade was thrown among the people of Baneh by the counterrevolutionaries of this city as a result of which 21 passersby were injured. Four of the injured were taken by helicopter to Saqqez because of severe injuries. At 4 pm Thursday, 22 Oct, a hand grenade was thrown among the people by the counterrevolutionaries on Imam Khomeyni Street in Baneh, which resulted in injury to 21 passersby. According to this report, the injured were immediately transported to the hospital of the city and treated. Also, four of the injured in this incident were dispatched to Saqqez by helicopter because of severe injuries.

The Islamic revolution guard corps of the province of Kurdistan confirmed the report and said: Those responsible for this incident are being pursued by law enforcement authorities.

Establishment of the Police Department in Bukan

Following the liberation of Bukan from the counterrevolutionaries, the police department of Bukan was reopened last Saturday, after two and a half years of domination by the mercenary elements of outlawed minigroups, with ceremonies in which the supervisor of the police department of the Islamic Republic of Iran and a number of military and law enforcement authorities of western Azarbaijan Province participated.

Around 2 pm last Saturday, Colonel Hejazi, supervisor of the police department of the Islamic Republic of Iran, accompanied by one of the law enforcement deputies of the national police department, the chief of police of western Azarbaijan Province, and the commander of the gendarmerie of western Azarbaijan region, entered Bukan to reopen the police department of the city.

During the reopening of the Bukan police department, the supervisor of the national police department, in a gathering of the committed Moslems of Bukan and police department personnel, addressed the top officers of the police department as the first representatives of the national police department in Bukan and said: As the representatives of the police department of the country, you must demonstrate the highest of Islamic conduct in your relations with the people in order to make the revolution understood in the best possible manner in this region which has, for so many years, been under the oppression and tyranny of the previous regime and afterwards, for two and a half years, under the pressure and oppression of political minigroups.

Colonel Hejazi, in another part of his speech, referred to the increased cooperation, more than ever before, between the armed forces and said: You, police brothers, must show the utmost cooperation and coordination with the other armed forces of the Islamic Republic of Iran in order to respond to the wishes of the oppressed Moslem people of Bukan.

The supervisor of the national police department of the Islamic Republic of Iran then participated in a gathering of the various classes of people of Bukan in the bazaar mosque of the city and, in a speech, referred to several verses of the Koran and the history of Kurdistan from ancient times up to the present and asked them to cooperate very sincerely with the police brothers and other combating forces of Islam, including the military, the gendarmerie, and the revolution guard corps. He asked them to drive away the counterrevolution in order to establish the government of God's justice and the decrees of the Koran in that city.

Colonel Hejazi and those accompanying him left Bukan for Orumiyeh at 4:30 pm that same day.

It must be pointed out that the other institutions and administration organizations of the city of Bukan will begin work one after another and will begin to offer services to the liberated people of this city.

Compensation for the Damages of the People of Bukan

In addition, Asadollah Tabe', the city governor of Miando'ab and supervisor of the district governor's office of Bukan, in a telephone conversation with the correspondent of PARS NEWS AGENCY in Orumiyeh, emphasized compensation for the damages to the victims of the recent skirmishes of Bukan and said: With the liberation of the city of Bukan from the hands of the outlawed armed elements, the situation in the city is presently quite normal and all the shops have resumed their activities. Also, with the cooperation and initiative of the brothers in the reconstruction crusade, most government offices have resumed their activities. The imam's relief committee, the Foundation of the Oppressed, and the revolution prosecutor's office are handling the affairs of the people.

He said: Even though all the needs of the people of Bukan, including foodstuff and fuel, have been provided, food ration coupons will be distributed in this city. Also, a committee is studying the damages inflicted on the people of Bukan during the recent skirmishes. After these investigations are completed, steps will be taken to make repairs.

The March of the People of Uramanat

Following the recent victory of the combatants of Islam in Uramanat and Marivan, last Friday morning, the people of Uramanat marched carrying placards and pictures of the great leader of the revolution, Imam Khomeyni, Dr Beheshti, Dr Bahonar, and martyr Raja'i and shouted harsh slogans against the occupying regime of Qods, the United States, and the minigroup Rozgari.

According to a PARS NEWS AGENCY report, the marchers then gathered in front of the public relations office of the guard corps of Uraman. The head of public relations of the Marivan guard corps and one of the clerics spoke about the nature of the Rozgari minigroup and the fugitive Sheykh Osman Naqshbandi.

In this gathering, a song was sung by a group of Marivan students. At the end, a resolution was issued and read and the marchers went off for the Friday prayers. In the unity-creating and enemy-breaking Friday prayers of Marivan, which were held with the participation of a large group of people, one of the revolution guard brothers, named Mehrshad, spoke about the martyrdom of Haj Mostafa Khomeyni. The Friday prayer leader of Marivan also spoke and offered the congratulations and condolences of himself and the people of Marivan to the imam of the people on the occasion of the martyrdom of Haj Mostafa Khomeyni.

Twelve members of the outlawed [Kurdish] Democratic and Kumeleh Parties turned themselves in to the guard corps of Kamyaran in the course of last week, expressed repentence for their past actions, and received amnesty.

Memorial Ceremony for Martyr Ayatollah Seyyed Mostafa Khomeyni in Oshnuyeh

The people of Oshnuyeh held a memorial service on the occasion of the anniversary of the martyrdom of Ayatollah Haj Seyyed Mostafa Khomeyni, the brave, revered son of Imam Khomeyni. The city governor of Naqdeh also participated in the ceremony praising this martyr, which was held in the bazaar mosque of Oshnuyeh. Also, the Friday prayer in Oshnuyeh was led by Magistrate Khezri. In his prayer sermon, he said: The counterrevolution will never achieve its filthy goals through terrorism, because Islam will never retreat from terrorism.

MINISTER OF HEALTH DISCUSSES VARIOUS ISSUES

Tehran JOMHURI-YE ESLAMI in Persian 1 Oct 81 p 10

[Text] Dr Hadi Manafi, minister of Health, took part in an exclusive interview with JOMHURI-YE ESLAMI and answered its questions.

Dr Manafi began by discussing steps taken to eliminate unfair distribution of doctors in Iran.

In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. The roots of the matter of unfair distribution of doctors must be studied. We know that doctors have not been distributed justly. Our statistics show that there is a doctor for every 700 persons in Tehran, while there is one for every 2,000 persons in Yazd, and one for every 15,000 persons in Kohkiluyeh and Boyer Ahmad, just as there is one physician for every 34,000 people in more deprived places. The reason for this is the attraction that more comfortable conditions hold for physicians, which is natural. Everyone is in a place where they are more comfortable and where there are more facilities, and they want to live there. Formerly, all the resources were concentrated in Tehran, and everyone was naturally drawn to Tehran. The good life was in Tehran, and physicians naturally settled in Tehran also and practiced medicine there. Therefore it is our goal to give priority to the deprived areas as much as we can and attract the physicians towards the deprived areas. This will be accomplished in several ways. One is that the attraction of private medical practice in Tehran must be reduced. For this reason, the doctor's fees which are paid will be of some help, because in the past doctors were able to have an income without accounting for it, but after this they will not be able to have an income without accounting for it. Therefore, medicine, like other fields, must henceforth be controlled, so as to eliminate extortion. This task must be pursued vigorously. A law has been drawn up, fees have been set, and a law on infractions is on its way to the Majlis. When this law on violations is passed, then those who are violators according to that law will be confronted. Therefore there will be no more exorbitant incomes. When this activity, which of course is only the work of a small number of physicians, is stopped, then that appeal of private practice will be reduced. On the other hand we are also in the process of trying to make the employment of doctors by the government more appealing, and we are upgrading the capacity and quality of the Ministry of Health's hospitals. Of course we must also change this attitude of ours. In the beginning we said that government hospitals would not work, but today we see that the government hospitals have better and more facilities than many private hospitals, and they really are more effective, but we still have the attitude that they are of no value because they are government hospitals. As we have seen, if we dispensed expensive medicine at a government treatment center to someone, he would take it behind that very treatment center, throw it away and leave. That same medicine sold for even higher price when it was wrapped in gold foil. However, since it was in bulk form, in 500 and 1,000-unit boxes, placed in an envelope and handed to the patient, and the patient did not pay for it because it was from a government agency, and he had no faith in government establishments at that time, he would throw it away. Therefore we must change this attitude, when this situation appears. Many physicians come to the big cities. When they cannot obtain those large incomes they will naturally be drawn to smaller places. We must, however, provide the amenities of life in other areas so they can go there. We know that up until today the people have deprived our country of the basic resources. Furthermore the government has fully committed itself to reaching out to the deprived areas and is applying pressure to bring prosperity to the deprived areas first, and to take all health and educational facilities to those places that have nothing of this nature, so that, God willing, we will be able to persuade both physicians and urbanites who are trying to come to Tehran to give up that idea and to go to smaller places to live.

Absolutely No Mercy Must Be Shown to Smugglers

The Minister of Health then discussed measures taken to uproot addiction.

The law gave addicts a 6-month period of grace within which to cure themselves. None of them turned themselves in, however. They went into hiding, obtained drugs illicitly, and continued with their addictions. We equipped the hospitals on the basis of statistics we had and we thought that all of them would turn themselves in, but, they did not. Now that the grace period has passed, addiction is a crime. An addict is a criminal. This is not the fault of the government, it is the fault of the addict who continues with his addiction. The government is guilty of only one thing here, and that is not fetching them and imprisoning them. Of course eventually it will do this, and God willing, later it will increase its ability to do this, so that addicts will be treated like criminals. They will be arrested and kept in prison so long as the law allows, and they will be treated according to the law. From the point of view of treatment, we are obligated to help by seeing that their condition does not deteriorate, since there is no specific technique to cure addiction as such. The matter of treating addiction involves depriving the addict of narcotics for a specified period. The symptoms of addiction will disappear as a result of not consuming narcotics, but what prevents an addict from quitting is not having a sound personality and a proper will. Just as he initially became addicted, after quitting he will again go back to that substance. We must, however, make it clear to addicts and our society that this is an inhuman act and that whoever does it is a person without a proper personality and will. We must strengthen ourselves, our children, and our society so we will not be drawn to narcotics, because someone who turns to narcotics and becomes an addict, besides being useless and even detrimental to this country and to his own environment, becomes a parasite in that society as well.

To what extent, therefore, can society tolerate that parasite? Ultimately, if that parasite is not cured, he must somehow be removed from society. He must either be imprisoned or kept under control. On the other hand, narcotics must be fought vigorously, so that if someone smuggles narcotics he will be vigorously fought. Absolutely no mercy must be shown to them, because they are people who destroy human societies. They must be pulled out by the roots so that addiction disappears.

Implementation of the New Plan for Distributing Medicine

Concerning the history of implementation of the new (generic) medicine distribution plan, the Minister of Health said:

The generic plan is now being implemented, but it is not a matter of removing the old system and supplanting it all at once with this plan and saying now the generic plan is in effect and that's it. Supposing we have 13 kinds of ampicillin in Iran. The basic ingredient of these 13 kinds of ampicillin is ampicillin, but it was found in one place under the name Penbritin, in another as Pantraksil [sic], and Ampicine [sic] in another in various guises. Now, however, it is only imported and distributed under the name ampicillin. In reality those 13 kinds are changed to one kind, but there are still some of those other drugs being sold on the market along with ampicillin. Gradually, as we are able to respond fully to needs, licenses for those drugs will be revoked, and after a specified period of time we will not have anything on the market other than ampicillin. The same goes for other drugs, meaning we will import and distribute by the generic name. Now we have 50 percent of our consumption, and when we have reached 100 percent of our consumption we will have revoked all the previous licenses. Within 2 years we will have a generic system throughout the country, which will cover over 90 percent of all medicines and we will have no shortages of needed medicines.

Concerning the use of hospitals to train medical students, Dr Manafi then said: The Ministry of Health has around 35,000 hospital beds throughout the country and there are about 10,000 hospital beds in the medical schools, which give a total of 45,000 hospital beds. It has thus been estimated that if we use all the country's resources for training physicians, instead of delivering only 700 or 800 physicians per year to society, we will be able to multiply this figure several times over. Naturally we can train many physicians. As a result, after a certain period we estimate that if we can train about 4,000 doctors every year we will have one physician for every 1,000 people in the country after 15 years. Today we are short 20,000 physicians. Allowing for growth in society, we will need 30,000 or 35,000 physicians in the next 15 years. Taking this situation into account, it has been decided that the Ministry of Health's hospitals will both teach and administer treatment. The same is true of the university, and again this relates to the Cultural Revolution Staff's plan along the same lines, which is to utilize medical facilities throughout the country both for treatment and teaching. There is no separation between teaching areas and treatment areas. In all our operations, wherever we administer treatment we will also teach in order that these medical deficiencies and shortages are rectified.

Ayatollah Khameneh'i's General Condition

Ayatollah Khameneh'i is doing well. His hand is now receiving physical therapy. He may need an operation, and this will be done at the appropriate time if needed.

Our reporter then asked about the new plan that has been introduced in some cities. The Minister of Health said: The plan our brothers in Esfahan have produced deals with the regulation of dental and other fees. We have the same thing also, but we are waiting for guidelines on violations to be put into effect. Of course we study all views from every source. In general we do the best thing or we combine various ideas and do what works best, which is the way this plan was put into effect in Esfahan and Shiraz. Of course these things are easier in small places. The Friday Imam, the Islamic groups, and the doctors themselves sit down and make decisions together. When they come to a conclusion they announce the fees and put them into effect. In the Majlis, however, a law has been passed that requires the Ministry of Health to set the fees for medical services, which the Ministry of Health has done, but we have not announced it pending passage of a law on violations, since we view violation of this as a crime and this should be enacted legally. Until it is enacted, if someone wants to violate this and the government has no answer, then our work is effectively nullified. Therefore it is better if we announce the fees for medical services when the guidelines for violations are announced.

Measures for the Health of Pilgrims

Concerning measures taken to look after pilgrims to Mecca by the Ministry of Health, Dr Manafi said: Every year every 100-person caravan takes a doctor with it. This year we took the war situation into consideration and the fact that we have great need of physicians in Iran. We realized that if we want to do that more than 700 physicians would have to leave Iran. Therefore we put doctors in various treatment clinics for them. There was one treatment clinic for every 10 caravans working continuously there. We did not allow 700 physicians to leave Iran for this task. We hope that they will be able to provide good service there, and we will not be left shorthanded here. Concerning hygiene, there are hygiene teams which are controlling the hygiene situation and the sanitary conditions in the caravans, and the Red Crescent also has its own special desert hospital. In general we had only one difficulty, and that was that Saudi Arabia did not clear the medicines we brought from here. They were extremely difficult about medicines. Of course we had 1 or 2 days of trouble with medicine there, and then they cleared them. God willing these troubles are now over and our pilgrims will return to the country having performed the Pilgrimage acceptably, in one piece, and good health.

GOVERNOR-GENERAL INTERVIEWED ON SITUATION OF BALUCHESTAN

Tehran ETTELA'AT in Persian 11 Oct 81 p 4

[Interview with Dr Mohammadi]

[Text] Zahedan--ETTELA'AT correspondent--Dr Mohammadi, governor-general of Sistan va Baluchestan explained various issues in the province and development plans under implementation in an exclusive interview with ETTELA'AT's correspondent.

While emphasizing the point that counterrevolutionaries have strived and will strive to create turmoil in the province, and that the dear brothers and sisters of the province must vigilantly strangle each counterrevolutionary movement in its infancy, concerning the necessity of eliminating the deprivation in this province, said: Martyred brother Raja'i proposed a plan to eliminate deprivation in the backward provinces such as Sistan va Baluchestan. A budget of 2.5 billion tumans, separate from the province's annual development budgets, was proposed to the martyr Raja'i's cabinet. After complete study, the proposal was approved, and an amount equal to 500 million tumans was placed at the disposal of the governor-general and the Department of Agriculture of Sistan va Baluchestan in order to start activities.

The governor-general of Sistan va Baluchestan added: Of course the governor-general's office must adapt itself to this broad activity and must create a new developmental organization in order to absorb this budget. Our developmental department was strengthened by the selection of an effective developmental deputy and the invitation of a number of committed experts from the governor-general's office. Thus it will be able to have the requisite supervision and management over project implementation.

In order to attract experts to this province, a plan called "three weeks, one week" was proposed, which we hope will be approved.

The Bank-e Mashin Alat-e Sangin [Heavy Machinery Bank] was created in order to eliminate the shortage of heavy machinery. Actions were also taken to supply building materials, and orders were also placed abroad which will soon be delivered. Also, we will try to create a bank called the "Construction Materials Bank."

Three Types of Developmental Plans

He then said: We have three types of plans: A plan related to raising production and self-sufficiency, one related to the increase in mercantile activities, and one related to the creation of security.

We have allocated the amount of 900 million tumans for agricultural expansion in connection with the development and self-sufficiency plan. The main executor of this plan is the Department of Agriculture. The major portion of the plan for attaining agricultural self-sufficiency is concentrated in Sistan and Iranshahr. In Sistan, the main parts of the plan are the dredging of streams, building irrigation canals, stabilizing shifting desert sand, and raising the productivity of agricultural land. In Iranshahr, the plan involves the expansion of land under cultivation, creation of new date palm groves, the improvement of seed and saplings and the education of farmers. It also involves industries associated with agriculture, such as disinfectant and date-packaging factories, which will soon go into operation.

Third is the raising of the production of fish and so-called "white protein." To this end, refrigerating plants in Konarak and Chabahar have been put into operation, and at the present between 30 and 70 tons of fish are purchased daily from the fisheries. We hope that this figure will soon come to 150 tons of fish. We will also give fishermen more work equipment, and purchase fish from them at a more suitable price.

The governor-general of Sistan va Baluchestan then spoke about the issue of "trade," and during a detailed speech, said: By putting the ports of Konarak and Chabahar into operation, this province will soon have a first-place role in trade. In 2 years, perhaps about 1,000 trucks of goods will be carried from these harbors daily. To this end a ship anchorage has been transferred from Bandar 'Abbas to Chabahar, and a company has also announced its readiness to begin to unload between 1,000 and 5,000 tons of cargo daily with a system of "double work."

Founding "Iran Bandar"

He then said: A contract has been signed with the "Piruz Company" in order to found "Iran Bandar." This company is committed to preparing this anchorage for operation in Konarak within a period of 20 months. This anchorage will be able to handle ships of 25,000 tons. Similarly, a 300 million tuman contract has been signed with the "Bahambar Company" for the construction of a jetty in Chabahar. This jetty can be a commercial and fishing wharf. This company is also committed to delivering jetties for commercial and fishing harbors in Chabahar and Konarak within 20 months.

Dr Mohammadi then spoke about the issue of creating security, and said: In order to accomplish this, studies are being made about better control of the borders. Among plans being studied are roads on the border strips, coastal roads, creating new guardstations and observation towers on the border strip and also strengthening the gendarmarie.

Then, concerning preventing counterrevolutionaries and elements associated with the former regime from coming and going across the border with Pakistan, as well as the traffic of international, professional smugglers across the border, he said: In this area it has been determined that the gendarmarie will be rebuilt and equipped. Some time ago I myself traveled to Pakistan and discussions were held towards having the two governments, Iran and Pakistan, jointly control the borders. These actions will be pursued.

Road Construction

The governor-general of Sistan va Baluchestan then pointed to the matter of roads and road construction, and said: Unfortunately, due to the great distance between cities and villages and between stone mines and these points, the lack of sufficient road-building equipment and the lack of companies prepared to carry out large projects, we are faced with very serious difficulties in this respect. However, the government of the Islamic republic has taken effective steps in this direction: The Khash-Saravan road is under construction by two or three companies, and the paving of this road has also begun. About 40 kilometers of asphalt paving has been laid. As far as the Zahedan-Zabol road is concerned, a contract has been signed with the "Paris Company." Previously a Greek company was supposed to complete this road. Furthermore, a major portion of the road-bed preparation on the Zahedan-Mir Javeh road has been accomplished. In addition to this, surveying for the creation of a rail line between Kerman and Zahedan has begun. It is hoped that the construction work on this rail line will begin in the next 2 months. The Reconstruction Crusade has done work in this area, but still none of it is sufficient.

Purging of Bureaus

Dr Mohammadi then spoke about the purging of offices in Sistan va Baluchestan, and said: We are waiting for the bill for reconstruction and improvement of the bureaus. This bill has not yet been approved by the Council of Guardians. When its approval is announced, we will go to work in this area. Of course we have made those persons ready for service whom we determined were corrupt in the past, or who lack the ability to adapt themselves to the needs of the revolution. The bill for the reconstruction of the labor force will clarify their situation.

He added: We have adopted a policy of reward and punishment in this area. If a person is suitable and can fulfill managerial responsibilities well, his educational documents and previous work experience are of secondary importance.

Of course removing persons incompatible with the revolution is faster than replacing them with committed persons. To solve this problem the government must permit us to attract effective and constructive forces.

Plot to Create Discord Between Shiites and Sunnis

The governor-general of Sistan va Baluchestan then pointed to the Taif Conference, which was a U.S. plot to create discord between Shiite and Sunni, and said: This is a cowardly plot. They say that we do not use indigenous (Sunni) people in the bureaus. We are striving very hard to employ indigenous persons. Anywhere that we are introduced to indigenous persons possessing the qualifications and standards acceptable to the government of the Islamic republic, you then see that we even request them to come and take responsibility for the people's destiny in administrative, developmental and service affairs. These days, government, administrative and police responsibility, which is a form of worship and a religious duty, no longer means that material standards should dominate. Rather the basic goal is performing religiously sanctioned and revolutionary service. Wages are gotten for living and for serving the people. If persons accept these standards and want to work to serve the masses and the oppressed people, official's office doors are open to them.

He added: In the offices of the governor-general, the governors and Lt. governors, indigenous persons are used as much as possible. The majority of our lieutenant governors are indigenous, and the mayors as well. But in light of the deprivation of this province under the former regime, and its cultural deprivation and poverty, you can attest that the indigenous forces unfortunately do not possess those specialties and qualifications that are needed to implement developmental and administrative plans. Therefore non-indigenous experts have come to help their Sistani and Baluchi brothers. The indigenous forces are being educated and will be able to replace the non-indigenous persons in the future. This matter requires time. The government is also making an effort in this direction. Also, when there is a situation of equal qualifications, the indigenous person has preference.

Obstruction by Tribal Chiefs and Counterrevolutionaries

Dr Mohammadi confirmed the fact that in some of the rural cooperative companies, persons affiliated with the counterrevolution and the tribal chiefs are not distributing the goods of these companies fairly. They thus create artificial shortages and claim they are the result of the government's functioning. Dr Mohammadi said: Unfortunately, due to a lack of change in the laws and standards governing rural cooperative unions, no notable steps have yet been taken towards the definite solution of this problem. Efforts only have been made to change personnel and to make some tactical moves to lessen the influence of the tribal chiefs and stooges of the counterrevolution in these unions.

For example, it was decided to carry out elections of store and union officials, which were formerly held under the influence of the tribal chiefs, in the mosques and Friday prayers in the presence of pious persons, government officials, the Reconstruction Crusade and the clergy. However, a fundamental change must be made, and I strongly request officials of the State Rural Cooperative Organization to take serious actions to eliminate these insufficiencies and weaknesses in the organization of the rural cooperative companies and unions.

The 'Afghan' Problem

Following this, the issue of the presence of Afghans in the region was raised. A group of these Afghans have created discontent on the part of the government and the people, and have set about smuggling drugs and goods needed by the people. They are increasing the discomfort of the people. Furthermore, the existence of a group of counterrevolutionaries supported by the executed Sadat, Soltan Qabus, King Khaled and the United States among these immigrant Afghan brothers and sisters necessarily transforms some of them into a potential danger for the Iranian Islamic revolution. The governor-general of Sistan va Baluchestan said: The government of the Islamic Republic of Iran supports the struggles of the Afghan Mojahedin on the basis of the principle of "neither East nor West." Whatever help comes from the Islamic Republic of Iran, whether financial or spiritual, the Afghan Mojahedin will not be neglected. However, the existence of some suspicious and corrupt elements among these immigrants must be eliminated. This means that not only we but rather the Afghan brothers themselves must not permit persons wearing the clothes of expelled Afghans to carry out illegal activities, such as drug smuggling, theft and so on. Therefore the government of the Islamic Republic of Iran, while accepting the principle that the Afghan brothers must be helped, will in no way waive its sovereignty over its own decisions in the territory of the Islamic Republic of Iran. The Afghan brothers here are subject to the laws of the Islamic Republic of Iran. Thus I request the Afghan brothers to help solve the Afghan refugee problem by showing the necessary cooperation with the decisions the government has made and the actions it is taking. We believe that the Afghans must be divided into different categories. One group is persons who can crusade and make war, and they must be helped and guided so that they can go and fight with the aggressors. There is no necessity for them to leave their homes and flee from the holy war. The second group is persons for whom the possibility of the holy war does not exist, such as sick and aged people, women, children and families that cannot go and fight. The government of the Islamic Republic, out of the affection and brotherly love that it has due to a common religion, considers it its duty to accept this group. Camps for them are in the process of formation, and we will guide them to these camps. We hope that these camps will be ready in the next 2 months. We will receive them in these camps in a very respectful and Islamic manner.

The third group is persons who have come to Iran under the banner of being Afghan refugees or warriors and are committing abuses, doing indecent things and disturbing the peace. We are going to deal with them in a serious and decisive way. We will either punish them according to the laws of the government of the Islamic Republic, or we will expell them across Iran's borders.

In any case, the government is very seriously determined in this case, and we hope that the Sistani, Baluchi and Afghan brothers and sisters will cooperate with us in implementing this plan so that we can succeed in carrying it out. If, God forbid, any friction appears in connection with the problems they have created, it will in reality be at the desire of the East and West. It will strike blows against the indefatigable struggle of the Afghan brothers, and will also inflict blows on the government of the Islamic Republic.

Rebels, Nobles and Monarchists

Our correspondent then raised the issue of the rebels, monarchist tribal chiefs and drug smugglers. In addition to previous brigandage and martyring a large number of brothers from the Gendarmarie and two health employees from Mohit-e Khash, a while ago they martyred seven of our self-sacrificing Guards brothers on the Zabol road. It is said that fugitive monarchists and expelled Savakists situated in Pakistan have recently joined with the rebels and tribal chiefs in this movement. Our correspondent asked: What programs are you currently implementing for the decisive suppression of the counterrevolutionaries and preservation of the region's security?

The governor-general of Sistan va Baluchestan stated in reply: Of course this movement which we see coming from the rebels, tribal chiefs and corrupt smugglers (who are in reality the same loyal and true helpers of the Idol, since the Shah was the head of all these people) is a desperate movement. We should not give much value to these movements. They are such cowards and chicken-hearted that they make use of the darkness of the night and the emptiness of the roads. They martyr everyone, be he a gendarme, a guard, a health employee or a pedestrian. This is exactly the same movement that the United States' other stooges, meaning the hypocrites [Mojahedin-e Khalq] are carrying out, with the difference that fortunately the hypocrites have no influence here. The United States spreads its poison by means of its practical allies. But because these dregs have no base of support among the people, they are obliged to flee across the borders or to very distant spots. At the present moment the government of the Islamic Republic of Iran has absolute authority in Sistan and Baluchestan. However, due to the borders being open and Pakistan's lack of control, and furthermore the border regions of Afghanistan being open, they flee to those sides of the borders and thus escape the claws of Islamic justice. The preservation of security in this case depends on the greatest possible control of the borders and the strengthening of the committed Gendarmarie forces. We must create such security on the border fringes and give such complete cover to the borders that they will not be able to easily escape from the claws of Islamic justice after striking a blow. We hope that with the complete implementation of this plan, the problem posed by these rebels will also be solved. I am confident that their movement is even more worthless than that of the hypocrites. But since the Great Satan does not want to be so easily pushed into the dirt, it resorts to any device.

U.S. Plots

Dr Mohammadi then added: The United States once wanted to sow discord between the Sunnis and the Shiites with something called the Taif Conference and the Kissinger Plan. At another time, it brought the hypocrites into motion under the banner of a monotheistic classless society. Today it thinks that it is possible, in the name of the monarchists, to once again gather and put into motion all those corrupt persons who enjoyed security in the shelter of the Idol's government. Of course this movement is empty and without effect, and Baluchi and Sistani, Shiite and Sunni citizens have vigilantly confronted this matter. You yourself have witnessed that Sunni and Shiite, Persian and Baluchi unitedly participated in the funeral of those martyrs. They also condemned the barbaric and inhuman operations of these persons.

What is important is that the Sistani and Baluchi brothers and sisters remain vigilant, recognize this sort of plot, and neutralize it. They must know that whoever, on whatever pretext, wishes to carry out a plan to create insecurity, they are certainly inspired by the Great Satan (the United States). We must be attentive and see what the goal of the revolution's enemy is. If the goal is inspiring strike and creating insecurity and discord, it is certain that it is to the nation's harm and that it must be decisively confronted. They have been unable to find a base of support among the people during the past 3 years, and we must not permit them to find one.

Cultural and Economic Poverty

The governor-general of Sistan va Baluchestan, concerning difficulties existing in the path of implementing revolutionary plans, and the people's duty vis-a-vis the government, said: As far as the people's participation in implementing government programs is concerned, we are unfortunately confronted with many more problems in this province. Since this deprived and tyrannized nation was not permitted to develop culturally during the several centuries of British and U.S. colonialism nor afterwards under the tyranny and oppression of the shah's despotic system, not only does economic poverty exist, but cultural poverty as well. The consequence of this cultural poverty is that the presence of these persons on the scene and their participation in their own destiny is made many times more difficult. Similarly, the responsibility of officials is also many times heavier. In order to eliminate this cultural poverty, we have requested and are again requesting the committed clergy and our Sunni and Shiite brothers to do some propaganda work in order to guide the deprived people of the region, particularly in the villages, towards greater participation in the government's work.

Secondly, by expanding the mass communications network and the mass media such as radio and television, we have strived and will strive so that the people have the greatest possible access to these two means of mass communication. In this way we can really raise the cultural level of the society. The third thing which we are soon about to do is to increase the scale and coordination of publications put out by revolutionary organs, public relations offices and Islamic societies. By coordinating all these cultural organs, we can take steps to publish a newspaper throughout the province. By publishing this newspaper, we will be able to explain all the problems to the people, and also raise the society's cultural level. The illiteracy rate in this province is truly staggering. A great many people, due to traditional prejudices, even refrain from sending their children to school. A campaign must be made against this idea. Islam has made a lot of effort and done much to encourage the increase of literacy. We are hopeful that we will be able to greatly raise the society's cultural level by creating schools and employing committed teachers. Thus the people themselves will participate in developmental activities and take their destiny into their hands as in other places.

Message to the Province's People

The governor-general of Sistan va Baluchestan concluded with a message to the province's people, and said: In the period of nearly one and a half years that I have been serving in this province, I have seen such purity and sincerity in the Sistani and Baluchi people that I am confident that, in light of their strong religious beliefs and their readiness to accept genuine, Islamic words and actions, they will never permit the counterrevolution to stir this province into riot.

Furthermore I ask the people to pay more attention to the behavior and contacts of their children and not permit them to go about unsupervised. Also these dear children should beware of falling into the trap of the hypocrites and counterrevolutionaries, and also strive to raise their cultural level so that we can attain self-sufficiency. In conclusion, I once again ask the dear Sistani and Baluchi people to remain vigilantly on the scene and to strangle any counterrevolutionary movement in its infancy.

RESISTANCE ACTIVITIES ON TURKISH BORDER DESCRIBED

Buenos Aires LA NACION in Spanish 14, 15 Oct 81

[Article by Thierry Desfardens: "Iranian Resistance Is Organizing"]

[14 Oct 81 Part I] Guerrilla Forces

> [Text] I have just spent 2 weeks with members of the Iranian resistence who are now making plans to scale the mountains along the Turkish border. One thing is certain, these people are starting to organize very seriously and, what is even more important, appear to be at the point of forgetting personal or ideological differences which have hindered them for months. I met a colonel who is very close to Shapur Bakhtiar, a former fighter pilot loyal to the young shah, a colonel who swears only by General Ariana, a few prominent Kurds, students a bit behind in their studies and more or less from the left--in a word the whole spectrum, or almost all of it, of the factions opposed to Khomeini, which seem ready to work together from now on.

Paris--The objective of the operation was for me to enter Iran clandestinely and to travel from mountain to mountain. Viewed from Paris everything seemed very simple. I had been warned that there would be several days of hiking through the mountains and I was advised to buy a knapsack, a sleeping bag and some good shoes. The idea of losing a few pounds and to step on Iranian soil once more in spite of the ayatollah's probibition pleased me. Dressed as a backpacker I arrived in Ankara. The first surprise, and this was a dandy, my "contact" was at the airport and in his outstretched arms he even carried an immense sign bearing my name in Gothic letters. Without any doubt, on that day I was the least discreet "clandestine person" in the airport in Ankara. A brand new air-conditioned Mercedes with a chauffeur awaited us. My contact insisted on introducing himself. This good looking young man, wearing a tweed jacket, open shirt, a silk handerchief and a Cartier watch was a former captain of the imperial army.

His Majesty's Emissaries

During the conversation I soon learned that he had served much more in the Niavaran palace than in the remote garrisons. At the present time he had his "base" in Istambul where he was in charge of the transportation to Iran of the emissaries of "His Majesty" (the young Shah Reza II) or "His Excellency" (Shapur Bakhtiar). The chauffeur placed a cassette in the car. It was Bakhtiar who spoke. The captain opened his portfolio (made of crocodile) and showed me a recent photograph of Reza II. I was clearly in the hands of a democratic-monarchical organization. The captain left me at the Hotel Buyuk, the Ankara palace where a room had been reserved for me. He would come by 2 hours later "with friends."

Two hours later, with rigorously military precision, three men were waiting for me in the lobby of the hotel. The captain introduced me to his two friends, Colonels A and M.

The Western Front

We settled ourselves in the bar of the hotel between a group of American tourists and a Lufthansa crew. The colonel had a proud look. He undisputedly was a man of action. At least 1.90 meters high, shoulders as wide as a wardrobe, the neck of a bull and a shaven head. M with his small moustache, looked more like a captain of the Hussars. In the time of the shah the colonel had been in command of the Sanandaj brigade; now he is in command ot the entire "western front." His brother, a former major of the imperial army is, on the other hand, "over there" with a battalion of 300 men who control the Mahabad hills.

Without any discretion whatsoever, the colonel opened on the table a military staff map and explained the situation to me. Khomeini's men more or less occupy the large cities. Tabriz, of course, but also Shapur, Urmia and Mahabad. All the rest of the country is in the hands of the "democrats" who, besides, can move freely in the big cities during the night.

Tens of Thousands of Armed Men

[Question] How many armed men do you have on the entire western front?

[Answer] Tens of thousands of men. First there are the Kurds of Ghassamlou, that is, 30,000 perfectly organized "pechmergas" [Revolutionary fighters] plus 50,000 armed civilians. At the present time there are in addition thousands upon thousands of former military men of the imperial army who are forming groups and training. In reality we could take almost all the cities of the west tomorrow.

Militarily it would not present a problem. We are like fish in water there. But it would be a mistake. Khomeini would immediately send his aviation to bomb those cities and there would be many civilian victims. No, our strategy is simple. We are organizing everywhere, in the whole western region, but also in Beluchistan, in all the provinces of the country and in Teheran.

A Gigantic Insurrection

We have, of course, many friends in the army and they too are waiting. On "D-Day" we want to unleash a gigantic insurrection everywhere at the same time. In Teheran, in all the provinces and inside the army itself. Then Khomeini will not be able to do anything more.

[Question] How soon do you intend to start this insurrection?

[Answer] Time is of the essence. If we are not able to do anything within 2 months then we will have to wait until next year because winter will paralyze us. But at the present time we still have political problems. There are those like Ghassamlou, who prefer Bani-Sadr and have already forgotten that this Bani-Sadr was the creation of Khomeini. And there are the others, among the Kurds (and we desperately need the Kurds since they control the pass), who reproach Bakhtiar for his centralist aims. But all that will be worked out.

A Perfect Organization

M came to the hotel the next day to get me. Several hours later we arrived in Van, the last big Turkish city before the border, one of the capitals of Turkish Kurdistan. About 1,800 meters in altitude, the high mountains, the multi-colored dresses of women and the thick moustaches of the proud warriors start appearing. Everything was perfectly crganized. A relief car was waiting for us. We stopped in the very middle of the city, at a hardware store of friends. There were other men, former officers of the shah. Tea, yogurt, honey. We started out again right away.

We had to travel for 4 hours to go from Van to Yuksekova. A fabulous landscape, with 3,000 meter passes, tremendous precipices, interminable defiles, Every once in a while we saw huge herds of sheep with their shephards and their large dogs which, barking all the while, attacked the car and pursued it in an endless, breathless race.

Strange Tourists

Sometimes, after a pass or a curve a Turkish control agent appeared. "Passport. Tourist? OK." This calmed me. The Turks don't make any problems for themselves with "the tourists" who head straight for an Iranian border which is practically closed. They know very well who they are dealing with but they shut their eyes. Ankara is now helping everyone, because that brings in a lot of money. Soviet arms that go to Iraq pass through Turkey; the arms which supply the Iranian resistance also pass through here. There is a sort of tacit agreement. If Ankara blocks the opposition's supply the Kurds (Turkish or Iranian) would immediately blockade Khomeini's access to the outside. It is give-and take.

[15 Oct 81 p 9 Part II] Kurdish Opposition

[Text] A Foreboding Village

Paris. Yuksekova by night. A foreboding village. A shadowy main avenue, a service station, a slightly deteriorated headquarters, furtive silhouettes. The automobile stops. M asks me not to move and not to let myself be seen. A few minutes of waiting. Another car parks beside ours. They transfer my knapsack from one truck to another. They signal me to jump into the other car. And once more the highway. This time we travel with the headlights out. And then, suddenly, we leave the highway.

It is almost a mule path, with a steep grade. We climb the mountain that serves as a border with Iran. Fortunately, the night is clear. The climb never ends. M suddenly appears to be more tense. In a hushed voice he tells me that Iran is less than 200 meters away, precisely at the summit which is silhouetted against the sky. And behind an enormous rock we come to a large lighted farmhouse. The auto stops and we get out.

The Chief

It is freezing cold, the silence is striking, the altitude slightly oppressing. A man waits for us at the door of the house. I see women behind him who become excited. "Good day, good day. May God protect you." We enter. We go up a rickety wood stairway. The grain loft is a large room covered by rugs. On the wall a photograph of Shapur Bakhtiar. There are five men, seated on the floor, drinking tea from small glasses. They get up. All embrace one another. Interminable shows of courtesy. One can immediately locate "the chief," an old man wearing a cap, with gold teeth and an impeccable thick moustache. Beside him is his son--there is a striking resemblence. The others must be in-laws, they are more respectful and remain almost withdrawn. It is they, on the other hand, who hurry to carry my knapsack and to offer offer me scalding tea, yogurt, honey and olives.

The Faces Darken

Everyone sits on the floor again. The courtesies continue for about one more hour. And then M, who has translated the entire conversation for me, finally broaches the subject which interests us. And suddenly the faces darken. M continues telling me everything. Since the day before yesterday everything has gone to pieces. The Kurds are killing each other on the other side of the border. Saunar Mamedi, the chief of the famous Chkak tribe is in open warfare with Ghassamlou. Ghassamlou attacked and Saunar asked Khomeini for help. Khomeini immediately sent his troops. Ghassamlou had to evacuate the whole border area and fall back to the south of Mahabad, near Nouwawan. Since yesterday the border is thus in the hands of Khomeini and his "pasdarans" [Revolutionary Guards] and all this because of traitorous Kurds who for reasons of personal rivalry did not hesitate to ally themselves with Khomeini.

Kurdish Politics

M takes the blow seriously. He realizes that not only is our trip seriously compromised but also that these Kurdish complications are going to cause considerable trouble once again for Iranian resistance. Our hosts sadly shake their heads interminatly. They too are Kurds. The tea becomes bitter and the yogurt seems rancid.

M.explains to me the convolutions of Kurdish politics in recent times. In 1980 the Fourth Congress of the Kurdish Democratic Party [PDK] decided to adopt a policy of "relative cooperation" with the regime of the ayatollah who, due to the difficulties he was having, appeared willing to grant certain benefits to the Kurds. Ghassamlou had been reelected secretary general of the PDK and a central committee of 25 members was elected.

Tribal Complications

A few weeks later, 7 of the 25 central committee members were beginning to disagree with Ghassamlou because they reproached him for not showing himself to be sufficiently cooperative with Khomeini. At least that was the official reason. In reality what was involved once again were triple complications: Ghani Boulourian (27 years in prison in Iran during the shah's rule) chief of the seven opponents, rejected Ghassamlou's "dictatorship," which was becoming harsher and harsher, and accused him also of being too far to the "left."

This first split was almost without consequences. Unfortunately, a few weeks ago three other members of the PDK's central committee also became dissidents. Well now, these three members of the central committee were important since they were the heads of the Chkak, Harki and Bahzadeh tribes, the tribes that control the Iranian-Turkish border itself, and who--this aggravates things even more--are allies of the Barzani, the Iraqi tribe which controls what is called "the three frontiers," that is, the mountains which sit astride Iran, Iraq and Turkey.

The Seven Plus Three

This time Ghassamlou could no longer tolerate the dissidence. He sent his "peshmergas." There was war. The seven plus three brusquely joined Khomeini. The "pasdarans" arrived and the peshmergas withdrew toward the east and the border was closed. All this had just happened. Our host had not yet had time to advise Ankara.

M added, "The same thing always happens with the Kurds. It will take us weeks of negotiations and a lot of money to reopen the pass. We can no longer do anything before the coming of winter."

They prepared two blankets for us. M talked to me all night long. The world did not know anything about it but things were going well for the Iranian democrats. There were more and more adherents in Iran itself; where no one could put up with the dictatorship of the mullahs, the crazyness of the ayatollah and the breakdown of the economy. The West was making one more mistake when it imagined that Bani-Sadr, who was largely responsible for all this chaos, for the executions, might some day be the ideal man. No. According to him there were only two possible solutions left: either a victory by the communist Tudeh party, which for months has been infiltrating the Khomeini government with cells while playing the role of complete collaboration between Marxism and the Koran, and is now organizing without any doubt, the attacks on the religious heads so as to create a vacuum around Khomeini; or, as a second alternative, this general uprising which the democrats are preparing and a return to a reasonable monarchy with Bakhtiar as prime minister, free elections, and finally, a real chance for Iran.

A Dramatic Turn

Next day we left for Van. I met numerous members of the resistance there. They were all talking about the dramatic change in the Kurds. A colonel close to Ariana told me that the Azadegan movement also has its own guerrilla group but more toward the north, in Azerbaidjan. A middle-class man had just arrived from Urmia. His English was perfect. When I asked him why he had fled, he first answered me that life was no longer possible "over there" because 1 liter of gasoline that cost 2.5 rials in 1980 now cost 15 rials, because rice went up in price in 15 months from 30 to 280 rials, a kilo of sugar from 29 to 350 rials.

Later he confessed to me that the pasdarans had arrested him because in a raid on his home they had found a bottle of whiskey. He received 80 lashes.

A Mock Execution

Then they covered his eyes, tied his hands, and led him before a firing squad under the pretext that he was helping the PDK. It was a mock execution. "They like to do this to destroy people's nerves. But to get free one just has to pay." Therefore the man had paid. Like everybody else.

I met an enormous number of people over a period of several days. Van has become the rearguard of the Iranian resistance. The most disparate rumors are circulating. An Iranian army battalion had joined the resistance with its arms and equipment. An air force colonel had refused to bomb Ghassamlou's men and had gone to Iraq. We also learned of the attacks on the president of the republic and his prime minister. It was a party. "You can see that he doesn't have long to go. Who carried out the coup? His friends? No, it was the Tudeh, but when they liquidate our enemies they are playing on our side."

The Shortlived Republic of Kurdistan

Among these military men, among these realists, these democrats, I finally met Ali Qazi, the son of Mohamed Qazi who, in 1945 was the first and only president of the shortlived Republic of Kurdistan and was hanged on the main square of Mahabad by the shah. After having been for a long time a diplomat for his father's executioner Ali Qazi is now returning to his homeland to lead his own resistance movement. He promised to get me across. Therefore a new trip to the border, Unfortunately this contact was also no good. A few hundred feet from the border in the company of my colleague Georges Menager from PARIS MATCH I fell into the company of a...smuggler.

Only One Thing Is Certain

At the end of the world, in an adobe hut, three girls were smoking American cigarettes. There were also several sofas covered with imitation panther, mirrors, a large amount of beer and tires. We soon realized that things could get very bad. Our man was too interested in our watches, our radio, our passports. In Van they had told us about certain false guides who robbed and then shot Iranians who were attempting to flee the country. We had fallen into the hands of one of them. However, after having paid a small ransom we managed to leave on good terms by telling them that we were going to get more silver in Van. It was our good luck that he believed us.

The expedition had once again failed. But one thing is certain: the Iranian resistance is organizing.

NEW AMBASSADOR TO VATICAN--Pope Paul II has received the credentials of Hadi Khosroshahi, the new Iranian ambassador to the Vatican. [GF181745 Tehran International Service in Arabic 1430 GMT 18 Nov 81 GF]

MESSAGE TO POPE--In a message from Imam Khomeyni, leader of the revolution and founder of the Islamic Republic, to Pope Paul II, his eminence has emphasized that humanity does not expect religious men to confine themselves to moral issues and worship, but it expects them to pay attention to social ills and confront international arrogance. The message was delivered to Pope Paul II by Seyed Hadi Khosrowshahi, the ambassador of the Islamic Republic to the Vatican who explained to his holiness the devisible stand of the Islamic Republic of Iran on Iraq's aggression, the Palestinian cause and the principle of neither East nor West, which the government of the Islamic Republic adheres to. In his reply, the Pope wished the Imam good health and the Iranian people--including the Catholic sect in Iran--prosperity and happiness. He also condemned war and terrorism and asserted Iran's sovereignty. During the meeting, Khosrowshahi submitted his credentials to the pope in a special ceremony. NA'IM HADDAD ADDRESSES NATIONAL ASSEMBLY

Baghdad BAGHDAD OBSERVER in English 9 Nov 81 pp 1, 5

[Text] Mr Na'eem Haddad, Speaker of the National Assembly, yesterday inaugurated the Assembly's winter session.

Three newly-elected Members were sworn in during the session.

The Assembly stood for one minute in silence in memory of the soldiers who met martyrdom in the war against the Persian enemy.

The Speaker in his inaugurate speech expressed hope and confidence that the session would complete the efforts exerted during previous sessions and would also deepen the Assembly's democratic practices.

He highly praised the great care and attention paid by President Saddam Hussein to the Assembly to enable it assume a leading role in the society.

Mr Haddad said the Assembly successfully carried out its duties in an excellent manner during the past years and exercised its legislative and other powers efficiently and as duty bound under the law.

On the role played the Assembly in Arab and international arenas, he added the Assembly played an outstanding role in both Arab Parliamentary Union and Inter-Parliamentary Union and currently it has established bilateral relations with most parliaments in the world.

"Although the achievement of past years was magnificent, there was still a long path before the Assembly in serving the people and consolidating the democratic base of 17th July Revolution", he said.

With regard to the Arab and international situation he added that the session was being held under critical Arab and world conditions, full of challanges and dangerous escalation of tension between the supper powers.

As for the situation in the Arab Homeland he said the Arab arena witnessed deteriorating situation at a time when the strategic alliance between imperialist and Zionist forces has been consolidated to control the Arab Homeland through their navies and rapid Deployment Force.

"All this strategy" he continued "is being prepared to liquidate the Palestinian issue, undermine the legitimate rights of the Arab people of Palestine and induce other parties to join Camp David Accords".

On Lebanon, he said "The Palestinian resistance and th national forces in Lebanon face similarr liquidation schemes carried out by Zionist invasion of the south Lebanon".

"The suspicious role played by the Syrian regime and its forces in Lebanon has also weakened the Palestinian resistance, military and politically", he added.

"The greater part of this conspiracy", he said "is carried out by the Persian regime which is backed by the Zionist Entity, America and some Arab parties. They want to distract Iraq's attention from liberating Palestine and mobilize the Arab masses to foil all imperialist schemes", Mr. Haddad said.

"When the Persian regime persists in continuing its aggressive war against Iraq its aim is to distract Iraq's attention from Pan-Arab tasks", he said.

Mr Hadad reiterated that the Iranian regime was helped by Zionists and imperialists to wage an aggressive war against Iraq with a view to disrupting its development programmes and stopping Iraq from effectively contributing to Arab and international issues. "All these schemes have failed so far", he said.

With regard to the Zionist and Persian collaboration in the field of armament, he affirmed that such collaboration takes place with the blessing of the United States of America. "The Zionist Entity and the Persian regime have also collaborated in raiding Tamuz nuclear reactor", he said.

He added the same collaboration was also underway between the rulers in Tehran and the those in Damascus "who are pushing the former to prolong the war and refuse all international and regional efforts to end the conflict peacefully", he said.

"However", he said "the war has taught Iraq and the Arab Nation valuable lessons, namely that the Arab nation is capable of confronting the Zionist enemy in a long war for which all human, military, political and economic potentials can be mobilized until the liberation of Palestine and all the usurped Arab lands are completed".

He added the war has also proved the closing of ranks of Iraqi people and their rallying behind the leadership of the Ba'th Party headed by President Saddam Hussein.

Mr Haddad confirmed that despite the war conditions Iraq was determined to realize increasing pace of development and consolidating the base of its national economy.

"In acordance with the directives of President Saddam Hussein, the national development plan includes a numbr of indications underlying the fact that Iraq was determined to execute its development plans and proceed along the path of social and economic progress to raise the living and cultural standards of its people", he said.

"The leadership of the Party and the Revolution", he said, "has exerted concreted efforts to ensure victory on both the home front and the war".

He added, Iraq has strategic potentials to meet all challenges and emergencies. The soundness of its economy is another indication that the leadership of the Party and the Revolution has taken into account all aspects of life.

"While in Iraq an upsurge in development is taking place and national unity is becoming more and more consolidated, the enemy, for its past, is in a chaotic situation with increased deterioration in its poitical, social, and economic conditions, lack of national untiy and escalaton of Iranian peoples' struggle against Khomeini's terror", he pointed out.

"Nonetheless", he said "Iraq has not forgotten its responsibilities towards its people and the peoples of the region. It still is ready to resolve the conflict peacefully and enter into direct negotiations with despite the enemy's intransigence and persistence to pursue aggression and frustrate peaceful moves".

"The Arab masses look foward to Iraq, expressing their attachment to the right national path pursued by it to foil imperialist and Zionist plans", he added.

"The steadfastness of the Arab people of Palestine in the occupied lands was another indication that the Arab people are determined to met all challenges", he said, adding that the killing of traitor Anwar Sadat was yet another proof that Arab people reject Camp David Accords and back the Palestinian issues and other Arab issues".

RAMADAN ADDRESSES OPENING OF ADMINISTRATIVE CONFERENCE

Baghdad BAGHDAD OBSERVER in English 9 Nov 81 p 4

[Text] On behalf of President Saddam Hussein, Mr Taha Yassin Ramadhan, Revolution Command Council Member and First Deputy Premier, yesterday morning opened the 2nd scientific conference on administrative sciences in the Arab Homeland.

Addressing the conference Mr Ramadhan referred to the significance of holding the conference in Baghdad at a time when Iraq was ushering in a new stage of the Arab nation's way of life.

Since the conference was being held in Iraq, Mr Ramadhan pointed out, Iraq's victories over the Persian enemy would be another factor of ensuring the success of the conference. This will be so because Iraq's victory has strengthened its position which will be an object of study and debate by the conference", Mr. Ramadhan said.

He also indicated the importance of serious and consistent work to develop the system of administrative practices in the light of the new revolutionary democratic experiment in Iraq.

He expressed confidence that the conference would be more effective in leading to the increase of development returns in the Arab Homeland and the expansion of cooperation among Arab establishments concerned with development of administrative systems.

Later Dr Mohammad al-Tawil, chairman of the executive council of the Arab Organization for Administrative Sciences, called on the conference to exert all possible efforts to meet the increased requirements of developing the administrative practices in the Arab Homeland in accordance with the much needed joint strategy and programmes to create more effective systems for administrative planning.

He referred to the significance of convening the conference in Iraq which necessarily followed from Iraq's advanced status in the field of administrative systems. He affirmed that the Iraqi National Centre for Consultations and Administrative development, was considered as one of the pinoneering bodies for developing the administrative systems in the Arab Homeland.

The opening session was attended by a number of Ministers and specialists in administrative fields.

The conference elected Dr Taha Ibrahim al-Abdullah, Iraqi Planning Minister as chairman of the conference and Mr Mazin al-Shukir, Tunisian Minister in charge of Administrative Reform, Mr Sa'eed al-Ghaith,, Minister of State for Cabinet Affairs in the United Arab Emirates, as vice-presidents.

Dr al-Abdullah thanked the conferees for electing him chairman of the conference.

The administrative reprt of the Arab Organization for Administrative Sciences was read which reviewed the overall national issues in the Arab countries in general and the development of administrative systems in particular.

It also referred to the most important achievements of economic and social development and the directions of administrative development in Arab Homeland in the light of the regional reports submitted to the organization and the researches and consultations completed since the first conference in 1978.

It also contained the guidelines for the integration of administrative systems in the Arab Homeland.

The 4-day conference will debate the reports submitted by a number of Arab countries on their administrative activities. It will also discuss the startegy of developing administrative practices in Arab Homeland and cooperation among Arab counries in all fields which would ultimately serve the objectives of the development of administrative systems. It will also help promote joint Arab action through the exchange of expertise, information and visits of teachers to arrive at an Arab theory on administration taking into account the nationalist characteristics of the Arab society.

NEW REGULATIONS AID PRIVATE SECTOR PARTICIPATION

Baghdad BAGHDAD OBSERVER in English 3 Nov 81 p 5

[Article by L. Y. Barkko: "Private Sector Invited to Invest in New Industries"]

[Text] The Ministry of Industry and Minerals announced that this year's plan regulating projects which could be undertaken by the private sector has been amended to enable it enter, for the first time, into new industrial spheres.

The announcement was in line with President Saddam Hussein's directives calling for a larger participation by private enterprises in development plans.

President Hussein has repeatedly pressed this point. Chairing a Cabinet meeting on September 21 he said adequate development required a programmed participation of private enterprise.

Despite war circumstances, Iraq has poured more than three billion dollars into industry during the current year. This explains the soundness of Iraqi economy.

989 industrial projects have been carried out by the private sector. These include, tile, brick and cement block factories, to meet the rapidly increasing demand for construction materials.

By the end of its Five-Year Development Plan Iraq hopes to produce 25 million tons of cement and eight billion bricks.

The upsurge in development activities can be measured by the total yearly cement consumption which in Iraq is the highest in the world in per capita terms.

To increase private enterprise contribution to the production of construction materials, the Industrial Development Bank has been granting loans equalling 60 per cent of the total cost of such projects.

During the first four months of the war, the Bank's loans went up by a record 100 per cent from the same period last year.

An innovative combination of both private and socialist sectors in underway and the Iraqi leadership views private enterprise as complementary and basic to the functioning of the socialist sector.

INCREASED AUSTRALIAN IMPORTS--Australia is expecting a boost to its trade with Iraq. Minister of Housing and Construction D. T. McVeigh said during a recent visit to Baghdad that in addition to primary products, Iraq was keen to increase its imports from Australia of such items as agricultural machinery, veterinary products, air coolers and medical products. The minister added that Australia's exports to Iraq had grown five-fold over the past four years. During the last financial year, exports to Iraq were worth $259.7 m. TANZANIAN TRADE INCREASE--Dar Es Salaam--Iraq is interested in buying a number of agricultural and forest products from Tanzania, Tanzanian Minister for Trade Ali McHumo said here on his return from Iraq. The Minister, who represented his country at the Iraq International Trade Fair, said that the two countries have agreed to strengthen trade cooperation and increase the exchange of trade delegations. "We have invited the Iraqi Trade Minister, Hassan Ali, to visit Tanzania for further consultations and exchange of views," said the Tanzanian Minister. Speaking on the volume of trade between the two countries, he said there had not been much trade, especially after the breakout of the war between Iraq and Iran. He explained that Iraq had been finding it difficult to carry out normal trade with other countries due to the war. According to trade sources here, Iraq could be a market for such goods as leather, tinned meat, tinned fruits and juices, timber, tea and beans. At present Tanzania sells to Iraq cloves, coffee and sisal. [Text] [Doha GULF TIMES in English 6 Oct 81 p 9]

DEVELOPMENT ISSUES IN ARAB TOWNS DISCUSSED

Tel Aviv DAVAR in Hebrew 4, 7, 9, 10 Sep 81

[Articles by Mordechai Barkai]

[4 Sep 81 pp 15, 23]

[Text] According to statements made by the Alignment's secretary for Arab affairs immediately following the elections, Israeli Arabs have proven that they are in favor of co-existence and assimilation. This is certainly encouraging in and of itself. But if one were to doubt the validity of this determination, it would be due to the fact that this evaluation and others related to election results in the Arab sector are made by Arab specialists, not election analysts. The analyses that reached interested parties within the Jewish sector this time, as was the case 33 years ago, were from mediator-commentators.

Although the Jews, who are perhaps unwilling experts on the Palestinian problem, continue to demand that a position be taken relative to the future of the territories, they behave as if they were exempt from worrying about the Arab existence in the Galilee, the triangle, the depths of the Negev or even down the block, in cities such as Acre or Ramallah, places that are undeniably your country and mine--and theirs.

This is their country, too. But with the exception of certain defined groups in certain defined areas and situations--students on campuses, workers and employees in certain industrial sectors, crowds and clerks on both sides of cashiers' windows, even certain geographic neighborhoods--Israeli Arabs are not a regular part of the Israeli Jewish awareness. They appear mainly in the headlines, in articles about unusual events: enemy organizations, blood wars between the peoples of Kfar Yasif and Julis, the murder of Knesset member Shaykh Abu Rabi'a against a background of political bickering. These irregularities are presented along with analyses by specialists, not because the issues themselves are complex, but rather because the events relate to people who are so close and yet, in reality, so far.

This alienation is a one-way street. The Jews in general know very little about the Arab population. The Arabs on the other hand know a good deal more about the Jewish population and what's happening within it. Everyone below the age of 45 speaks Hebrew, watches Hebrew television and listens to Hebrew radio. A significant portion of the Arab work force is employed in the Israeli economy. This one-sided, one-way acquaintance is due to the fact that information about the Jewish population is plentiful and basic. The Jewish part of Israel is well known to the Arab population. The Israelis expose their strengths and weaknesses to the Arabs, in more detail and depth than most people realize.

All that has been written thus far is no more than an aside, but it serves as background to the attempt being made to understand some of that which is happening in Israeli Arab villages today, in the summer of 1981. We say villages in particular because despite the elite position of Nazareth and despite the urban standing of Shefar'am, and despite the fact that there are concentrations of Bedouins in the Negev, in the North and in the Arab quarters of integrated cities, it is the village that represents the essential character of the Arab society, even today. There, in the villages, the really important developments are taking place.

Two weeks ago, in Acre, a group of 10 elected Arab officials gathered to publicly express their disagreements with the policy of the National Board of Arab Council Leaders in Israel. The head of the Bedouin village of Sha'ab, the council leader from Fassuta, and council heads from Gush-Halav, Makr, Fraydis, Majd El-Karum, Abu-Sanan and others, accused the Board of being a puppet manipulated by Rakah and other extremist groups. Five days earlier, in Nazareth, the Board had discussed a list of fiscal demands for the government. They had also discussed a strike by the local Arab councils and the discontinuation of services, if the demands were not met. The 10 leaders complained that they had been threatened in Nazareth because they disagreed with Rakah policy. They demanded that the Board discuss municipal issues only and that it should cooperate in every way with the central government in Tel Aviv. Four days after their public appearance in Acre, the chairman of the Board, Ibrahim Nimr Husayn, who is also mayor of Shefar'am, met with the Acre group. According to one report he promised to be more responsive to complaints and to work hand-in-hand with the local government. However, according to another report, he was very hard on them. In any event, the local government did organize a meeting between the Ministry of the Interior and the heads of the Arab councils.

No solutions were worked out, but at least the situation was brought to light.

The Arab settlements are demanding funds for their empty coffers. They are demanding basic changes in the structure of the regular budget and development budgets. They are demanding equality with the Jewish settlements. They are demanding all this with urgency. The purpose is not to establish new services or implement new projects for developments, but, in the words of Ibrahim Nimr Husayn, to prevent the deterioration of existing services and to pay teachers' salaries. Budget allocations in the Arab sector, according to the officials' complaints, are lower than those in the Jewish sector by a 4:1 ratio. The regular budget of the Jewish settlements is established based on the rate of 5,000 shekels per capita while in the Arab sector the calculation is based on 1.500 shekels per capita. The development budget for the Arab councils amounts to 65 shekels per person.--"Less than nothing! Zero!" Another complaint is related to the inequities in the allocation of funds among Arab settlements. Why does a village with 9,000 inhabitants receive 12 million lira when the village of Jatt, with only 4,300 residents, receives 60 million?

The local government, which conducted its own studies on the financial situation of the councils in the Arab sector, found that--setting mismanagement and ignorance aside--there was some justification to these claims at least in two areas: among Jewish municipalities the number of workers in municipal positions was similar, 2.5 times higher that that of the Arab municipalities. Further, when the Ministry of the Interior makes budgetary decisions for the Jewish municipalities, it takes the overall budget into consideration, whereas with the Arab municipalities, every item is considered separately.

The truth is that here is a real annual increase in the budgets of the Arab settlements at a rate which exceeds that of the Jewish settlements. But the gap is so large--as the local government will admit--that one can only dream of eliminating it. More realistically, one can only hope, under the best of circumstances, to reduce it. The natural increase in the Arab population (4.1 percent annually, as compared with 1.7 percent in the Jewish sector) is the main cause of the problem.

The shortage of classrooms is the most painful. Children study in dilapidated structures and most localities rent rooms from private individuals, rooms that were not deemed suitable for any other purpose, not even for storage. Some are damp and musty, some are oppressively hot. The state inspection codes which set standards for square footage per student and adequate ventilation are like a bad joke in rented rooms such as these. Last year, the shortage amounted to 1,400 rooms (based on 35 students to a room!). Government funds barely cover the cost of adding 100 rooms each year. This rate doesn't even allow for the maintenance of the current level.

The reason for this distress--in the opinion of council head Mohammad Ebri--lies in the fact that the local Arab councils became independent municipalities only 20 years ago. At that time, his village in the western Galilee was in reality cut off from the outside world. The first road, an access road, was paved in 1961. It was only in 1965 that they hooked up to water lines. And they waited for electricity until 1973. The first telephones were installed in 1975. The first local council--as was true for other Arab villages--did not really grasp the essence of its role and shied away from accepting loans (!). They appear to have ignored debts which would eventually mean the eviction of residents from their land. Mohammad Ebri dreams about building an industrial area in cooperation with the neighboring villages of Dayr-Hana and Sakhnin. But he doesn't know where they'll get the financial backing required to do so.

Does this mean that the Arab settlements are sinking into poverty? Not necessarily. The situation of the local councils is distinct from that of the individual residents.

[7 Sep 81 pp 5, 7]

[Text] Even in Shefar'am, where the danger exists that services may fall apart completely due to lack of funds, the situation of the residents themselves is "Not bad, thank God, not bad." Most are well established people, from middle class families--Christians, Muslims, and Druze living in separate but close quarters. There are no significant economic differences among them, no tension. Recently, the Ministry of the Interior approved an additional 8,000 dunams to be added to the town's land area. This is a positive step but it is already clear that it is not enough. A much larger addition will be required. According to projections, the town will have 60,000 residents by the year 2000. Most of this increase will come not from natural growth but from immigration, especially from Bedouin concentrations in northern Israel. Indeed, Shefar'am holds a strong attraction, first because of its location in the middle of the geographic-economic triangle of Acre-Haifa-Nazareth, and second, because of its reputation as a town which absorbs immigrants and treats them in a humane and friendly manner so that in a short time they are part of the local population.

The movement to build up the Arab settlements has been increasingly active over the last 15 years or more. Private homes with unique designs are being built--not housing projects--some of them quite ostentatious and luxurious, in the style of the villas on the hills around Mount Carmel. They are crowding out the old stone and mortar houses from generations long gone. What's more, they're obscuring the characteristic traits of the Arab village. On the outskirts of some settlements, street after street of new homes are being built, well-planned and according to a clear blueprint. In other areas, houses seem to spring up at random, sometimes alongside a cultivated plot of land, sometimes in an olive grove, facing different directions and attesting to a lack of planning and/or precision.

This private building movement is not connected with or accompanied by the development of public areas or public improvements. This is another indication of the gap between the financial situation of the local councils and that of the local residents as individuals. When the settlement was smaller--as the head of 'Arab's council, Mohammad Ebri, nostalgically recalls--and residents knew each other better, community commitment was greater. People were more concerned about the cleanliness of their surroundings. Today, there is a local council, thank God, and the residents prefer to let the council do the work. But the council is struggling to maintain services, among them sanitation and cleaning. If there was money, they would lay sidewalks. But with no money, there are no sidewalks. The shoulders of the asphalt roads are strips of ash piled with garbage. Without paved shoulders, a mechanical street sweeper cannot be used.

In all of 'Araba, with its 9,000 inhabitants, there is one soccer field (and it does not belong to the municipality, it is rented). It is also the only green spot is town and even there, the neglected grass is yellowing. The Arab settlements in the triangle and in the Galilee have been blessed for the most part with an outstanding view, and the people have been blessed with a feeling for beauty and form. But this demand for aesthetics is expressed inside their homes, for the individual's benefit. The collective does not gain by it.

In all of Shefar'am there is no public park, not even an oasis of greenery, just as there is no real movie theater. It would not be worthwhile to build one, so they say, nor worth the cost of upkeep. There are no sports facilities, no public meeting rooms where the young people can get together in the evening for a good time. For such activities, the youth go to Qiriyat At'a or other qiriyot on the gulf, or to Haifa. Youth facilities are for boys, not for girls.

Sayid Salim Shalah is a senior in high school. He took me to the foot of the citadel in the heart of Shefar'am where he showed me the beautiful arched entrances leading to the great halls constructed by the Ottomans on foundations laid by the Crusaders. He and his friends, so he said, asked the town council to fix up one of these halls for them, halls where generations of garbage has accumulated, halls that no one is using for anything. They wanted a club: "Yes, a disco--why not?" They were answered with, "No funds." Sayid Salim was not convinced. He and his friends claim that the proceeds from the two local soccer teams (Hapo'el Shefar'am made it to the top league this year) would have sufficed for a start "if they really wanted it." I asked the mayor, Ibrahim Nimr Husayn, why he didn't try to get the money together, from loans or grants, from rich Arabs in America or the oil countries, to subsidize special projects. The major didn't like my question. He explained, "Nazareth tried to get funds from abroad and failed. You can see what happened on the West Bank. Until recently, towns on the West Bank could solicit funds from the Arab world, as much as they wanted. But now, the Israeli government interferes and causes delays."

How many of these troubles are a result of the network of relations between the local Arab communities and the central government of Israel--and how many have placed their fate in the hands of the local leaders? In other words: Does Jatt have a secret that was used to get five times the budget of a village twice its size?

In Jatt, there is no sign of the dilapidated school rooms present in most Arab sectors. Six years ago, the last rented room was abandoned and today, children of all ages, from kindergarden to the upper high school grades, study in well equipped rooms, in designated buildings which are properly maintained. And they're still building. One of the two elementary schools won the President's Award this year.

In Jatt, tax collection rates are as high as 100 percent. On 1 April of this year, the residents finished paying off 30,000 shekels in debts to the local council and in the first month of the new fiscal year, 45 percent of the taxes levied had been collected. Jat had enforced linkages and interest on late payment of debts before these policies were enacted into law. There is undoubtedly a connection here.

In Jatt the employment picture is the diametric opposite of that in other villages. In many or most areas, agricultural jobs are declining and the lion's share of the labor force goes to work on the outside "from Eilat to Qiryat Shemona." In Jatt, however, only 15 percent of the workers go elsewhere for employment. The rest earn their living within the village, the large majority in agriculture, of all things, in intensive agriculture in greenhouses which yields an especially good return. "Blue collar," non-professional work is dominated by workers from the occupied territories who are far greater in number than the few from Jatt who work outside their village. The jobs they fill are much in demand within the various branches of industry in 'Afula and Netanya.

In Jatt the birth rate accounts for a 2.5 percent annual increase in the population, compared with a 4.1 percent average in the Arab sector as a whole. In 1967 there were 147 babies born in Jatt. A decade later, in 1977, only 116 babies were born. This surprised many, perhaps, but was nonetheless considered an achievement in family planning (average: 5 persons), and was attributed to the large number and influence of teachers in the village.

In addition to the regular services, the residents of Jatt can take advantage of some unusual benefits such as the sports facilities--soccer, basketball and tennis--which are lit, well-kept and surrounded by bleachers. There is also a special budget for events and parties held in the village cultural center.

In Jatt, there is a unique public park, encircling the "Hill of Education" and encompassing the sports facilities.

All this is enumerated and presented by Mayor Ahmad Abu-Isba', who speaks "Kaduri brand Hebrew." It was at the Kaduri Agricultural School that he acquired his profession as a teacher of nature and agriculture. And it was there, as far as one can tell, that he developed a love for trees and all things green. Ten years ago, with his own hands, he began planting for the park on the hill of the old graveyard. He brought each plant, one by one, from nurseries all over the country. Now the trees stand taller than a man and continue to be well cared for. On the park's summit is a colorful boat with two slides on either side. The idea belonged to an artist from 'En-Hod whom Abu-'Esb'a met in Lod. He ordered a set of the equipment as the focus of the children's play area on the Hill of Education. The hill can be reached via an access road which leads into town. The avenues in town are lined with fig trees. And there will be an amphitheater, and public gardens, and ...

The mayor of Jatt is not bashful. He's 45 years old and 22 of those (with the exception of one term) he spent as head of the local council or as an active member on it. "The secret? It's simple: I know my job. I also know the job of the treasurer and all the other key officers in the local government. I know exactly what we should be getting and I get it." What, for example, has he gotten? He has convinced the Ministry of the Interior to establish the council budgets, not based on last year's budget, nor on population, but based on need. He is on excellent terms with the establishment. He can go to the national insurance offices and say, "You have to find a position here for one of my boys." He can go to the police and tell the station commander, "Release that youth. I, as head of the local council, will be responsible for his behavior." He is not only the head of the council in Jatt, he is also a member of the central management committee for the local government, a member of the Board of Arab Settlements, and he's on the professional councils of both groups. Today, he is no less involved in enterprises related to the entire Arab sector than he is involved in his own village.

And because he is at the head of the organizational committee, and because he was appointed with a group of "positive" council heads ("and don't think that means I'm in someone's pocket"), a positive attitude exists on the part of the residents toward the council, its activities and its dealings with the establishment and the Jewish settlements in the region. How is this expressed? "In the last Knesset elections, the Rakah 'front' received 25 percent of the vote, as compared with 65 percent in the preceding election. Today, there are no Rakah supporters in the municipality.

[9 Sep 81 p 11]

[Text] He who thinks he knows what a wedding is like in an Arab village should not be too sure of himself. He may not be up-to-date on the details, at least as far as Salah Diyab's "Muntaza."

The background of this phenomenon can be explained more or less as follows: In the years of economic prosperity which began around 15 years ago, Arab women found that when it came time to marry off their sons and daughters, although they wanted a big wedding, they cringed at the thought of how much work would be involved in the preparation. They looked to the Jewish mothers to see how they did it and ... they discovered the banquet hall.

Banquet halls in Haifa or Naharia, in Acre or in Netanya were undoubtedly expensive, but that was not the problem. There was the problem of the city ordinances that required the orchestra to stop playing at 11:00, at which time the real fun was just beginning. The aforementioned Mr Diyab drew the proper conclusions and came up with the idea of garden restaurants, like the well known "Montaza" in Ramallah. In order to completely avoid the problem of closing time, he built it at the crossroads between two villages in a location which does not fall under any city ordinances.

In the course of time the garden restaurant was subject to the same phenomenon as any new fashion: it was not only popular among Arab families planning weddings, it was also discovered by Jews who started holding their weddings and Bar Mitzvahs there. Christians started celebrating baptismals there and the graduating class from the police academy in Shefar'am started using it for their ceremonies.

S'alah Diyab, as everyone knows, is already planning to expand the "Montaza" into a country club, to add a stable, maybe even tennis courts. It all depends of course on his continued success. In the meantime, the restaurant continues to fulfill its original function. Arab weddings take place nightly, in the best Muslim tradition, but paid in cash and not in time and effort.

This symbolizes the changes that have occurred in the Arab village, although it is not the most characteristic. Far more indicative are the large modern buildings, the hundreds of new consumer goods that have appeared on the market, western dress and a revolution in public health and medical services (without a doubt attributable to the Histadrut clinics).

When the first local councils were established 20 some odd years ago, it was only natural--according to the way of looking at things at the time--that the government would be in the hands of the clan leaders. They had always filled key positions, and if some of them were per chance illiterate, it didn't necessarily matter. Today the last vestiges of the clan system are fading and disappearing. More typically, elected officials are young local politicians (the average age is 35)--young and educated. This is a far more significant indicator of change.

But, it is hard to imagine a more drastic change than that which has begun to effect the status of women, married and unmarried alike, in the social structure of the Arab village. And more changes are yet to come.

Nellie Karkabi talks about one of the latest developments in this process--the extent to which women were involved in the election campaigns and their results. "... In Nazareth and in Shefar'am, in Tamra and in Acre, in Kfar Qar'a and in 'Ar'ara, as well as in a score of other places, women worked for compting parties. Within Rakah this was not an entirely new phenomenon, nor within Mapam. But it was new for the Labor Party." It was not a representative of the party activists who went about waving the flag from town to town, but local cadres of women who rose and worked in their villages. "They spoke at meetings in homes, they spoke out of a conviction that they would get results. They didn't work blindly. We were very critical of the Alignment. But we knew how to be perceptive without causing harm. We understood the demands of the campaign period ..."

Nellie Karkabi, a college graduate born in Nazareth and residing in Shefar'am, is the wife of a school principal and a member of the center for Working Women and Volunteers in Israel. She speaks about the tremendous improvement in the status of women--often in the home she is now a full partner in terms of parental responsibilities and her opinions are respected even if she doesn't work. Of course, there has been an enormous change in the attitude toward daughters within the family. Even in the villages, far fewer families hesitate to send their daughters to co-ed classrooms in high schools. Often a father can be heard saying: "My son doesn't want to study? So what. He can go to work at some job. And if my daughter is the one that wants to study at the university, let her study. Why not?" The result is that in Shefar'am, a significant percentage of the teachers are local, educated women. The same is true for the social workers, the nurses and supervisors at local clinics, and the tellers in both local banks. Young educated girls who did not find employment in Shefar'am work in Haifa and in the qiriyot as clerks and secretaries (for Jewish employers and, by the way, mostly under inferior conditions).

What Nellie Karkabi and other members of the Working Women and Volunteers in other areas are trying to do is encourage women who did not finish high school or university, and therefore sit at home, to go out and get industrial jobs. They need this encouragement and so do their families. The advancement of the educated woman is assured, more or less. But the immediate goal is the advancement of those women who did not study in high schools or universities--from being idle to working in a factory, thereby allowing these women to gain financial security, social status and self-esteem.

Nellie Karkabi tells both the educated women and the factory workers to beware because they're treading on thin ice: "You can't imitate Jewish women. You can't behave like them. What is acceptable for them is not acceptable among us. And despite everything, a woman who tries to do so will prevent other women from having the opportunity to leave the home."

Progress has begun. One can still remember a time when parents would not allow their daughters to study in co-ed high school classes. Today this is universally accepted, or almost. Further, young women travel from their villages to universities in Haifa and return home on buses, at night. But these same young women cannot invite a male co-student into their homes. And if this same male student really did want to visit the girl, he would have to be her brother's friend or he'd have to come up with a very good excuse. And if he does come armed with a notebook that he's returning to her, and if he sits in the living room with her parents, and if neighbors come in, the girl cannot introduce him as her friend. Nor would the mother ever dream of saying: "Meet my daughter's friend."

"I'm a university graduate myself," says Nellie Karkabi, "and I work in Tel Aviv for the Working Women and Volunteers in Israel. I visit other villages, drive a car and travel abroad. But when my own daughter entered high school, I had a long talk with her about what you do and don't do. I promised her that she, too, with age, would be free."

When Nellie was elected as the first Arab woman to Working Women and Volunteers in Israel, it was a big event. Her youngest son asked her if now she was "better then dad," who was only a school principal. She responded withe the utmost sincerity: "Me? Better than your dad? Never in this world."

This year, as we've mentioned, women participated actively in the election campaign. At the close of the elections, they were complimented by male colleagues, each in her own section. "But we had to put out 200 percent in order to achieve the same recognition as the men. In order to get the women's vote, the names of active women party members were placed on the list, but not in realistic positions. "They gave in--You know how it is, the women always give in ..." Yes, they are already active. But they do not yet really participate in local politics, insofar as power, investment or authority. The example of Violet Hori in Kfar Yasif is an excellent one, and for the time being, a solitary example within the Arab sector. Is this not a challenge?

Mrs Karkabi answers: "Yes, that is a challenge. But I'll tell you candidly, it is not the number one challenge. There are other more important and more urgent matters that preoccupy me."

There are certainly negative aspects associated with the processes of change, modernization and urbanization. Not just in the cities but in the villages, even the smaller among them, there are marginal youth. There is attrition in the schools, theft, breaking and entering, vandalism and wanton violence. There is the sale and use of drugs, economic regression, unemployment, neglect of the elderly, substandard housing, and chronic, untreated illness.

These problems are particularly acute in integrated cities. But according to statistics from 1978 (and there have been no significant changes since then) "The Arab society is still doing very well." Not only in the villages but in the cities, too, crime among Arabs is lower than among Jews. This is true even in a place like Nazareth, at least in comparison to near-by Jewish cities like 'Afula and Bet-She'an, Tiberias and Migdal-Ha'emek.

Change is unavoidable, but the more it comes to the forefront, the greater the opposition from conservative forces. The small size of the criminal element in the Arab sector--the smaller the settlement and the more rural, the smaller this minority--is not the result of police action but rather a function of social sanctions which are often stronger. Another factor working against the increased negative aftergrowths of change is the almost total absence of emigration. Workers from the Arab sector find jobs all over the State of Israel. Students attend universities in all the Jewish cities. But at the end of the week or the season, they all go home. They do not relocate. There is no emigration, no exodus from the village to the cities, no emigration abroad. He who was born in a given village in the eastern Galilee or in the Ayron Valley, has every chance, when the time comes, of meeting his creator in the exact same spot.

Only the old people do not have some level of proficiency in Hebrew. Those whose contacts with Jews are very frequent have completely adapted to the use of Hebrew. But this is far from implying that they have assimilated. Their ties with the Arabic language have not weakened, nor with tradition, and at its root, religion and folklore. They have just become more introverted.

Nellie Karkabi spends most of the week in Tel Aviv where she speaks Hebrew. But, "I return to my Arab home," and the Hebrew, along with a certain style of speech and behavior, remain on the other side of the threshold. The same rule applies to her son, who is studying medicine at the university where he speaks Hebrew. A Jewish girl from Hedeira who came to visit said that the Karkabi's run was "exactly the same as the one in our house." Maybe the rug, but not the food. "I cook traditional Arab foods. We don't eat sandwiches." In the kitchen nothing has changed, just as respect for the father has remained a constant.

"To the contrary," says the head of the Department of Education in Shefar'am, Majid Haj. "As a minority group, we are more aware of the need to conserve things as they were, for fear that we will lose what we have."

[10 Sep 81 p 9]

[Text] Other than the revolution in health care--which began over a decade ago and is attributable to the establishment of clinics--to the outside observer, education appears to be the uncontested greatest success of the Arab sector in Israel.

In the western Galilee, the town of 'Araba with 9,000 residents, has 3,000 students in elementary school, 600 in high school. With all its problems, the school is surrounded by construction.

In the triangle, the town of Jatt, with 4,300 residents, has around 1,500 students in the educational system.

Also in the triangle is Kafr-Kasim with 6,800 residents, and 50 permanent municipal employees, 44 of whom work in the educational system, about half above the elementary level, and another 5 in the youth center.

More than one-third of the population--children and youth--are studying. The lion's share of the budget goes to education. In the afternoon the streets are filled with students returning from school. Jewish settlements of parallel size might be jealous of the existence of a high school in this Arab village and of the high rate of attendance. True, it is partly due to demographic differences. But so what?

"There is no doubt," says Majid Haj, director of the Department of Education in Shefar'am, with grave doubt, "that the absolute number of students and the percentage of educated citizens are both impressive. This is part of the modernization process in this sector. But when you examine the content and essence, you discover things which need to be changed."

Majid Haj, who is certified in sociology and Hebrew literature, says that Arab education, impressive in its numbers, is at least 10 years behind the educational level in the Jewish sector, partly "because the starting point was so much lower," but also for other reasons. The lag is mainly in the vocational-technological area--it comprises only 10 percent of the education above the elementary level in the Arab sector, as compared with 45 percent in the Jewish sector. As for content, "Reforms were imposed on Arab schools where no foundation had really existed. Sociology, for example, was added to the curriculum required for matriculation, but without preparing text books, without training teachers, and even without a qualified director. Language and history teachers are handling it, using books mechanically translated from Hebrew or English. The results of learning by blind repetition are well known."

The principal of the high school in Jatt says that the text books for Arabic literature were written by Jewish teachers and administrators, and then approved by the Ministry of Education. New developments in Arabic literature are not even mentioned, nor is there any coverage of new world literature in Arabic translation. He compares this, without even realizing the harsh irony, with what happened to literature and history books in Germany (!) during the entire generation following World War II: a period of 20 years was rooted out as if it had never existed.

Majid Haj talks about long term investments in winterizing rented school rooms--in some the teacher is physically unable to reach the student. At the director's initiative, reciprocal visits were arranged between students from Shefar'am and Qiryat Bialik. Haj doesn't know what the visits did for the youth from Qiryat Bialik, but he knows what they did for the Arab children. "Their response was: 'It was good to see the difference'--and from that time on they've been concentrating on the difference. They saw the Jewish students' environment, the conditions under which they study. They saw a group that they could compare themselves with, as opposed to the eternal comparisons with the way things were in the Arab settlements a generation ago, or comparisons with what other Arab countries have or don't have." They could see what Qiryat Bialik has today. No explanation, even historical, is adequate justification. In his opinion, it is not sufficient to explain miscarriages, they must be rectified. The Arab students, like like students everywhere, develop in school their notions about the rest of the world. They see the gap and the gap fosters jealousy.

It's not just a question of the gap. Israeli Jews coming into actual contact with Israeli Arabs for the first time are surprised at their Hebrew fluency. Why should they be surprised when Hebrew is taught from the third grade on in the Arab sector. Haj is not surprised by their surprise, nor by the fact that Jews assume that Hebrew will suffice in their contacts with the other half. He asked if when I come to Arab village I don't expect as a matter of course to be able to conduct an interview in Hebrew. He asked if this was not flagrant asymmetry.

He pointed out a study by the sociologist Yohanan Peres, which found that in the Arab curriculum 40 percent of the history lessons are devoted to the history of Zionism and the Jewish settlement of Israel, while only 1 percent of the Jewish students' curriculum deals with Arab history. To Haj this exemplifies "the tyranny of the majority" as defined by de Tocqueville. The majority looks down upon the minority, has no need for them.

The result is "enduring estrangement." The Arab students have a richer, more detailed understanding of Jewish society and their willingness to approach fellow Jewish students is greater. The Jewish student gleans his knowledge of Arab society not from school but from sources which are far less reliable. This is expressed in the stereotypes they espouse (10 percent of the Jews surveyed agreed with the opinion that Arabs would never reach the level of the Jews). This asymmetry, this imbalance, is, according to the head of the school system in Shefar'am, the Jews' loss.

It's hard to disagree with that, just as it's very hard to judge what this has to do with political moods in the Arab sector.

In the first part of this series I described a meeting of 10 Arab local council leaders who expressed opposition to the body they themselves were members of, the National Board of Arab Settlements. The immediate cause was to present the urgent financial demands of the councils. Also to be decided was the extent of cooperation with the local central government (yes or no) and the strength of the protest to be mounted (to strike or not to strike). But the real background was the split within the Board. The dissidents (as they were dubbed by the Jewish press) accused the Board of being a puppet in the hands of Rakah and other extremists. Rakah supporters (the most important among them the mayor of Nazareth, Tawfiq Ziyad) protested against the activities of the 10 leaders and demanded action against them. Among the moderates, including the current head of the Board (Ibrahim Nimr Husayn, mayor of Shefar'am), were those who claimed that the splinter group was simply attempting to manipulate the agency for Arab affairs.

This background has been brought out in an effort to find answers to questions like the one about "political moods" above, questions of opposition, power, models and trends within the Arab community.

There are those who remember that the Board of Arab Settlements was established in 1974, if not at the initiative of then with the after the fact blessing of the man who was at the time the highest appointed official in charge of Arab affairs. Moise Han'a, from Kfar Rama, and a Rakah Knesset member at the time, was chosen to head the Board. It quickly became apparent that the radical majority on the Board (9 out of 15 at that time) was pressuring him to initiate not municipal actions, but "national" political ones. The Earth Day demonstrations of March 1966 were discussed, although not decided, by the Board. The government refused to recognize the Board but was willing to negotiate with the local elected officials in the Arab sector--either on an individual basis or within the framework of the local central government. People like Tawfiq Ziyad of Nazareth and others of that class knew how to exploit both fronts: to agitate the Board into political, radical, anti-Israeli activity, and to bring the local central government to light as an example of "honesty and moderation."

Meanwhile, Moise Han'a resigned and in his stead Ibrahim Minr Husayn was elected as head of the Board of Arab Settlements. He was seen as a moderate. But, simultaneously, another phenomenon was developing which peaked around the elections for the tenth Knesset. This was the still fresh episode of veteran communist, businessman Dr Emile Tumeh's attempt to unite all the radical Arab groups and bodies in Israel under one roof: "the front" led by Rakah, "the Village Sons," the "Al Nehda" group from Taiyiba, the student's "National Progressive Movement" (some of its members were arrested and found guilty of terrorist activities for the "Popular Democratic Front" of Ahmad Jubril), and the "Academic Union" of Nazareth--nine groups in all. All the slogans and plans of operation were symbolic: "The 5th of June Paper" (the day the Six-Day War began), the call for the wording "national covenant" (based on "Palestinian covenant"), the meeting of a "congress" in Shefar'am (reminiscent of the Zionist Congress in Basel where the Jewish state was established), and the establishment of a "National Coordinating Committee" (based on the steering committee in the territories).

The first blow was dealt to this organization last December when the minister of defense, Menahem Begin, enforced emergency regulations from the Mandate period--for the first time since the "Al Ard" group was dispersed at the beginning of the 1960's--and declared the meeting of the "congress" to be an illegal activity. The second blow came 4 months later when--according to the same regulation--Begin declared that the "Coordinating Committee" was also illegal.

The effectiveness of these harsh actions in the Arab sector, accompanied by similar policies in the territories and stepped-up military activities against the terrorists in Lebanon, remains to be seen. Some are convinced that the restrictions provided an excuse for certain members of the proposed umbrella organization, such as the "Academic Union," to get off the band wagon.

There is no dispute, however, on one decisive fact: Rakah, which had gained almost 1.5 percent in the Histadrut elections, was badly hurt in the Knesset elections. Compared to the 10 percent it had gained in each of the previous campaigns, Rakah lost 26 percent in this last election. In the Arab sector, support declined from 50 percent to 37 percent, and the Alignment showed an impressive increase in support.

Rakah's decline in the Arab sector, despite direct aid from the PLO, was also explained by different people in different ways. The main reason proferred was disappointment with Rakah's municipal activities in Nazareth, under Tawfiq Ziyad, who was more involved in politics than in municipal problems. Fear of the party's radical propensities was also mentioned as a factor, since there was talk of abandoning "moderation."

If you listen to young Israeli Arabs today and compare what they's saying now to the way they were talking a few years ago, you will find that their audacity is greater, their style far more harsh, and their desire to make a positive impression on the Israeli sector has all but disappeared. However, the same could be said about their counterparts in the Jewish sector, and not only in the context of election campaigns. One must differentiate between what is said to the establishment, against the councils or specific government activities, and what is said against the State of Israel and the fact of its existence.

Pessimists within the Jewish ranks project increased polarization, a deterioration in the relations between majority and minority groups, and a confusion of the struggle for citizens' rights with the nationalist struggle. They view with increasing concern the rising Arab birth rate, 2.5 times higher than the birth rate for the Jewish population ("At this rate, by the year 2000 they'll be able to place 12 people in the Knesset and if they manage to form a united party, they'll be entitled to two seats on the foreign affairs and security committee.") The pessimists are therefore sure that the Arab sector will always demand special attention, a distinct 'policy' and a separate apparatus, like the agency for Arab affairs.

The head of the Histadrut's Arab division, Ya'akov Cohen, on the other hand, is convinced that institutional integration is the only way to cultivate better relations between the two sectors. Any organization established to meet the needs of only one of the nationalities will be radical. There's no getting around that. He therefore opposes the existence of the Board of Arab Settlements, even if its head is a moderate, constructive person. In 1959, he recalls, the Histadrut argued the issue of accepting Arab members. People like Shaul Avigor warned: "You will create a tragedy. Our Zionist image will be destroyed." Ya'akov Cohen and Reuven Barakat argued the opposing viewpoint, saying: "We are the founders. We are the majority. We will continue to set the tone. There is nothing to fear." Today, Arabs make up 10 percent of the Histadrut membership and are represented by three members on the central committee who "feel at home."

A similar debate was launched 15 years ago regarding the acceptance of Arabs in Jewish youth groups. Cohen believes that they can be provided with alternatives to the Zionist slogans: instead of "work and defense," let them use "community work," for example. In the agricultural center there was also a heated discussion. I claimed that it would be better to argue, even fight over water allocations and budgets than to see splinter Arab organizations forming and issuing declarations about suppression and a Palestinian state. He also recalls that on the Alignment's platform committee, Mota Gur argued vociferously with Arab members about sensitive issues like military allowances, which are paid only to Jewish families with children in the army.

There was agreement on some subjects, no agreement on others--but the integration of Arab members on the list was an unprecedented success.

Polarization? Majid Haj denies the concept. "There's Palestinization. We are not cut off from the West Bank and Lebanon. But there is also Israelization. What you see is the process of politization, which only belies a desire to integrate. The results of the last elections attest to this."

A young Arabist warns against drawing conclusions based on the tenth Knesset elections. He advises to wait until the local elections of 1982. By then the situation will be much more clear.

PAPER EXCORIATES NEW PRESS LAW

Kuwait AL-RA'Y AL-'AMM in Arabic 5 Nov 81 p 1

[Editorial by Fahd al-Masa'id: "Who Will Bury the Corpse of Journalism?"]

[Text] In short we say that the rope has drawn near the throat of journalism... and with terse brevity we call out that we are on the verge of announcing the death of journalism. We find outselves suddenly, surprisingly in the presence of the "corpse" and we can find no one who would usher this corpse to freedom's graveyard.

The new press and publications law is tantamount to a rope despite its leniency, a "leniency" which is more painful and more torturous than barbed wire.

We have been spared repeatedly of Article 35 only to find its apparition looming over the horizon baring its fangs to sink them in our necks and extending its sharp talons to tear open our breasts.

The few positive aspects of the law are not even worth mentioning when compared with the innumerable and incalculable negative aspects. Every article of the law is vague as was the famous security council resolution which stood for more than 14 years with no diplomatic scholar to explain and define it.

Every clause of the law carries in its words and expressions a thousand and one meanings which would allow the government agency concerned to undertake closings on a daily basis of newspapers where they would certainly find tens of reasons to support suspension.

For example, the law forbids attacking any state that has established diplomatic relations with Kuwait. This unfortunately means that we could not criticize America or attack England. With this regulation the government has only left us Israel and South Africa.

The new law will transform the press into official newspapers without officially doing so because the controls that we wanted have come as fetters to bind free thought before binding the hand and to imprison opinions before imprisoning the editor-in-chief. This is a much higher price to pay than the 100 or 500 [dinar fine] called for in one of the law's articles.

It is certain that the law was not drawn up on the spur of the moment for there is not one loophole in it through which the press can escape to save itself. If in the past the government considered itself a 60-percent partner in the press, with this law it has come to dominate the press entirely without compensation and to impose its control over the press without an official resolution.

Is it desired by this law that we be left with the choice between two evils, either a slow death with poison or a quick death in front of the firing squad?

This is a question which we unfortunately do not have an answer for, yet this is the painful reality.

We now place this law before His Highness who has announced more than once his support for the Kuwaiti press. Will he accept this law?

Will he accept snuffing out the flame that has participated in lighting the way, not only for Kuwait, but for the entire Arab world?

What we say here to His Highness we say as well to the Crown Prince.

BRIEFS

USSR EXHIBITION SPACE—Kuwait and the USSR have signed a protocol for the establishment of a permanent space exhibition in Kuwait. Under the protocol the USSR will sell Kuwait space equipment and vehicles from its space research operations. The equipment and its placing in the scientific section of the Kuwait Museum of Science are estimated to cost $225,000. However, the USSR has offered to cut the cost by half 'in appreciation of Kuwait and its policy, which aims at the expansion of cooperation between the two countries in all cultural and scientific fields, as well as in response to the feelings of friendship and cooperation between the USSR and Kuwait.' Kuwait is the first country outside the Eastern bloc to receive such exhibits on a permanent basis. [Text] [London 8 DAYS in English No 43, 31 Oct 81 p 41]

ISRAELIS, PALESTINIANS BUILDING UP IN SOUTH

London 8 DAYS in English 31 Oct 81 p 19

[Text] ON OPPOSITE SIDES of the narrow United nations' buffer zone in Southern Lebanon, Palestinian and Israeli soldiers are building earthworks and digging in for the winter. Neither side appears ready to break the three-month-old ceasefire and precipitate the kind of massive attacks the Israelis staged for two bloody weeks in mid-July when more than 400 Lebanese and Palestinians, and seven Israelis, died in the cross-border shelling and Israel's air and sea raids.

The UN soldiers watching the new fortifications from their observation posts say that each side seems to be gearing up its defences in case the other launches a big assault. A Palestinian officer in Tyre, the coastal stronghold of the PLO and its Lebanese leftist allies from the National Movement, confirmed that they were fortifying key sites north of the Litani River just above the buffer zone patrolled by troops from the UN Interim Force in Lebanon (Unifil).

The PLO captain — who requested anonymity for security reasons — also said that they had replenished their arsenals in case of a new Israeli offensive. 'We have many more Katyushas since July,' he said, an assertion supported by other people in South Lebanon.

One UN officer speculated that one reason for the new Israeli earthworks was the heavy rocket barrages the Palestinians could mount. 'I think the Israelis were a little surprised by the fire power they (the PLO and National Movement) used last summer,' he said, pointing out that one PLO position poured out 130 shells in just five minutes last July.

The Israelis are concentrating on throwing up new earthworks in the enclave of their Lebanese ally, renegade army major Saad Haddad. Outside Marjayoun, the 'capital' of Haddad's self-proclaimed 'republic of free Lebanon,' the Israelis are building an earthen wall reinforced by concrete, according to UN officers who suggested it might be designed to serve as a shield for tanks. Marjayoun, the northernmost town in Haddad's enclave, is one corner of the triangle of artillery flashpoints in the Israeli-Palestinian confrontation area.

Another significant Israeli fortification has been spotted by observers south of Unifil's Dutch battalion nearer the Mediterranean. The work in progress suggests to some UN officers that the Israelis are building an underground operations post which could serve as a command centre.

The officers say current Israeli work in the enclave seems to be limited to revetments. The UN soldiers, who monitor activities in the enclave from half a dozen observer posts inside Major Haddad's territory, as well as from Unifil posts in the buffer zone to the north, say they have detected no movement of Israeli artillery or tanks into the enclave. 'They pulled out their guns in August,' one UN man said, and others concurred.

Some South Lebanon watchers, however, see an Israeli arms pullout — or buildup — in the enclave as more an acdemic point than a significant one. Major Haddad's militia is still operating there, with its Israeli advisers and Israeli-supplied arms. Futhermore, the enclave's northernmost boundary is only 8km from the Israeli border.

Palestinian fears of a new Israeli attack after the 24 July ceasefire have changed from fears of an outright invasion, following this autumn's spate of bombings which have claimed more than 150 lives in Palestinian and leftist controlled areas.

The most deadly, on 1 October, killed nearly 100 people and devastated the narrow Beirut street which is the nerve centre of the PLO's bureaucracy. The first, on 17 September, killed at least 25 people in an explosion at the Sidon headquarters of the PLO and National Movement.

A legion of Palestinians and leftists have publicly blamed Israel or its 'agents in Lebanon' for the bombings. PLO Security Chief Salah Khalaf, better known as Abu Iyad, recently suggested that Israel had resorted to this type of terrorism because international pressure made the Israelis reluctant to break the 24 July ceasefire overtly. They had therefore resorted to furtive bombings.

While a shadowy group called 'the Front for the Liberation of Lebanon from Foreigners' has claimed responsibility for the blasts in several anonymous telephone calls, the PLO maintains that the front is pure fiction and a cover for Israeli agents operating in Lebanon.

However, observers point out that the PLO has taken no retaliatory actions against Israel for the bombings — and that there are others whose grudges against the PLO could have motivated the bombings, including groups in Lebanon as well as some outside the country such as the Palestinian radicals of Damascus-based Sabri Banna.

Regardless of who is behind the bombings, the mood in Palestinian-controlled areas is tense, especially in the 'Tyre pocket' 19km north of Israel. The guerrillas manning checkpoints along the roads are even jumpier and more thorough in their car searches than they were during and immediately after the July offensive.

INVESTMENT INSURANCE INCREASING

Paris AN-NAHAR ARAB REPORT & MEMO in English No 45, 2 Nov 81 pp 5-6

[Article by Dr Paul Huygelen, development consultant: "Investment Insurance: The Beginnings of a Success Story"]

[Text]

Lebanon's National Investment Guarantee Corporation (NIGC) is beginning to come into its own as an element which is helping to generate new investment. An analysis last week of the policies underwritten by NIGC up to the end of last month showed that 108 companies are now covering investments in this country against war risks through the NIGC, with the risks including warlike operations of the type that continue to bedevil the Lebanese economy.

This is a remarkable development. Eighteen months ago and three years after NIGC was set up by Legislative Decree No 3 of 1977, only 17 policies had been underwritten and a mere 20 other applications were under review; the value of the investments covered by the spring of 1980 was some LL 75 million ($1 = LL 4.68); the present figure is LL 433 million.

The object of the NIGC is to guarantee, for a premium, new investments made after the effective date of Legislative Decree No 3, ie January 19, 1977. The term guarantee is used to distinguish NIGC's coverage of specific political risks from the insurance of commercial risks handled by private insurance companies in Lebanon. NIGC is an autonomous public body set up to cover damage caused by the turmoil that has occurred in Lebanon in the wake of the traumatic experience of many business concerns during the 1975/76 war.

NIGC was not created to cover such political risks as expropriation, nationalisation, and inconvertibility of currency. American companies investing in Lebanon can, however, cover these additional political risks through the US Overseas Private Investment Corporation (OPIC) since February 1981 (An-Nahar Arab Report & MEMO, February 16). Actually these risks are minimal in Lebanon at this stage.

Investments as described in the Decree are understood to comprise all fixed assets of commercial and industrial undertakings as well as those of social, health, and cultural establishments or of international or foreign diplomatic missions.

Protection of new investments is available on an equal footing to Lebanese and foreigners alike. It is not surprising therefore that the first policyholder was the British Bank of the Middle East, followed by other foreign concerns such as Proctor and Gamble, Honeywell Bull and the Moscow Narodny Bank. NIGC coverage is not available for housing, though it might be possible to cover new premises owned by embassies. At present, however, embassies have not approached NIGC, nor have other establishments such as the American University of Beirut. But the largest single group of policyholders are hospitals: four of them in Beirut and three in the Beqaa recently took out coverage for new equipment or modernisation projects.

Fixed assets covered by NIGC comprise not only such tangible elements as factory buildings, machinery and equipment, but also engineering studies related to new investments and, broadly speaking, all capitalised investments. However, licenses, patents and good will are not covered. Inventories, stock-in-trade, raw materials and supplies are also excluded from NIGC's coverage against war risks and warlike operations. Nevertheless, there are some specific exceptions for "strategic" parts such as spares for computers and spares for commercial aircraft. Additions to the list of strategic parts are negotiable.

Among the first local companies to take out coverage were a household gas bottling company, whose maximum stock level of new empty steel butane bottles proved acceptable under the term fixed assets, a producer of louvres, blinds and protective doors, and Middle East Airlines for spare parts for its Boeing aircraft. The list has since grown much longer. Indeed, the majority of the 108 current policy holders are local companies, notably the new Sohat mineral water bottling plant, investments of Coral Oil Company, the major expansion of Light Metal Products SAL for production lines to manufacture 12-ounce cans for beer and soft drinks, flour mills, confectionery manufacturers, etc. The new tower of The Arab Libyan Tunisian Bank SAL, the new Pepsi-Cola plant, the Sibline cement plan, and modernisations at the Chekka cement works (a new kiln), are other major investments that might have awaited rosier days in Lebanon if NIGC coverage had not been available.

While the existence and implementation of Decree No 3 of 1977 have had but a limited effect on bringing in new investments by foreign companies, it has greatly facilitated new investments by foreign entities already in the country. Moreover, it has encouraged other companies which were planning to move abroad to remain in the country. A case in point is that of a Lebanese manufacturer of artificial marble, produced under Italian license. He was planning to transfer his operation to Jordan but, thanks to the availability of NIGC coverage, remained in the Beqaa.

Several hospitals, wary of importing expensive advanced radiological equipment and other equipment, nevertheless went ahead after taking out NIGC coverage. Under NIGC coverage, all equipment is covered as from the moment it arrives at the Lebanese port or airport.

NIGC's success has reached the stage that several banks in Beirut decline long term loans for industrial expansion schemes unless the interested party agrees to contract a NIGC policy.

The annual premium is required to be set at the beginning of the year by governmental decree at the suggestion of the Minister of Finance. The minister is NIGC's sponsor and he acts after obtaining the opinion of the NIGC Board. By law, however, the premium shall not exceed 2 per mil of the guaranteed amount. Hence, up to the present the premium has been set year after year at 2 per mil. In view of double-edged inflation – imported inflation on equipment and inflation generated locally on real estate and buildings – consideration is being given by NIGC to adjust every six months, the value of guaranteed investments to enable those covered to continue to be insured for a sum closer to the replacement value of the item covered.

NIGC has had only one claim up to now. It occurred in the early summer of 1981 when a confectioner's plant in Zahle sustained LL 212,000 of insured damage during artillery exchanges between militias and Syrian Army. Under its policies NIGC is required to compensate those losses exceeding 5 per cent of the aggregate amount covered. If the NIGC policy covers only part of the value of the insured asset, the policyholder shall be considered self-insured for the remaining part and, consequently, has to assume a prorated part of the damage.

As more and more local and foreign companies become aware of the coverage available under NIGC policies, there is no doubt that new investments will increase as, indeed, has been proven by the substantial increase in policyholders over the past few months.

MEA CONSULTANT INTERVIEWED ON AIRLINE'S TROUBLES

Paris AN-NAHAR ARAB REPORT & MEMO in English No 45, 2 Nov 81 pp 6-8

[Interview with George Carayan, industrial adviser to MEA's Chairman Asad Nasr, by Bisharah Barudi; date and place not given]

[Text]

World airlines have been sustaining huge losses in the past two years and airline representatives have been hearing bleak forecasts for the near future at a meeting in Cannes last week of the International Air Transport Association (IATA). Lebanon's Middle East Airlines is no exception to the general rule and, in addition, has had to cope with other difficulties such as the closure for three years earlier this year of Beirut International Airport because its runways were being shelled. MEA's shareholders last week approved a move to raise the company's capital from LL 100 million ($1 = LL 4.68) to LL 150 million to strengthen the company's financial base. But MEA faces yet another challenge: on October 19, the Lebanese government almost doubled the price of jet fuel. The move comes at a time when MEA confronts a crucial decision on replacing its present fleet of aircraft with European Airbuses.

The increase in jet fuel prices will almost certainly lead to higher fares and freight charges, according to MEA's George Carayan in an interview with An-Nahar Arab Report & MEMO's Bisharah Barudi. Mr Carayan, who is Industrial Adviser to MEA's Chairman Asad Nasr, sets out how the airline plans to meet the multiple challenges it now faces. The interview follows:

Q: How much will the latest increase in the price of jet fuel add to MEA's operating costs?

A: The cost per 100 gallons of jet fuel at the refinery was LL 200.24, not including the cost of transport. With this new law, it has gone up to LL 493.23, an increase of about 90 per cent. To this price, we normally add something like 15 to 18 per cent for the cost of transport and drivers' fees. Basically, this means a difference for us of between 18 million and LL 20 million between October 19, when the decree came into effect, and the end of this year. The fuel bill will increase by that much.

For 1982, our fuel bill will increase to between LL 90 million and LL 100 million. We are doing things about this. We are contacting the authorities to find a way to recover some of the additional cost. But if we do succeed, whatever we do will only be a partial success and, obviously, we will not be able to get back all of the increase in our costs.

Q: I take that to mean that you were not warned in advance of plans to raise the price of jet fuel?

A: No. Except for what could be gathered from the newspapers, it was a complete surprise. But there was no indication of what the authorities were planning. Otherwise, we would have discussed it with them. I don't think any of us was aware of the extent of the increase, even though one or two of us had received indications that the authorities might review prices. As I said, this is such a big problem for us that I am sure we would have discussed it beforehand at our meetings (if we had known about it) in order to determine what effect it would have just as we have done since the decree was promulgated.

Q: How will the extra cost of jet fuel affect your operations? Will you keep operating at the present level or would you cancel some flights, reduce the frequency of some services and reconsider some others?

A: Not really. We will still be operating on the same routes, although it might affect one or two of our weak sectors. We review the profitability of the sectors every three months in order to know whether they pay their variable costs. We categorise our sectors into those that cover variable costs only and those which cover variable costs plus other costs. One or two sectors which are today marginal could become completely uneconomic. The only way that we can recover some of this extra cost is to pass it on to the passengers.

Q: That was going to be my next question. How will the new fuel costs affect fares? Aren't you bound by IATA fare scales?
A: I think we are allowed to increase fares because of currency problems. So I am sure this would come into that category of fare increase.

Q: In the past, when you calculated your fares and notified IATA or when IATA decided what fares should be, did you make a provision for a possible increase in the price of jet fuel to world levels in view of the fact that jet fuel prices in Lebanon were well below those of other countries so that a future increase would be approved by IATA?
A: In fact, it is the airlines belonging to IATA which decided on fare increases following the increases in the price of OPEC oil. There is no need for IATA to be told what the cost differential is in Beirut because a decision to raise air fares to and from Beirut would involve all airlines serving Beirut and it is not an MEA decision. We have an association of carriers using Beirut which will analyse the situation. MEA will probably sponsor the increase in fares and the association and all the airlines operating to Beirut will agree on them. Then the fares will be published and IATA will accept them.

Q: When jet fuel prices were relatively cheap in Beirut, were the airlines taking advantage of this?
A: We all have fuel management control by which the airlines decide where to lift their fuel on the basis of their contracts with the fuel companies. An arrangement that MEA might have with Mobil may not be the same as that of British Airways with the same company. If, because of the price structure, it pays British Airways to pick up its fuel at Timbuctoo, it will do so. But it may not pay MEA to do the same.

Q: This is therefore a problem for your planning department?
A: Absolutely.

Q: Could the planning department improve the profitability of some routes by linking them?
A: I don't think you can overcome the problem by linking two marginal sectors. Normally, you link a strong station or sector with a weak sector. When you link two weak sectors you increase the unprofitability.

Q: Could you specify how much the increase in fares will be?
A: Well, obviously, we must try to pass on as much as we can of the increase in fuel prices to passengers. The actual increase will be calculated as a percentage of an average fare. Whether the full percentage is passed on is a matter of commercial policy, which is the domain of our commercial or marketing department. It will assess whether the market can absorb at one go the percentage that is derived from the increase in the price of fuel. On an issue like this, we normally bring in the Chairman after it has been thoroughly thrashed out by executives and the Chairman makes the final decision.

Q: Is it now true that you have a fairly strong position as the only Lebanese passenger airline?
A: For the time being, we do have a captive market. As you know, we are one of the few airlines operating into Beirut and we have joint operations with practically all the European carriers. We have them with Alitalia, Swissair, Lufthansa and Iberia and we are now negotiating to cover the London route with British Airways. We have all of the Gulf routes with Gulf Air. We also have joint operations to Athens with Olympic Airways based on a pooling formula in which they share costs and revenues. So, because of these arrangements, we do have a captive market. But we still have to convince our partners about the decisions we take because these affect them in the long run.

Q: You mentioned joint operations with British Airways to London. There have been difficulties over traffic rights to London. What has been done about this?
A: We still have a problem there. We think the negotiations will take place on a governmental level before the end of the year. The two airlines are studying various possibilities and the one that seems most attractive is a joint operation with MEA making a daily flight in accordance with a formula that would satisfy both British Airways and the British authorities.

Q: There has been talk of a merger between MEA and Trans Mediterranean Airways. Will the increase in fuel costs promote such a merger?
A: First of all, you must ask yourself whether it is a good thing to merge two companies that are both losing money – and here you have differing opinions. Is a merger the answer or would it further complicate the problem?

We are in constant touch with TMA and we are investigating various ways and means of cooperating with them which may or may not lead to a merger. Up until now, we have not found an ideal formula for both sides although each is trying very hard. There always seems to be something that one or the other does not like very much. It is finding a way to preserve the identities of both companies and preserving their traffic rights that is causing the most difficulty.

Q: Would they lose rights if they merge?
A: Traffic rights are not something that belong to a state. They have to be granted by another state. If, for instance, Britain does not want to grant us traffic rights, there is nothing we can do. True, Lebanon can reciprocate. But limits on traffic rights are not a question for which the companies are responsible. This is a matter for governments.

It is very difficult to merge two airlines. You have manpower problems and a duplication of effort. True, there are a lot of savings that can be made. But because labour is becoming our most expensive commodity – just about as expensive as fuel – you are really burdening the merged organisation with a tremendous manpower load, virtually an army.

Q: Is there more over-staffing at TMA than at MEA?
A: It is difficult to say whether there is over-staffing or not. We are introducing work measurement to find out where we are over-staffed. This is gradually producing results and showing us where we have more staff than is required. Then we can transfer staff from one section to another and train them. But it is a long process.

Q: What about your plans to renew MEA's fleet of aircraft? Will the higher fuel costs affect these plans?
A: The fuel price increase will expedite a decision (on renewing the fleet) because the new aircraft, the Airbus, has a much lower fuel consumption than the aircraft of the present fleet and therefore a decision to go ahead is now more attractive. All airlines need such aircraft to combat fuel price increases.

There is no problem about financing the Airbus deal. The arrangements that were made when a decision was taken on the Airbus are still in force. Because of the situation in Lebanon and the world-wide recession, what we are trying to do is to reinforce our financial position in order to go ahead with the Airbus deal. But the Airbus offer is there for us to accept.

We have said: "Wait a minute." We want to find ways of becoming stronger financially so that we can take up the Airbuses in a more happy frame of mind than that in which we find ourselves right now because of our losses. As you know, Intra has agreed to increase our capital by LL 50 million. This is a good way of showing the banks of the confidence our shareholders have in MEA. And there are one or two other steps which are being taken which we hope will enable us to confirm our Airbus order, which is due at the end of this month (October).

MEA SIGNS AIRBUS DEAL--Middle East Airlines has signed a $350 million contract for five wide-bodied European-built Airbus airliners, with an option on 14 others. The contract was signed by MEA Chairman Assad Nasr and Airbus Industrie General Manager Roger Beteille in Paris on October 30. The Beirut-based airline will equip the Airbuses with Pratt and Whitney engines. The deal includes spare engines and spare parts. Delivery will begin in the spring of 1984. The aircraft, which will seat 207 persons, including 24 first-class and 183 economy class passengers, will be more economical in terms of fuel costs than the Boeing 707s which form the bulk of MEA's present fleet. The signing of the deal was originally due to take place earlier this year, but was postponed as a result of the losses inflicted on the airline by security problems in Lebanon (AN-NAHAR ARAB REPORT & MEMO, May 11, October 10). U.S. THREAT--Addis Ababa, 16 Nov (JANA)--The Political Committee of the tripartite friendship and cooperation treaty between Ethiopia, Democratic Yemen and the Jamahiriyah will start its meeting here today. The three countries are represented in the committee by the secretary of the People's Committee of the foreign liaison bureau from the Jamahiriyah and the two ministers of foreign affairs for both Democratic Yemen and Ethiopia. The meeting is aimed at discussing the threats of the U.S. military manoeuvres currently taking place in the Arab region. Mr al-'Ubaydi, the Libyan foreign liaison secretary, said at his arrival in Addis Ababa, that the U.S.A. is trying to draw the attention of threats that do not exist in the region, in order to gain control over the Arab region and Africa, and to achieve its colonialist goals. He added if there is any threat to peace in the region, then its coming from America which undermines people's freedom. [Text] [LD161512 Tripoli JANA in English 1418 GMT 16 Nov 81]

OMAN MESSAGE TO CONGRESS--Tripoli, 16 Nov (JAMAHIRIYAH NEWS AGENCY)--The permanent secretariat of the Arab People's Congress received a cable from the Central Executive Committee of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Oman on the occasion of the emergency session of the Arab People's Congress. The text is as follows: "The emergency session of the Arab People's Congress in the Jamahiriyah is being held at a time when the Arab nation is witnessing a conflict between the revolutionary forces on the one hand and imperialist, Zionist and reactionary regimes in Sudan, Solamia and Oman on the other hand. The imperialist onslaught is gathering special momentum in the region with U.S. military manoeuvres operating freely in the region.... The U.S.A. is determined to subjugate the Arab nation and impose its hegemony on its resources. Furthermore, these military exercises, in addition to constituting a direct threat to progressive Arab regimes on whose borders the manoeuvres are taking place, threaten security and stability in the region. They represent an act of invasion against these countries and a prelude to actual occupation of Arab oil fields, especially those in the Arab Gulf Region and the Arab Peninsula. The Arab masses who reject subjugation and capitulationist settlements outlined by al-Sadat draw attention to your conference to urge you to take a staunch stand against the attack and to abort all capitulationist settlements in the Arab region." JAPANESE, FRENCH, SOUTH KOREAN FIRMS WIN DESALINATION CONTRACTS

Doha GULF TIMES in English 4 Nov 81 p 9

[Text]

Doha: Four international firms have been awarded contracts to complete the final extension to the Ras Abu Fontas desalination plant.

South Korea's Daelim Industrial Company has been given a QR210m contract to build reservoirs, a sweetwater intake and a pump house. The work is expected to be completed by the end of 1983.

A Japanese company Kubota will provide seawater pumps and associated equipment. It will also supply 16km water pipeline from Ras Abu Fontas to Doha, to be installed by Daelim.

A French firm Alsthom Atlantique will supply four 65-MW gas turbines to be delivered next year.

The contract for switchgear transformers and cables has gone to Pirelli Construction Company, a subsidiary of Britainn's Pirelli General Cable Works.

The contracts follow award of the main Ras Abu Fontas desalination contract worth QR450m to a Japanese company Sumitomo Heavy Industries in last August for supply of four waste-heat boilers and desalination units.

The plant has now eight units, producing a maximum 32m gallons of fresh water a day. After its extension the maximum capacity will be 48m gallons a day.

The expanded plant will be able to meet the state's water requirement up to 1986-87.

NEW REGULATIONS FOR IRRIGATED FARMING

Khartoum SUNA DAILY BULLETIN in English 25 Oct 81 pp 9-10

[Text] Khartoum, Oct 25 (SUNA)--Agriculture, Food and Natural Resources Minister Dr. Omer El Amin yesterday held a plenary meeting with the leaderships of farmers unions, directors of agricultural corporations and the technical committee for the application of the new relations of production in the irrigated sector. The meeting was also attended by the SSU Secretary of the Farmers Committee Abd El Galil Hassan Abd El Galeel. The minister explained the methods to be followed in applying the new relations of production in the irrigated projects as decreed by the president on June 1980. The decree abolishes the systems of partnership and joint account to be replaced by the individual account system.

The Minister said the implementation of the Presidential decree authorizes the state to collect fees in exchange of land rent and irrigation. The state will offer services and agricultural loans to the farmers but the cost will be deducted from the value of the produce leaving the net return to the farmer.

The Minister said the technical committee has estimated the cost of irrigation, management, equipment and interest on capital in the irrigated projects at L.s 87 million per year according to the prices in 1979-80. He added that the study by the technical committee showed that the state should collect fees on land rent and on irrigation in order to redeem this cost.

He said the Ministerial Committee decided to collect fees on pumps irrigated projects at 25% rate above the fees on Gezira Scheme. By so doing the state will bear a deficit of L.s 37 million. He added that the application of the individual account in the present conditions will result in a deficit of L.s 72 million. He explained that the state would bear the deficit with the aim of creating production incentives but the fees will be revised every two years.

The Minister assured that the application of the new relations of production is a correction of the course of the agricultural sector.

A meeting will be held next week after the farmers leaderships discuss the issue with their bases.

WORKERS PROTEST REJECTIONIST STANCE--Khartoum, Oct 25 (SUNA)--The delegation of the Sudan Workers Trade Unions Federation (SWTUF) walked out from the Arab Workers Association meeting in Aden, South Yemen in protest against the Arab rejectionist association's stance. Those associations blamed the SWTUF for its contacts with the Egyptian Workers Union and for offering condolences on late President Sadat's death. Workers associations in the rejectionist countries brought nominal associations into the meeting calling them "workers associations in-exile" in Jordan, North Yemen, Bahrain, Oman and Eritria, according to SWTUF's Foreign Affairs Secretary, Tag El Sir Abdoun. He said delegates from Morocco, Somalia, Mauritania, Tunisia, Djibouti and Egypt were not represented. SWTUF is currently contacting some Arab workers associations to set up another body keeping it away from rejectionist pressure and aimed at serving Arab workers, he added. BUS PURCHASE FROM SPAIN--Khartoum, Oct 29 (SUNA)--An agreement has been signed here yesterday between the Finance and National Planning Ministry and a Spanish car industry firm. The agreement provided for the purchase of 150 buses in addition to spare parts and other equipment to the value of $12.5 million. The agreement comes in the context of the loan extended from Spain to the government of Sudan. The Finance Under Secretary Osman El Shikh signed for the ministry and the firm's exportation director signed for the other side. The Kordofan Trading and Engineering Company will carry the task of executing this agreement. The director-general of Kordafan company said that the first batch of these buses that reach 30 buses will arrive here next March. The rest will be concluded during a five-month time from the date of the agreement signing. The 50-passenger-load buses will work in Khartoum province as well as in other regions, he added. MINISTER OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS DISCUSSES THWARTING U.S. PLANS

Kuwait AL-QABAS in Arabic 19 Aug 81 p 13

[Report on Interview with Faruq al-Shar', minister of State for Foreign Affairs by Khalil al-Taqiy; in Damascus; date of interview not specified: "Syria's Minister of State for Foreign Affairs Discusses Five Conditions To Thwart U.S., Israeli Plans in Lebanon; European Initiative Is Delusion, Presents Danger to U.S. Oil"]

[Text] In an interview with AL-QABAS Syria's minister of state for foreign affairs, Mr Faruq al-Shar' defined five basic measures that must be put into practice to confront the U.S.-Israeli plot in Lebanon. Al-Shar' said that the purpose of that plot was to liquidate the Palestinian Resistance, to engulf what can be engulfed in Lebanon and to impair Syria's steadfastness.

Regarding the objectives of the continued Israeli attack on Lebanon, al-Shar' added, "There are two points worth noting when one is engaged in any discussion about any Israeli military step after the Camp David accords."

"The first is the U.S. temporary success in taking Egypt out of the Arab-Israeli struggle by means of Israeli force and al-Sadat's submission. In other words, the U.S. administration is saying that since Israel was able to force al-Sadat's regime to capitulate, will it be difficult to force Lebanon to do the same?

"The second point is this: the racist and intricate relationship between the United States and Israel, according to which the Israeli soldier dies instead of the American soldier in order to execute the American plot and protect U.S. interests, must be countered not only by U.S. military and economic support for Israel, but also by U.S. acceptance of the fact that the United States is serving the goals of the expansionist and colonizing Zionist movement. At this stage these goals may be defined in the following points:

"1. Liquidating the Palestinian Resistance as a source of constant worry for Israel, and considering the Palestine Liberation Organization a terrorist organization that must be liquidated.

"2. Engulfing what can be engulfed in Lebanon, beginning with south Lebanon and avoiding at the same time keeping the heavily populated areas in the south, contrary to what happened in the Gaza Strip and in the West Bank.

"3. Impairing Syria's steadfastness and making it appear as though it were directly responsible for abandoning the protection of south Lebanon, despite the fact that the Arab deterrent forces are to be found only in al-Biqa', and this is in accordance with the wishes of the legitimate government in Lebanon.

"These Israeli-U.S. attempts are being made at a time when Syria has accomplished an honorable standing in its opposition to the imperialist, Zionist plot."

Five Measures for Opposition

In the course of his discussion Mr Faruq al-Shar' set forth the measures by which these objectives can be impeded.

He said, "The Israeli-U.S. plot in Lebanon requires the execution of five principal measures.

"1. More cohesion between the Palestinian Resistance, the Lebanese National Movement and Syria and as much coordination and deliberation between them as possible.

"2. Obviating the Zionist plot in Lebanon, whose roots go back to the early fifties immediately after Israel came into being, is an Arab responsibility. It is to be obviated with all the magnitude and capabilities of the Arab nation. It is not only a Syrian-Palestinian-Lebanese responsibility.

"3. Confronting the problem of some Lebanese forces dealing with Israel and settling that problem in favor of unifying Lebanon's territory and its people.

"4. Supporting the Lebanese National Movement's progressive programs of struggle and showing it as the body that truly expresses the hopes and the future of the Lebanese people.

"5. Unifying the factions of the Resistance within a single strategic objective for liberation is essential. Tactical steps are not to prevail over this objective because undue emphasis on these tactics causes more loss than it causes profit and could replace the strategic objective."

Evaluating the French Position in the Socialist Administration

Regarding the French position after the socialist faction assumed the top positions of power in France, he said, "It is premature to rely on a final evaluation of the new French position now that the socialists have taken over the government in France, especially since anyone who has been following the statements made by French socialist officials would perceive a clear contradiction in their policy. On the one hand they presented a major challenge to the U.S. administration in two fundamental matters.

"1. The communists' participation in the government, and this participation means that all U.S. statements made from Truman's administration and until Reagan's administration are invalidated.

"2. The French criticized U.S. economic policy bitterly, and they held Ronald Reagan's administration in particular responsible for the unemployment, the inflation and the economic slump in western Europe. This criticism was more bitter than the French criticism that was heard during the administration of the late President Charles De Gaulle, considering the brief period of time during which the socialists have been in power.

"On the other hand, however, the French socialists announced through President Francois Mitterand and his minister of foreign affairs, Claude Cheysson that they considered the Camp David accords a step forward toward a comprehensive settlement and that the destruction of these accords can only come from those who believe that the solution will come about as a result of an all-out war."

Mr Faruq al-Shar' added, "In our view Camp David is one of the agreements that, on the one hand, provides the most encouragement for the course of war and, on the other, firmly establishes the capitalist regime.

"The area has not experienced tension and volatility of such proportions as those it has been experiencing since the Camp David accords were signed. The world did not go back to the cold war until after the Camp David accords were signed. A rightist expansion of that magnitude did not take place in Israel and in Egypt until after the Camp David accords were signed.

"As far as western Europe is concerned, U.S. economic control [of Europe], which the socialists of France are rejecting, can be achieved by the catalytic effects of the Camp David accords.

"A mere quick overview of the economies of western Europe would indicate quite clearly that since Camp David unemployment has been getting worse and growth rates have been declining more than they were before the Camp David accords.

"Finally, Camp David, which means that the United States will have access, free of competition to the resources of the Arab homeland, will most certainly not serve the interests of an independent European economy; [it will not ensure] the independence which the socialists of France are seeking.

"One of the United States' primary motivations for signing the Camp David accords and refusing the participation of any other international parties concerned about peace was to keep the Middle East area a permanent seat of tension and a factor in upsetting the international balance [of power] on the one hand. On the other hand, the United States wants to control oil exports to the industrial countries and to steer them in a manner that is consistent with the U.S. economy, at the expense of the European economy.

Three Maps for the Middle East

Mr al-Shar' said the following about Arab and international reality:

"As a matter of fact there is more than one map for the area. There is an American map whose lines have been drawn and whose objectives and tools were revealed in the Camp David accords. This map is not new as some people believe it is. Its early lines appeared when oil was discovered in the Arabian Peninsula and U.S. corporations acquired the first concession in 1933. This concession remains in effect till 1999. Most U.S. administrations that came into office since World War II have also played a principal role in realizing the Camp David map. The Truman administration outmaneuvered Britain and applied pressure to it to allow Jews to immigrate to Palestine and to give them the right to own property there. In Eisenhower's administration, during the tri-partite aggression against Egypt in 1956, the Americans discovered Israel's military importance and the extent to which it would comply with their wishes. In Johnson's administration the Americans tested Israel's strength in June 1967. Under Kissinger they put the diplomacy of power into practice and achieved the Sinai agreement in 1975. In Carter's administration they utilized the power of diplomacy to get al-Sadat to Jerusalem, to Camp David and then to the [rose] garden in the White House to announce proudly his capitulation in front of Begin, Carter and the whole world.

"If we wanted to sum up the American map of the area in one sentence, we would say that it represents a U.S. attempt to control singlehandedly the resources of the Arab world and to dominate its general strategic location as well by means of subjugating one Arab regime after the other. This would be done by Israel which has the most advanced U.S. weapons and is the most extreme country in its belief in racism and Nazism.

Mr Faruq al-Shar' added, "To make up for that there is an Arab map whose boundaries are those of the Steadfastness and Confrontation Front and the factions of the Arab Liberation Movement. It has a broad popular base in the Arab homeland, the support of liberation movements in the Third World and the backing of the socialist camp, especially the Soviet Union. It is also joined in solidarity by the progressive labor unions in the west and by all those who love peace and freedom in the world. This front, the Steadfastness and Confrontation Front is placing itself in the trenches opposite imperialism and Zionism. Its view of the future of the area contradicts that which appears in the Camp David map.

"There is also another map which is not as clear as the two former maps. Those who drew that map cannot accept the Camp David map which depicts their land, their resources and their dignity as targets of Zionists and racists. This is because the Zionists and racists view them as Red Indians, relics of the Middle Ages and, according to Menahem Begin, they are thought to have one of the most backward regimes in the world. On the other hand, the people who drew this map do not want to break their ties with the United States."

Regarding the struggle among the three contradictory maps, Mr al-Shar' said, "The Reagan administration will continue to stick by Camp David, but it will not be able to reap its rewards. The proposition that the United States should have no rivals in the area has been rejected among Arabs and in the international community even before U.S. allies in the western industrial countries rejected it. U.S. allies in western industrial countries realized that the unrivaled presence of the United States in the area would affect their own economic interests before affecting the interests of the Soviets.

"World War I and World War II broke out between competing capitalist regimes and not between regimes with conflicting ideologies. Furthermore, we are saying that the question of Israel's survival with its racist and Nazi tendencies is a question that is not to be confronted by the Arabs only. It must be confronted by the whole world because of the dangers that could ensue [and affect] the Arabs and the world. Hitler's racism and Nazism brought ideological enemies together to resist this Nazi threat.

"All attempts emerging in the area to embark on a struggle lie basically in the possibility of winning over the party [that drew] the third map, by virtue of U.S. oil interests on the Arab scene. Since the United States is producing no results in its efforts to persuade these regimes to form an alliance with Israel, it is trying very hard to establish a direct alliance between it and these regimes under the slogan of resisting the communist threat and ignoring the Zionist threat.

"If ideologically contradictory regimes formed an alliance during World War II to oppose Hitler's Nazi expansion, it goes without saying and it would be more realistic for different Arab regimes to form an alliance against a racist Zionist expansion. All U.S. attempts seeking to alienate the Arabs from their friends, the Soviets, would consequently fail, and those involved in this U.S. plot would pay a high price."

Conditions for Thwarting the U.S. Plot

Mr al-Shar' defined the conditions that are required to thwart and to do away with the U.S. strategy.

"What is required first before any other consideration is made is further Arab solidarity against the Zionist threat, which is the real and basic threat to all the Arab countries, regardless of these countries' being confrontation or support countries and regardless of their being progressive or conservative.

"What is required second is more cooperation from the socialist camp, and especially the Soviet Union. The delusion that is being promoted by the United States that the Soviet Union is making preparations to invade the oil wells must be dispelled. At the same time, it is the United States that is waiting for opportunities to execute this invasion. The example we use [to back up this statement] lies in the rapid deployment forces. It is known that the Soviet Union has large reserves of oil in its territory and that it exports some of this oil. A simple comparison between Arab oil reserves at [current] high pumping rates and planned Soviet consumption of oil affirms that Arab oil will be depleted years before Soviet oil is.

"All the information that is being promoted by the Central Intelligence Agency about the Soviet Union's need for oil in the mid-eighties is misleading, and its purpose is to emphasize the "Soviet threat."

The European Initiative

Regarding the European initiative al-Shar' said, "The European position is linked with the position of conservative countries. On the one hand, Europeans are apprehensive about the United States' absolute singlehandedness in the Middle East area because European industry in this case would be at the mercy of Americans. To put it more clearly, if U.S. unilateral control in the area succeeds, Europeans expect their exports to be restricted in accordance with the needs of U.S. industry. Americans would not have to resort then to negotiations or agreements to limit the quantities of oil exported to western Europe and Japan. On the other hand, Europeans do not want to thwart U.S. efforts or expose them to a serious setback in the area because they realize the negative consequences that are possible if these efforts should fail. Hence we find that the Europeans are faced with two difficult choices. They are not behind Camp David 100 percent, nor are they against it. And here we must mention that the Arab position will have an extremely significant negative or positive impact on the U.S. position.

"A careful, meticulous reading of Europe's Venice Declaration proves this. On the one hand, Europeans recognize the existence of the PLO, and they recognize the right of the Arab people of Palestine to determine their destiny. On the other hand, we find them refusing to give the PLO full recognition. Europeans are placing restrictions on their understanding of the right of self-determination. Therefore, we are not expecting a European initiative with clear goals and principles any time soon.

Commenting on statements which Menahem Begin, the prime minister of Israel made after the victory of the Likud bloc in Israel's recent elections in which he announced that he was not prepared to give up the occupied Golan Heights, Mr Faruq al-Shar' said, "We must recall what Begin himself said after his party won the ninth elections in [the history of] the Knesset in 1977. He announced then that he was prepared to return Sinai and the Golan in accordance with bilateral agreements. At that time our immediate response in Syria was Jerusalem must be returned before the Golan Heights. It was natural for Begin after his recent victory in the elections, and after the Syrian Arab rejection of unilateral or bilateral solutions to announce that he would not return the Golan, not even with a bilateral agreement. This was an expression of the despair and the failure to draw Syria into the U.S.-Israeli settlement, especially after President Hafiz al-Asad announced at the 15th session of the Palestine National Council that Palestine is to be regained before the Golan."

PARATROOPERS' TRAINING COURSE DISCUSSED

Damascus AL-BA'TH in Arabic 5 Oct 81 p 5

[Article by Ahmad Qardan: "AL-BA'TH Looks Into the Graduation of the Third Paratroop Class of 7500 Youth; 73 Days Required in the Heroes' Factories for Paratroop Training"]

[Text] In view of the Arab Socialist Ba'th Party's interest in and the concern of the secretary general, President Hafiz al-Asad for the Revolutionary Youth Federation, and because of his desire to educate them intellectually and physically, paratroop jumping courses were established.

For that purpose, five camps were equipped. The Al-Mazhah al-Khalil paratrooping camp for youth, named after a martyr paratrooper, and four others were prepared to receive the young comrades. They were also equipped with everything required for military training and preparing them intellectually, politically, socially and culturally. That requires a large number of special rooms, training areas, landing areas, paved roads, as well as barracks equipped with means of ensuring mental and physical rest for the course personnel. In addition, highly-skilled and knowledgeable officers were assigned to draw up plans and programs to prepare them, through serious, resolute and continuous training, to plunge into every battle required of them and to qualify them to stand up against the foes of the party, the revolution and the nation.

Undoubtedly, behind every action is a goal. If the action is significant, then certainly the goal will be even more significant. A few days ago we saw a multitude of young Ba'thist men and women venturing upon significant actions, whose goal was to add another brilliant page to the brilliant achievements of the Revolutionary Youth Organization. They are joined by 7500 other young men and women who are aware of their nation's decisive issues and battles, believe in the immortal message of the Ba'th Party, and are anxious to liberate the Arab will and restore the Arab Nation's former culture and glory.

This glorious work was achieved thanks to the great interest and tireless work of the glorious party leadership, its secretary general, Comrade Hafiz al-Asad, and the leadership of the Revolutionary Youth Federation who prepared them mentally and polished them through strenuous military courses and training in various types of light and heavy weapons. The youth was given guidance through lectures in all social, cultural, political and military fields by trained comrades and experts, who spared no effort to provide the Arab nation with a generation fully aware of the goals of the Arab Socialist Ba'th Party.

Behind the activities that we saw on Youth Day, 1 October 1981, when the young men and women comrades displayed their physical capabilities and their resolute countenances, one could evidence a lot of self-confidence and iron wills, a complete understanding of the Arab nation's causes, and a determination to achieve its goals to liberate the land and achieve a unified socialist Arab society, free from backwardness and imperialism.

The Course Taught Me a Great Deal

In our meeting with a young paratrooper, Comrade Usamah Mustafa Rajub, from the Idlib branch, he said: "I volunteered for the course. This course taught me a lot about things I was ignorant of, especially in military, social and political fields. The spirit of cooperation was instilled in us, and love of country was taught to us, along with the way to bear difficulties through strict training. How I wish that this course was longer, so that I could make more than the five parachute jumps that I did make. Despite that, we have become qualified to fulfill any mission in defense of the nation's honor and the accomplishments of the revolution and the party, thanks to the instructors' interest in preparing us."

We then met with a young woman paratrooper, Lama Rifa't al-Asad. She said: "The Arab youth group has undergone a great experience. It is also excellent in all its phases and goals."

Comrade Lama referred to the course's importance. "It was a combination of military and physical training and intellectual, mind-building national education, so that at the end of the course, a well-rounded person would graduate, with a good knowledge of doctrine and with a healthy, strong physique."

Comrade Lama added: "This course trained us, through instructors who made fantastic efforts, in various types of heavy and light weapons. We gained a lot of expertise in driving various combat vehicles and had difficult training in ground parachute jumping, preparatory to the commando course and the actual jump by parachute from the most modern military aircraft that had a minimum speed of 500 km per hour.

"I call on all youth groups in the Arab nation, especially the young women comrades, to take these training courses, because they enhance the woman's position and contribute to liberating her from the darkness of the past."

Comrade Lina Mahfuz is from the Damascus branch, the al-Mazra'ah league. She said: "I was nominated by the al-Mazra'ah league at my own desire and with the encouragement of my family and friends. I joined the course on 19 July 1981. From the first day, without relaxation or deviation, we began our training in close combat and close order drills, stripping down various weapons and firing them, and setting ambushes for the enemy, in addition to difficult ground training in parachute jumping and tactics. We also received valuable lectures in cultural, social, military and political subjects, qualifying us to take part side by side with the men in defense of the country and its honor, and to safeguard the gains of the party and revolution."

She added: "I am very pleased today, because I have fulfilled my wish for a sixth jump, with full field dress and live ammunition, in front of the leader of our destiny and the symbol of our people's unity, Comrade President Hafiz al-Asad."

We Trained a Minimum of 12 Hours a Day

The young comrade paratrooper, Samir Dhahir, from the Idlib youth branch, the city league, said: "I am extremely pleased that I took this course, especially parachute jumping, which we did with confidence and bravery and without fear, because we had trained, during the short time we were in the course, in all types of parachute jumps and in the strenuous and difficult ground movements, without deviation or relaxation. Each day we trained for 12 hours or more, apart from the day and night marches and the diversified lectures which instilled in us affection for the country and defense of the homeland."

The Course Made Me a New Person

A young woman paratrooper, Comrade Raja' Ahmad Zammam, from the Homs branch, the Tishrin league, said: "I was nominated by the league, and I am grateful to my family who praised my idea of taking the paratrooper course, because these courses deepen the spirit of cooperation and love of country, and foster a commitment to the goals and principles of the glorious party and to achieving unity and socialism. Indeed, the training we had throughout the 73 days, in various kinds of arms and the educational lectures, changed me to a person capable of confronting all the traitors, plotters and persons who violate the security and peace of the country and the goals of the party and revolution."

We spoke with Comrade Muhammad Hasan Jabur, one of the youngest comrades who took the course. "I am 14 years old, in the ninth grade of al-Shaghur school in Damascus. I asked to be nominated, because of my desire to join. I joined the course with my comrades. We had training in various types of light and heavy weapons, and I was taught to drive some combat vehicles, hand-to-hand combat and mine-laying.

"I am now ready for any emergency, like any Ba'thist soldier, to defend the gains and accomplishments of the revolution, and to stand fast against the agents and traitors who want only evil for our country."

Young paratrooper Comrade Haytham Muhammad Ka'di, from the Jablah league, discussed the course and its goals. He said: "These courses are necessary for the country's youth because of the physical training we received, as well as the military and intellectual preparation that will undoubtedly qualify us to fearlessly confront the nation's enemies and that will create a generation conscious of and fully understands our glorious party's goals, under the leadership of its secretary general, Comrade Hafiz al-Asad."

Next, a young woman paratrooper, Comrade Siham Tawfan, from the Tartus branch, stressed the need to offer these courses to all the school youth groups and to make them compulsory as any other subject in the curriculum, because of their positive contribution to education, physical fitness, military, political and social education, creating high morale and self-confidence. She also thanked the instructors for the great efforts they made during the difficult training in various kinds of light and heavy weapons, in parachute jumping, and for the emphasis on discipline and order.

Comrade Wafa' Muhsin al-Mahmud of the Hama branch said: "I joined the course impulsively, as a comrade eager to defend the country and our party's goals. This course increased our experience in many fields, and gave us a spirit of love and cooperation among all comrades. Difficulties can be overcome when we cooperate together. This course also raises the morale of Arab women, by giving them endurance and courage, and by teaching them to bear unflinchingly all the strenuous training that we received without fear or boredom of the training in weapons, ground parachute and the actual jump from the most modern, large and high-speed aircraft."

A young woman paratrooper, Comrade Hind Sa'd from Tartus said: "I am less fortunate than my comrades, because I did not take part in the practical demonstration which was held on 1 October, in the presence of our leader, President Hafiz al-Asad. Our number was very large, amounting to about 7500 paratroopers, which required a large number of aircrafts. Despite that, I am proud of what we have gained from the training in arms and vehicles, and the lectures we received, which helped us overcome much of our ignorance of their activities and subjects, and which also instilled in us love for the nation and our leader."

GOVERNMENT STUDIES POTENTIAL STOCK, BOND MARKET

Paris AN-NAHAR ARAB REPORT & MEMO in English No 45, 9 Nov 81 p 12

[Text]

The UAE government is studying the feasibility of setting up a bond market and a stock exchange in Abu Dhabi, according to Jouan Salim, Undersecretary of the UAE Ministry of Finance. Mr Salim told the Dubai daily Khaleej Times in an interview last week that the government wanted to expand the UAE's financial market, which is at present very small. "We feel the capital market in the UAE is second to oil in importance," he said. "There are many positive and favourable factors which can help us improve it."

Mr Salim said the UAE government had been offering banks and other financial institutions attractive incentives because "we are keen to improve the efficiency of our banking system. We hope to become another important financial centre in the Gulf, in addition to Bahrain." Banks and finance houses should take "aggressive steps" to enter financial markets, he added.

Mr Salim said the recent introduction of Certificates of Deposit (CDs) had been a step in the right direction and CDs were being purchased large numbers of small investors in the UAE. "By having such issues," he declared, "we can attract small investors to channel their savings through commercial banks in a more profitable way, instead of simply opening deposit accounts ... which they earn very low interest."

Development of the CD as an instrument of investment was being watched with interest by the government, according to Mr Salim. Its performance would be the key to future financial market ventures that could pave the way for still more sophisticated opportunities for investors. "We hope that in future more commercial paper and floating rate notes will enter the market," Mr Salim said. "This could be followed by the establishment of bond and stock exchange markets in the UAE."

Among the possibilities under study, Mr Salim said, was the creation of a market in securities issued by companies not listed on the stock exchange because this would both enhance the efficiency of the market and provide other ways of attracting the savings of UAE nationals. This was the only way to minimise hoarding of cash and other misuses of money, he said.

Mr Salim claimed that the UAE was in a strong position as a potential financial market by virtue of its geographical location, excellent means of communication and immense financial liquidity. Besides, he added, it was not difficult to mobilise the required skill and manpower. "Hence, we don't see any reason why our financial market should be inferior to those in other countries... If we properly make use of the favourable factors, in addition to our oil, we can develop an important financial market in the UAE."

PROVISIONAL CONSTITUTION EXTENDED 5 YEARS

Abu Dhabi EMIRATES NEWS in English 29 Oct 81 p 1

[Text]

AL AIN (WAM): The Supreme Council decided to extend the present provisional Constitution of the UAE by another five years from December 2, 1981.

The Council, consisting of Rulers of the seven emirates met at Al Maqam Palace here, with His Highness President Sheikh Zayed bin Sultan Al Nahyan, presiding. It decided to amend Article 144 of the provisional constitution to extend its life. The provisional constitution came into force December 2, 1971.

The Supreme Council agreed to consider other amendments to the constitution later, taking into account the interests of the federation and the national aspirations.

Following the Rulers' meeting, President Sheikh Zayed issued a Federal decree, summoning the Federal National Council to meet in an emergency sitting on Tuesday, November 3, to complete the constitutional procedures in this regard.

The Supreme Council also discussed several internal and external issues.

Following is the text of the President decree:

"We, Zayed bin Sultan Al Nahyan, President of the United Arab Emirates; after taking cognisance of Articles 78 and 144 of the provisional Constitution and what has been submitted by the Council of Ministers and approved by the Cabinet.

Hereby issue the following decree:

Article 1

The Federal National Council be summoned to convene on Tuesday, Moharam 1402 Hijri, cor. November 3, 1981 in an emergency sitting to consider the draft amendment to the Constitution placed before FNC by the Federal Supreme Council. The sitting shall conclude as soon as the said draft amendment it considered.

Article 2

The Prime Minister shall implement this decree, which should be published in the official gazette.

Zayed bin Sultan Al Nahyan
President of the United Arab Emirates.

Issued by us at the Presidential palace in Abu Dhabi on 30 Zul Haja 1401 H., cor. October 28, 1981."

The meeting was attended by Sharjah Ruler His Highness Sheikh Sultan bin Mohamed Al Qassimi; Ras Al Khaimah Ruler His Highness Sheikh Saqr bin Mohamed Al Qassimi; Ajman Ruler His Highness Sheikh Humaid bin Rashid Al Nuaimi Umm Al Quwain Ruler His Highness Sheikh Rashid bin Ahmed Al Mualla; Fujeirah Ruler His Highness Sheikh Hamad bin Mohamed Al Sharqi; and Dubai Crown Prince and Deputy Prime Minister Sheikh Maktoum bin Rashid.

Ras Al Khaimah Crown Prince and Deputy Ruler Sheikh Khalid bin Saqr Al Qassimi; Deputy Prime Minister Sheikh Hamdan bin Mohamed, Finance and Industry Minister Hamdan bin Rashid; and Minister of State for Supreme Council Affairs Abdul Aziz bin Humaid Al Qassimi participated in the meeting.

FIGURES SHOW JAPAN FOREMOST SOURCE OF IMPORTS, FOLLOWED BY UNITED STATES

Dubai AL-BAYAN in Arabic 15 Sep 81 p 2

/Article: "Dubai's Imports for 5 Months Total 8,436 Billion Dirhams"/

/Text/ There has been a noticeable rise in Dubai's imports during the first 5 months of this year compared with the same period last year. They totaled 8.436 billion dirhams at the end of May 1981, having been 7.890 billion dirhams at the end of May 1980, a rise of 6.9 percent.

The latest figures of the Department of Ports and Customs in Dubai show that industrial goods lead imports, totaling 3.247 billion dirhams from the beginning of the year to the end of May, that is, 38.5 percent of total imports during this period.

In second place are automobiles and transport equipment with a total value of 2.215 billion dirhams, that is, 26.3 percent.

Foodstuffs occupy third place with a total value of 1.333 billion dirhams, 15.8 percent of the total.

Raw materials and chemicals come at the end of the list of imports with a value of about 276 million dirhams for an insignificant 3.3 percent of the total.

With regard to the sources of these imports, we find Japan holding an uncontested lead with total exports of 1.742 billion dirhams, that is, about 21 percent of Dubai's total imports during the first 5 months of this year.

The United States is in second place with a total share of 1.044 billion dirhams or about 12 percent.

The United Kingdom takes third place with a 922 million dirham share, that is about 11 percent.

Bahrain occupies fourth place with a 569 million dirham share of Dubai's imports, about 7 percent, mostly petroleum byproducts.

Fifth place is held by West Germany with 375 million dirhams, that is, 4.4 percent.

Singapore comes next with a share amounting to 371 million dirhams or 4.3 percent.

Dubai gets the rest of its imports from 100 other countries spread throughout the various continents of the world.

HUNGARIAN ALUMINUM SALE UNDERSCORES POSSIBLE FUTURE COOPERATION

Abu Dhabi EMIRATES NEWS in English 3 Nov 81 p 3

[Text] ABU DHABI (EN): Trial orders for 300 tons of Hungarian aluminium products worth of 750,000 dollars have been placed by merchants in Dubai and Abu Dhabi with the Budapest-based Hungarian Aluminium Corporation.

This was disclosed here by the managing director of the corporation Ferenc Kaszas who was among the five-member Hungarian aluminium delegation which ended a six-day visit to the UAE yesterday.

The aluminium goods for which orders have been placed include circles, coils, extrusion billets besides anodised aluminium products, Kaszas told the Emirates News before leaving for Kuwait yesterday.

Kaszas said the delegation's visit to the UAE had three aims: (1) to look into the possibility of establishing joint venture and to find out how Hungary could cooperate in the development of aluminium industry in this country; (2) to take part in projects of higher grade of vertical structure; (3) to offer to supply customers here with extruded billets for architectural purposes and for doors and windows production.

During the Dubai visit the delegation visited the Dubai aluminium smelter and two other companies dealing in aluminium products.

Kaszas said the delegation told to the Dubai parties, which he did not name, that Hungary would be interested in organizing joint ventures, either based on production from its semi-finished products or assembling prefabricated finished products, in this country.

In Abu Dhabi, also, the delegation had "very interesting" discussions with one large company, which Kaszas would not identify for erecting a workshop or factory to produce doors and windows in a Third World country.

As a result of his visit here, another big company has asked the experts from the Hungarian Aluminium Corporation to make a feasibility study and conduct market research within this year for selling Hungarian finished products with joint participation besides studying the possibility of erecting a factory for assembling Hungarian prefabricated elements in Abu Dhabi.

Meanwhile secretary of the Arab-Hungarian Chamber of Commerce Gabor Vida, who was in the Hungarian delegation said he had renewed the invitation to president of Abu Dhabi Chamber of Commerce and Industry Saeed Ahmed Al Otaiba by the Hungarian Chamber of Commerce vice-president Tamas Beck to visit Hungary at the head of a trade delegation.

Vida said his chamber's objective was the same as any other chamber in the world and that is to promote trade relations and to send businessmen into each other's country to consolidate trade and industry.

Giving his impressions of the six-day tour of the UAE, Vida told the Emirates News that the delegation found that the Gulf area was "very important."

"The Gulf is the most important market for us and particularly for our aluminium industry," Vida said. It was for this reason the chamber decided to send this "specialised mission" dealing with the aluminium industry.

The visit has enabled the delegation to sell different kinds of aluminium products. On its return home the delegation would be examining ways and means of how the corporation could join the two existing aluminium smelters based in Dubai and Bahrain.

Vida disclosed that the Hungarian Chamber of Commerce is keen on opening a representative office of the Chamber in the UAE. He said a request has been made to the concerned authorities and the Hungarian Ambassador to Kuwait Erno Horvath is likely to follow it up during his visit here.

"A permanent Hungarian presence for trade promotion in these markets is very important for us," Vida declared.

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE PROBLEMS DISCUSSED

Abu Dhabi EMIRATES NEWS in English 29 Oct 81 p 3

[Article by Ibrahim Ahmed: "Inadequate Staff, Data Blamed for UAE Chambers' Problems"]

[Text]

ABU DHABI (Ittihad): Chambers of Commerce and Industry in the country face serveral problems which prevent them from carrying out their responsibilities efficiently. The lack of accurate statistics on economic activities, the heavy burden on the boards of directors and the shortage in national technical cadres are some of the problems for which solutions are under way.

Director-General of Sharjah Chamber of Commerce and Industry Abdul Razak Al Hajiri believes that chambers of commerce should play a significant role in preserving the interests of its members and promoting cooperation between the private business community and the government.

Al Hajiri said that the chambers can be deemed successful if they succeed in attracting investors to contribute in industrial projects. But, this, he said, necessitates overcoming all problems which hinder the achievement of this goal.

He thinks that chambers have another significant role in solving the problems of their own members through arbitration panels instead of resort to litigation.

Nazar Sardast, Director-General of Dubai Chamber of Commerce, said that the chambers by their very structure represent commercial, industrial and economic interests of their members and provide consultancy for them but still they do not enjoy exectuve powers. Despite this fact, some members expect all their problems to be solved by the chambers.

Sadrast said that the federal law on commercial registration made it obligatory only for traders to prove their membership in a chamber of commerce. But this does not apply to industrialists whose activities are very important to the chamber, particularly when a study is to be conducted or data on them. Such problem of membership can be solved by introducing some amendments in the law.

The increasing responsibility of the members of board of directors is yet another problem and their participation in the meetings of several committees deprive them from effective participation, he said.

The non-Arab members and the big number of foreign workers constitute a special problem to Dubai Chamber of Commerce and Industry. This compels the chamber to use both Arabic and English and, sometimes even Asian languages in its correspondence and transactions, Sardast added.

The shortage of administrative staff of chambers cast a heavy pressure on the present chambers' employees particularly in regard to the issuing of certificates of origin, the endorsement of invoices, besides the registration of members and daily routine work, he said.

But Hassan bin Idris, Chief of the Foreign Relations Section in Sharjah Chamber of Commerce, said that lack of accurate data was the main problem of these chambers. And he thinks that any shortage of information is a big obstacle.

According to Al Hajiri of Sharjah Chamber, the problems are being sorted out and solutions are in the offing. Some steps in this regard will be taken by the Federation of Chambers of Commerce and Industry, with the assistance of legislative and administrative institutions in the country, he added.

He believes that economic research, the boosting of communication between chambers and their members, the strengthening of cooperation between local, Gulf and Arab chambers, the determination of the targets of all projects, the provision of adequate technical staff and funds would help chambers implement their objectives.

ALIEN LABOR REGULATIONS--Abu Dhabi (AL BAYAN)--The Ministries of Interior and Labour and Social Affairs are discussing the new procedures concerning security and organisation of foreign labour in the country. A reliable source told AL BAYAN that these procedures were discussed at the last meeting of the two ministries' officials which was attended by Labour and Social Affairs Minister Saif Al Jarwan and Minister of State for Interior Affairs Hamouda bin Ali. The proposed procedures make it obligatory for every labourer to obtain a written agreement from his sponsor for submission to the concerned authorities for permission to leave the country. The source disclosed that this issue was referred to a joint committee set up by the two ministries. The committee is expected to hold its first meeting next week for discussing the proposed procedures besides a number of issues including coordination between the two ministries concerning the tracing of absconded workers. OIL EXTRACTION RESEARCH CORPORATION--Abu Dhabi (WAM)--Yesterday's meeting of the Executive Council has approved a draft law for the establishment of Abu Dhabi National Corporation for Oil Extraction Research. The Corporation will carry out research in the field of oil extraction technology in order to adopt more developed techniques in the extraction of oil in the areas allocated for the operations of Abu Dhabi Company for Onshore Oil Operations (ADCO). The Executive Council also agreed to establish a department at Zayed Port to operate the containers terminal there. The Council also approved to nominate specialised consultant companies to study the road traffic problems in Al Ain city and advise on the proper solutions and the problems likely to occur in the future. Further, the council approved construction of labourers' quarters at Al Mahir, Khazna and Al Arabe regions as well as the establishment of an agricultural guiding centre at Al Khazna. The meeting was held under its chairman Crown Prince Sheikh Khalifa bin Zayed. [Text] [Abu Dhabi EMIRATES NEWS in English 2 Nov 81 p 1]

FOREIGN WORKERS OUTNUMBER UAE WORKERS--Statistics in the UAE show that none of its nationals work in the mineral industry which absorbs 208 workers, including five of Arab nationalities and 203 of foreign nationalities. The same figures show that there is a total of 445 UAE workers in the oil extraction and refining sector compared with 2,487 Arabs anp 64 foreigners. Compared with this small proportion of UAE citizens in these sectors, they are overwhelmingly present in the maritime operations sector which absorbs 138 citizens, 33 Arab nationals and 27 foreign nationals. An overall look at all industrial sectors, including water and electricity, shows a total of 918 UAE workers as compared with 3,269 Arab nationals and 3,010 foreign nationals. /Text/ /Paris AL-MUSTAQBAL in Arabic No 242, 10 Oct 81 pp 47-48/ 8389

MASSIVE NEW GULF INSURANCE, REINSURANCE VENTURE FORMED

Dubai AL-BAYAN in Arabic 21, 24 Oct 81

/Article by 'Ali Ibrahim: "The Story of the Birth of the First Arab Insurance Leviathan"/

/21 Oct 81 p 3/

/Text/ Any company that wants to engage in economic activity can enter the market for the first time in two ways: either by infiltrating quietly and without commotion and implanting its presence step by step, or by invading the market in the midst of a commotion that stirs up great clamor, meaning, at the same time, that the entry will be strong from the beginning.

The Arab Insurance Group chose the latter way to begin its activity, in the midst of a massive Arab and international insurance display in Bahrain last Saturday and Sunday, on the occasion of the official inauguration of its activity, in the presence of more than 700 heads of insurance companies, major investors and journalists from various areas of the world. The emirates were represented there by a delegation headed by Shaykh Hamdan ibn Rashid, minister of finance and industry, the contained Ahmad al-Tayir, assistant deputy minister of finance and the vice chairman of the group, and Ahmad Lutfi, manager of public relations in the ministry.

The story of the group began, specifically, in April 1980, when circles in international insurance organizations greeted the news of the signing by Libya, the emirates and Kuwait of a contract to establish a massive insurance and reinsurance organization under the name of the Arab Insurance Group with great amazement.

The source of the amazement was the immensity of the group's authorized capital, which was $3 billion, representing 20 times the amount of insurance shares in the New York insurance exchange and more than six times the shares of the international Lloyd's organization which is more than 300 years old.

At that time, circles in international insurance organizations raised questions on the degree of seriousness of the people who were planning to establish the group, especially since they were doing so at a time when the market was suffering from recession and a price war.

However, when the group started its forward progress, international insurance organizations came to sense the seriousness of the project, and the group, as western sources said at the inauguration celebration, proved that it was more advanced than the international bodies had expected and that it could challenge the most massive international insurance groups because of its immense financial resources.

AL-BAYAN's participation in the inaugural ceremony displays gave it an opportunity to get close to the manner of thinking of the people who established the group and its officials in order to observe its procedures, projects and goals.

Fawzi Musa'id al-Salih, chairman of the board of the group, concentrated on three points:

First, the group is established on purely economic foundations and has no political goals among its objectives, nor will it receive any political support, although its founders consist of three governments.

If a country leaves the group, its stock will be offered for sale in accordance with the recognized rules of the market.

The second point is that the group will begin its activity in a relaxed atmosphere, in the sense that it will not rush after markets in search of rapid profits, but will enter a market only after thorough study and after guaranteeing that its expertise on that market is complete and the ingredients for success are assured. Sources among the delegations said that this policy is supported by the group's massive capital, which gives it strong financing powers and financial stability for a long period.

An International Body

The third point the group's board chairman stressed is that in spite of the group's Arab nationality it will operate in international markets as an international insurance organization according to economic criteria without preferring one market over another.

Fawzi Musa'id al-Salih did not ignore the importance of the Arab and Gulf insurance market. He said that in the projects and investments in the area the volume of risk requiring insurance came to about $20 billion. Although the group chairman pointed out that 80 percent of its activities in the past 2 months since it started its activities came from outside the Middle East, Western insurance company sources have pointed out that the group is situated in the most rapidly growing insurance market in the world.

The Arab insurance market began to develop following the oil price increases in the early seventies. Estimates indicate an average increase in insurance instalment income of 20 percent a year between 1975 and 1978.

Doubling of Activity

The group chairman also pointed out that the volume of the activity since the group started its work last 1 July exceeded expectations to the point where the anticipated volume of insurance instalments up to October 1982, which was $50 million, doubled to $100 million.

We Have Not Come out against Anyone!

Fawzi Musa'id al-Salih also emphasized that the group has not come out against anyone. Its desire to establish a truce with the international groups in the initial period has been apparent, and it was apparent to AL-BAYAN, when he said "We do not want to provoke anyone now, until we get beyond the starting period. The market has room for everyone."

This desire was also apparent as regards the group's position on the fact that Lloyd's recently raised the war risk insurance rates in the region. He said, "We can help in this area by reaching understanding with the international firms. Naturally our presence in the region will help establish a kind of confidence among them concerning the circumstances and conditions in the region.

Why 3 Billion?

But why the sum of 3 billion in capital? 'Abd-al-Latif Kanafani, a major official in the group and its official spokesman, said, in a meeting with AL-BAYAN, "We all know that reinsurance activities are concentrated on trust, in the sense that many companies begin their early years in this field just to get the confidence of agents, and, because the process takes years, we need great financial resources in order to achieve fiscal stability. In addition, its immense capital creates the requisite trust because it means that the group will be able to bear massive risks, even if losses occur.

"It is true that the paid up capital so far totals $150 million out of a total of $3 billion in authorized capital, but this sum is now adequate to cover the company's activities. As soon as the need to increase the capital paid in is felt, the subscribers will be called upon to increase their shares."

Concentration on Reinsurance

The group will concentrate its activities on reinsurance processes. Its board chairman says that also among its objectives is to help developing countries acquire sound expertise and understanding in the insurance field.

For this purpose, a site of 10,000 square meters has been set aside to establish the Arab Insurance Institute in the al-Hawrah area of Bahrain.

He added that the group is concerned with preserving its Arab personality and giving people from the Arab countries an opportunity to develop their abilities and qualifications in this area. A number of Arab delegates have actually been sent to insurance colleges and institutes throughout the world and there will soon be an expansion in this program whereby the group will offer 40 study grants a year.

Why Bahrain?

Why the choice of Bahrain as a center for the pursuit of the group's activities?

'Abd-al-Latif Musa'id al-Salih said that in addition to the commercial renown Bahrain has enjoyed since ancient times, it has succeeded in consolidating its position on grounds that it is an international financial center where all the necessary facilities and means for effectively pursuing commercial and banking activity are available.

Political Events

He answered a question on the effect the political events in the region, especially the Iraq-Iran war, had on the group's activities by saying, "As long as we have a telex and means of communication, nothing will obstruct us."

Other questions remain on the activity of the group through which, with the official announcement of its inauguration, the Arab world is entering the world of international insurance; those we will leave to the next instalment.

/24 Oct 81 p 3/

/Text/ Although the official inauguration of the Arab Insurance Group in Bahrain last week is to be considered a major Arab economic event in every sense of the word, the group's officials insist that the group is not just a new addition to existing Arab economic organizations--it is a massive addition to the world insurance market.

Fawzi Musa'id al-Salih, chairman of the group, insisted, in the first segment of this report, on imparting this character to the group, stressing that it would not discriminate between one group or another in its dealings.

This casts great challenges and burdens on the group in the initial period of its activity, especially since it is occurring in circumstances of intense competition among international groups, some of which have existed for 300 years, and a state of recession in the market.

Fawzi Musa'id al-Salih stressed "The group realizes that it is venturing on its activities at a time when there is surplus insurance capability in the market, although it is certain that the insurance world will benefit from the reliable resources the group will provide for reinsuring increasing risks of a complex nature that are expected to become ordinary and familiar in the last two decades of the 20th century.

"In addition to the increased risks and responsibilities derived from oil production in offshore areas and from the field of aviation, there now are dangers of greater scope that the insurance companies are covering, in new fields such as satellites and space exploration.

We Will Not Outstrip Our Expertise

"The group is determined to develop itself rapidly in order to become one of the greatest insurance organizations in the world, insuring various types of risks; however, we will always be concerned to carry out our activities in a context where we have expertise and will not fail to penetrate new markets and fields when our expertise permits us to do so."

He said, "At the outset, the group will engage in reinsurance activities only, but it is determined to enter the insurance market directly when it acquires an adequate amount of expertise, and we will always be anxious to avoid outstripping the expertise we have acquired."

Circumstances of the Market

Two points in the group chairman's conversation are noteworthy: emphasis on knowing the circumstances of the market at present and an emphasis on not outstripping expertise.

The circumstances of the market, as statistics show, reveal that this century has witnessed great change and expansion in supply in the field of insurance. At the start of the 19th century, there were only 30 insurance companies, 14 of which were British, while there are now more than 10,000 groups of international insurance companies, in addition to their branches, which come to 30,000.

At the start of the seventies, there were about 196 groups specializing in reinsurance; the number by 1979 had risen to 240.

Surplus

In spite of the presence of surplus insurance capacity in the world, insurance organizations have been compelled to reduce installment prices to the lowest possible degree, although these instalments consist of a percentage of the value insured. These organizations have proceeded to rely on high interest rates to enable themselves to cope with insurance requirements and realize profits.

Expertise in this area is also needed because the insurance industry has come to depend on very high information-gathering and analyzing technology and on determining the degree of risk and ascertaining the nature of the market before embarking on it, lest its losses be exorbitant.

An 18-Month Program

But how will the group cope with all this?

'Abd-al-Latif Kanafani, a group official and its official spokesman, said "The group has a plan for an 18-month program for entering world markets. This includes travel and contact with international companies, since this type of work requires personal meetings.

"Also in the context of this program, numerous representatives' offices will be opened in the United States, Western European capitals and important financial capitals so that we will be close to the markets."

'Abd-al-Latif Kanafani went on, "We will concentrate on reinsurance. Of course we are aware of the circumstances of the competition, but this is a healthy climate. In accordance with the directives of the board chairman, we will be working in a relaxed atmosphere so that we can acquire expertise, and we are not rushing our affairs. Of course, we started out with a goal, but what I mean is that we will not be rushing our affairs lest we go into markets on which we do not have adequate information.

Two Types of Investment

"What about the group's investment policy?

"There are two types of investment we are intending to carry out. The first is long-term investment, which involves training the human element; this will benefit Arab companies and insurance sectors in the developing countries.

"The second area is short-term investment. In this field, we will concentrate on investing the surplus of our operations in high-level investment activities in the international market, so that these can be shifted immediately into liquid capital anytime we want if we need it.

"Will the group engage in activities of investing in projects?

"We are not an investment company, and, as I have pointed out, we will resort to types of investment that will not freeze our funds, in the sense that we will be able to acquire liquidity at any time."

Faruq Kawija, a technical director of the group, stated that the group would engage in contractual and optional reinsurance activities.

The first type is one in which more than one body takes part by virtue of agreements; the second takes place optionally.

With regard to recourse to middlemen, he stressed that the group would resort to them as every international group does, since they are of course important.

Why the Group Now?

But why was the Arab Insurance Group established at this time?

'Abd-al-Wahhab /sic/ Kanafani picked up the thread of the conversation, stating that in 1979 the feeling of the importance of establishing this sort of group in the Arab area arose; after the economic organizations in the area had evolved, it was necessary in turn that a group be established that could engage in reinsurance activity.

On the policy of employment in the group, he pointed out that there would be about 100 employees in the group at the end of the year.

Maximum Limits

As regards the existence of maximum limits on reinsurance activities the group carries out, Faruq Kawija said that those came to about $25 million per operation and that they varied according to the nature of each operation. That does not mean that the group does not agree to operations involving higher figures; that depends, rather, on the operation itself.

After ascertaining the ideas of group officials, it remains for us to learn the reactions of Arab and Western insurance sources.

At the press conference held during the celebrations, an Arab journalist expressed a wise observation, asking whether the group would pursue the same methods as international groups in collecting information, which in some cases depend on intelligence agencies.

That reflects the extent of the effort and the means the international groups resort to in collecting their information.

'Abd-al-Latif Kanafani asserted that the group would pursue the most modern methods of gathering economic analyses and data by legitimate means, in accordance with recognized rules.

A Show of Force

The Western reactions were characterized by receptivity mixed with a certain show of force. Peter Green, head of the British Lloyd's group, said that Lloyd's welcomed the Arab Insurance Group as a new force in the world of insurance and welcomed cooperation with it in the field of training its staffs. He added that he welcomed the statement by the group's head that it would not outstrip its own expertise and go into international markets without sufficient experience.

Lionel G Jones, chairman of the Panatlantic Insurance Group and chairman of the federation of members of the New York exchange, said that the group had great opportunities, with its massive capital, but that capital was not everything.

This all shows the extent of the competition and the challenges the group is expected to face at the start of its activity.

However, in conclusion, it is necessary to record the group's enthusiastic policy, which it intends to carry out in the first years of its activity, in the objective of forming a serious basis for its transactions.

We must not expect enormous activities from it at the beginning, since it is not expected immediately to dominate a major share of market transactions; rather, the group intends to let its transactions evolve as it acquires the necessary expertise.

ROME MEETING HELD TO SUPPORT PALESTINIAN WRITERS

Tripoli AL-FAJR AL-JADID in Arabic 9 Oct 81 p 2

[Article: "International Conference for Solidarity with Palestinian Journalists and Writers Inaugurated"]

[Text] The International Conference for Solidarity with Arab Writers and Journalists was inaugurated last Wednesday morning in Rome, the capital of Italy. The conference was made possible with the cooperation of the Arab-Italian Friendship Society.

After a statement by (Ivuli), the president of the Arab-Italian Friendship Society, welcoming and thanking those attending the conference, the conference began its agenda with a speech by the president of the Arab Journalists' Union, Sa'd Qasim Hamadi. Mr Hamadi emphasized at the outset of his speech that the Arabs got rid of al-Sadat who had sacrificed the dignity of the Arab nation and made it possible for world imperialism to persecute the Palestinians.

Hamadi added, "We are beginning the agenda of our conference with the dawn of a new age after the death of al-Sadat. We are meeting here to affirm our support and our solidarity with the Palestinian people so they can live in freedom. [We are meeting here in the hope] that the dawn of freedom may shine on the holy land and bring with it a just peace."

Hamadi added, "Arab writers and journalists have resolved to complete their course in this direction, keeping their hands on their weapons so they can defend their dignity and have a country. We are affirming that Palestine belongs to the Palestinians, and we are assuring the Palestinians who lost their lives in battle that their blood will embrace the new civilization, a civilization of equality and coexistence among nations."

Hamadi concluded his speech by saying, "We are holding our conference at a time when conspiracies against the Palestinian people and the Arab nation are increasing." He was referring in this regard to the recent raid on the Iraqi nuclear reactor. He affirmed that Zionism did not want the Arab nation to achieve progress in any area, and he called upon the conference to assemble all the capabilities of journalists in the world in order to contribute to the liberation of Palestine.

After that Yasir 'Abd-Rabbih, PLO information official spoke. On behalf of the PLO he thanked those attending the conference for attending the conference and participating in it, and he said, "The importance of the conference stems from the fact that it contributes to the escalation of our struggle against Zionism which is trying by all means to reinforce its occupation of the occupied land at the expense of the Palestinians. Zionism is always trying to destroy Palestinian culture and the Palestinian identity."

'Abd-Rabbih added, "Since the 1967 war Zionism has been trying to confirm its occupation of Palestinian territory just as it has also been trying to persecute those with a Palestinian identity in Palestinian territory.

"The Israelis, according to their plans for the next 10 years, are trying to wear down the Palestinian identity and are using all means to do so." He referred to the siege and the imprisonment which Zionism has been practicing against the Palestinian press and Palestinian journalists, and he also referred to the fact that the Israelis were shelling Palestinian schools for the purpose of destroying Palestinian culture.

After that Juliano Silrestri member of the Italian parliament and president of the Arab-Italian Friendship Society spoke. In his speech he insisted on the solidarity between the Friendship Society and the Palestinian people, the Palestinian writers and Palestinian journalists. He emphasized that [the latter] were struggling against all kinds of persecution to live in dignity and for freedom.

Lebanon's minister of information and tourism, Marwan Hamadah spoke. He said, "European public opinion is no longer ignorant as it was in the past of the dimensions of the Palestinian tragedy, since Israelis are still practicing their expansionist policy against any Palestinian presence, even in the area of Palestinian writers and journalists."

Marwan Hamadah added, "Zionism intends to obliterate Palestinian presence." He said, "The fact that Israelis have not been able to achieve this is due to Palestinian journalists and writers who were able to uncover these plans."

Marwan Hamadah concluded his speech by saying that the Lebanese were declaring their solidarity with the Palestinians. "The blood of Palestinians killed in action is mixed with the blood of Lebanese citizens who lost their lives for the sacred cause of Palestine, which has become an inseparable part of our history."

Brother Yasir 'Arafat sent a cable to the conference on behalf of the PLO. He thanked those attending the conference for participating in it, and he assured them that the Palestinian Revolution would continue on its course to liberate Palestine. [He assured them that the Palestinian Revolution] will fight Zionism and imperialism and that it will escalate the struggle especially against the recent strategic alliance between the United States and the Zionists.

MAGAZINE PROVIDES ILLUSTRATED NARRATIVE OF NEW PRESIDENT'S CAREER

Cairo AL-MUSAWWAR in Arabic 16 Oct 81 pp 75-81

/Article: "Husni Mubarak: A Personal Portrait"/

/Excerpt] Here is the man.

And here are his methods--a military man who reached his civilian positions through personal ability alone. There was nobody with influence in the family he was descended from.

Because he is a pilot, he does not know how to stop in one place and it is impossible for him to turn back. The man had 14 classes of pilot cadets graduate under his supervision.

The important lesson he has learned in the 53 years of his life is that truth is the shortest way to human happiness and that the straight path is the shortest distance between any two points in the world today.

Everyone has his distinguishing features. This man's features are a strong personality, a clear, well-organized mind and an ability to immerse himself in his work. He is realistic, logical, cool-headed, organized and precise in his appointments to the degree that people set the clocks by him in the Air College. The man's experience is broad. By the end of October 1980 he had made 25 trips abroad in which he made 120 visits to 40 countries. Some of them he visited more than once on serious, delicate missions. The longest trip took 3 weeks, in which he visited North Korea, the People's Republic of China and America. The biggest and most trying of his trips was when he visited 17 countries in just 15 days.

Let us start his life's story from the beginning.

In a Village in the Egyptian Countryside

Kafr al-Musaylihah is a small village near the town of Shabin al-Kawm, the capital of al-Minufiyah; just 1 kilometer used to separate it from the town. Now Kafr al-Musaylihah is part of the town, a small district in it with an area of 550 feddans, its population totalling 10,000. Its most important feature is the high rate of education on the one hand, and the fact that its streets are almost straight, not like the streets in other villages of the Egyptian countryside. The high rate of education in that village prompted many of its people, among them 'Abd-al-'Aziz Fahmi and 15 professors who are in Egyptian universities now, to go out into the world and play many important roles. This current academic year 150 students from the village are studying in universities. The village has produced 10 counsellors. It used to be a village in al-Minufiyah, then a decree was issued making it a section of the town of Shabin al-Kawm.

Kafr al-Musaylihah has three schools, two primary and one preparatory, and a health unit. By its own efforts, a religious institute was built in the village where English is taught. In the village there are a young persons' club, group consumer cooperative society, and an electric plant which supplies four other villages. The odd thing is that there is not a single coffee-house in the village. There are five mosques in the village, including the Mosque of 'Abd-al-'Aziz Fahmi, which is of historic value. Out of the five mosques, one that belongs to the Ministry of religious Endowments and the rest are private. Very few inhabitants of the village are engaged in farming; education and white collar work are more important than farming in the opinion of inhabitants of the village.

Kafr al-Musaylihah was the stage that witnessed Husni Mubarak's arrival in this world.

That Day in May 1928

The day was 4 May 1928. Muhammad Husni was born then. His father was Mr al-Sayyid Ibrahim Mubarak. His family went back to Sidi Mubarak, founder of the well-known mausoleum in Zawiyat al-Bahr in the Governorate of al-Buhayrah, which visitors from all areas go to to bless. People also state that Sidi Mubarak was a disciple of the holy man Sidi Ahmad al-Badawi, who is buried in his mausoleum in Tanta.

For more than 300 years, the family moved back and forth, going to its town, al-Musaylihah in the District of Shabin al-Kawm, then leaving the town with some inhabitants of al-Musaylihah about 200 years ago and settling on the banks of the Lake of al-Shabin, which is the place that is now known by the name of the village of Kafr al-Musaylihah. Among those who left al-Musaylihah and settled in the village was Husni Mubarak's great grandfather. Kafr al-Musaylihah is known among the people of al-Musaylihah as Kafr Paris, because the illiteracy rate there is absolutely nonexistent; there is not a single illiterate person in it. Husni Mubarak's father worked as an official in the Tanta court before the court of Shabin al-Kawm was established. Because he was a government employee, he lived in al-Quwaysina for a period of time, up to 1936, then was transferred to Ashmun, and finally Shabin al-Kawm harbor. The man was transferred to retirement in June 1960. At the time he was transferred to retirement, his job was inspector in the Ministry of Justice. He passed away in the year of his retirement.

His father was an only child who had no brothers. Nonetheless, he sired five children, four boys and a girl. The children were Samiyah, Sami, Husni, Fawzi and 'Isam. 'Isam is now working in a bank. Sami returned to Egypt after an absence abroad that lasted 25 years and is self-employed. Samiyah is married to an agricultural engineer, al-Sayyid 'Izb, in the agricultural department in Takh, and lives in the town of Tukh in the Governorate of al-Qalyubiyah.

Childhood is the first source of one's credentials; it leaves its marks on a man's personality throughout his entire life. Husni Mubarak joined the Kafr al-Musaylihah elementary school, then the al-Masa'i /al-Mashkurah/ secondary school in Shabin al-Kawm. Since the family was living in Kafr al-Musaylihah, the secondary school was in Shabin al-Kawm, the distance between the village and the town was 1.5 kilometers, and the child was from a middle class family, the only solution was for him to go from the village to the town every day--a trip made once in the morning and once again in the afternoon every day for the sake of the quest of knowledge.

The Love of Flying in God's High Skies

In November 1947, the world was opening its eyes, the post-World War Two world was coming into being, and the young man Husni Mubarak joined the War College, saying goodbye to life in the village and the small town and to the trip from the village to the town and back again every day. He set out for the War College. Those who had lived with him when he was a child in the village say that he was a serious child, a youngster who absorbed all the subjects of our world with a certain degree of seriousness. It appears that the trip every day from Kafr al-Musaylihah and the return had engendered in him the power to endure, a feeling for the rough life, reverence for work, and self-reliance, all of which are characteristics that qualify the person who possesses them to turn toward military studies specifically. Husni Mubarak graduated in February 1949 with the rank of second lieutenant. His life's journey could have taken him at that point on a conventional path--second lieutenant, then an ordinary officer in the armed forces, advancing in rank and ordinary grades. However, it is certain that some side events in a person's life are influential and have an effect not just in forming the present but also in setting out the shape of tomorrow as well and determining the features of the distant future. What happened is that while Husni Mubarak was taking examinations to graduate in the War College, he applied for admission to the Air College and actually took physical and medical fitness tests, then was admitted to this faculty, from which he graduated in March 1950.

Military aviation has a history in Egypt. The history goes back to the formation of the first Egyptian squadron on 2 November 1932. That is Aviation Day in Egypt.

He graduated as a combat pilot from the Air Faculty.

How expansive That World Seems

Up to the moment of graduation from the Air College, the scope in which he moved about was limited. However, graduation delivered him to a wide, hospitable, expansive world. He discovered that it was a world without other limits as well. In the period in which he was functioning in the world as a pilot, a fighter in the Egyptian armed forces, his journey to discover the world took place on two bases, the first, study fellowships to study, understand and absorb, and the second, military excursions, primarily to carry out military missions. The former was in the direction of the Soviet Union and the latter was in the direction of Asia, then fraternal Arab countries. Since this type of excursion took place at an early stage of his life, it left clear marks on his consciousness later. Let us start with the trips on study fellowships, which were to the Soviet Union. On the first fellowship he acquired training in Ilyushin-28 bombers and worked in a bomber squadron. Then he assumed the command of a bomber squadron. On the second and third tours he studied heavy bombers and engaged in higher studies in the Frunze Academy. He acquired a War Staff certificate, then after that traveled twice to the Soviet Union in 1972, once with President Anwar al-Sadat. He stayed for a while there after his return to complete the military side of the discussions. Once again he traveled on a mission to negotiate military matters and issues between the two countries. Of these trips, he says:

"I engaged in my studies there and was not involved in anything else except studies. I went from the training academy to my place of residence, and from the residence to the training academy--that was all. Most of my dealings were with the Egyptians in our embassy and I had no other contacts. That was the case when I was in Moscow, and it also was the case when I was in the Frunze Academy."

The other missions during the period of military activity were to Arab countries. He took part in the war in Yemen, went to Iraq, traveled to the Sudan and took part himself in the military activity that occurred to save the revolution in the Sudan.

After that he traveled to many countries in the world, once he had become a public personality whom everyone was closely watching. However, the basic advantage to these early excursions was that he saw the world himself, through his own circumstances, and that all these trips were for a goal which was close to the heart and agreeable to the spirit. The features of these excursions were simple. The things people do in the early years of their lives are not forgotten; their tastes and flavors remain forever in one's life, and the faces of the ordinary people that one meets in the simplicity of those days of remoteness from fame and public roles remain vivid in one's memory, living, moving, interacting, coming and going. In all the following years, forgetfulness fails to obliterate the features of these vital, pulsating memories, though it is true that he traveled to many countries in the world after that, met the leaders and rulers of the world of today, and dealt with them from close at hand.

Half a Lifetime with Comrades in Arms

Husni Mubarak spent 26 years of his life under arms. If we add another 6 months to those, that would make exactly half of his lifetime now. He has spent half a lifetime, with all its moments, seconds, minutes and days, as a fighter pilot far removed from the luxury and softness of civilian life in a wholly rough, decisive military atmosphere. In this atmosphere the pages of his military file also seem filled with missions. He was chosen to work as an instructor in the Air College, then assumed a position in the War College staff and became the assistant head of instructors there, and, following his return to Egypt from his first study mission, took over the command of the Cairo West base. He was selected to teach aviation in the Air College while he held the rank of captain, although instructions stipulate that an officer of the rank of lieutenant colonel must do this job; he performed this job in view of his competence and his ability, the discrepancy in rank notwithstanding. In November 1967 he took over the position of director of the Air College and was appointed chief of staff of the air force on 23 June 1969. He continued to occupy this position until President al-Sadat's decree was issued on 23 April 1972 appointing him commander of the air force, and on 29 May 1972 a decree was issued appointing Maj Gen Husni Mubarak deputy minister of war in addition to his job as commander general of the air force. In February 1974 he was promoted to the rank of lieutenant general and on 15 April 1975 he was appointed vice president and started a new chapter in the story of his life, in which he would play a completely new role on his country's political stage.

He had met President al-Sadat twice. The first occasion was in the distant past, before the revolution, in al-'Arish. The second meeting laid fertile ground for a real acquaintance between them. That was in the Island of Aba in the Sudan, during the problem the island faced. The meetings became numerous and repeated themselves often after that during the period of preparation for the October war. Husni Mubarak was one of a group of senior commanders who were close to President al-Sadat in those decisive days before, during and after the October War. The minutes of the meetings held to prepare for the October war bear witness to the role Husni Mubarak played in that war.

Of this period, his comrades in arms say:

Husni Mubarak was always the talk of his service and the talk of the people who knew him. They saw him living with his command every hour of the day and night. He did not sleep one night at home for a period of 3 months after the fighting ended. The men in his service were accustomed to "setting" their watch by the approach of his car to the entrance to his command. He would enter this door every day before the war in the morning at 0745 hours and he knew the names of all the men in the service. Indeed, he knew them personally. He memorized their children's names and ages. He is decisive and firm, but he also is an excellent friend who opens his heart to every pilot in his service and tries to solve their problems with them. He shone as a pilot after each war we entered. He flew for 6 whole hours and returned after the fighting to the airfield, waited until the plane was resupplied with bombs and fuel, then resumed flying. He was an excellent instructor in the Air College, then a brilliant commander in the college, playing squash during the lunch hour to keep up his physical fitness. He is always anxious to keep his information fresh, reads a lot and talks little. His interests in reading are many. He reads about all periods of Egyptian history.

From the June Defeat to the October Awakening

In 1967 Israel managed to give the Egyptian air force a blow which dealt it many heavy losses. However, what happened is that the June war turned into a point of departure for the construction of the modern Egyptian air force and when the 6 October 1973 war came,the Egyptian people's memory became a treasury full of heroes and rare stories of self-sacrifice. On the role the air played in this war, Husni Mubarak says,

"On 6 October 1973 we made the main air strike with a very large number of airplanes. That was at zero hour. In that concentrated strike we smashed the enemy's air strips, command centers, jamming centers and missile sites.

"We skirmished with the enemy in seven very violent battles in the first 6 days of the war. One of the battles lasted 50 minutes--normally air battles do not take more than 10 or 15 minutes. Our air sorties to help the armies and strike at the enemy's reserves came to 2,500 in 7 days.

"The Egyptian pilots achieved records for takeoffs with fighters. They smashed the previous figures, when takeoffs would take place between 2.5 and 3 minutes."

Giving the other side of the picture, an Israeli armor officer described the results of the aerial bombing of his formation by Egyptian fighters to us, stating "Bombs rained down from every direction, and I heard our soldiers' voices crying 'they are Egyptian planes!' At that point I jumped out of my armored vehicle in a state of near dizziness and at the same time the first bombs from the Egyptian airplanes were falling here and there to the ground. I felt a severe inflammation in every part of my body and rushed headlong toward the /Canal/ bank. I saw four MiG aircraft swooping down over our heads and immediately observed bombs falling and missiles pouring down on the site. When I got to the bank I saw that it was a slaughter."

It is certain that the splendid performance the air force displayed in the war of liberation had the major influence in the advent of Husni Mubarak to the realm of political activity after that. He won the confidence of the president in the October struggle, and at the same time won the confidence and respect of all.

In September 1976 it was declared that Husni Mubarak was busy writing his memoirs on the role of Egyptian aviation in the October war. These memoirs dealt with the harsh continuous preparations to train pilots, the re-establishment of the system of airports after June 1967 and the operations that the aviation performed during the war of attrition. In these memoirs, he recites the details of the first air strike in October. These memoirs, which have not yet been published, come to 500 full pages.

Close Friends and Relatives Talk about Him

Let us leave the public role and try to get close to ordinary people. This time we will approach him through the ordinary people who have met him and who have had contact, closeness and encounters with him in periods of his life. The voices and memories of other people reconstruct the life of the man as it seems to the eyes of these others.

He is now head of a family. His children are 'Ala', a university student, and Jamal, a student in the secondary stage. The comrade of his life, Mme Suzanne, is from a family in al-Minya. She was born in the village of Matay in the Governorate of al-Minya in Upper Egypt. Her father is Dr Salih Thabit, a doctor, and she has one brother. She married after acquiring a general secondary certificate from the English School in Heliopolis. At the outset she devoted herself entirely to her family life, and bore 'Ala' and Jamal. After that she studied in the department of sociology at the American University and carried out many studies on the social situation in Egypt. She did a field study on family planning problems in the village of Matay in al-Minya Governorate. Her research for the university degree was on the environmental circumstances of children in Bulaq, an ordinary section of Cairo, and the social services that could be provided for them. She received a degree with distinction for this research and is now doing higher studies at the American University in Cairo.

Let us start the journey with the voices of others concerning him.

'Abd-al-Majid 'Atiyah, an Arabic language teacher who taught the student Husni Mubarak at the al-Masa'i secondary school in Shabin al-Kawm, says, "He was distinct from his other colleagues in class in that he did his work quietly. It was his proclivity for sports that caused him subsequently to turn to military life." The Arabic language teacher says that Husni Mubarak's father, may God have mercy on him, asked him to persuade Husni, after he received the diploma from secondary school, to go to the teachers' college to become a teacher. The teacher tried, but Husni insisted on going to the War College, and all efforts to persuade him to go to teacher's college failed. His insistence on going to the War College was out of the ordinary, and his father respected his insistence.

Let us leave the teacher and approach his colleagues in studies and the camaradie of the studies. He engendered a certain amount of human warmth in his relationships. Muhammad Hathut, a colleague of Husni Mubaraks' in his studies who now works as the director of the office of the deputy minister of education in the Governorate of al-Minufiyah, says that the start of their friendship was when Muhammad Ja'far, the instructor of the Arabic language in the school at that time, died: "That teacher was from the village of Kafr al-Musaylihah, and in spite of his youth Husni stayed with me the whole day until we offered condolences to the teacher's family."

Muhammad Hathut says, "Husni Mubarak was known among his colleagues for his intense commitment, in addition to his great excellence in Arabic language and history. He was an athlete and played some sports like field hockey, squash and ping pong. He was captain of the hockey team in high school."

Among the happy memories of youth, it is related of the student Husni Mubarak that he formed a financial cooperative group with his colleagues. Everyone would pay 5 piasters a month and every contributor would receive it in turn. This was a type of cooperation to help poor colleagues buy what they needed.

Eng Hasan, Husni Mubarak's first cousin, says of him that he was devoted to his family and to the people of his village. He visits this village on many religious occasions, holidays and national days. He is said to have an enormous capacity for work. He can work 20 out of 24 hours. Athletics constitute an important part of his everyday attention and he cannot spend a day without engaging in sports.

Political Interests Came Early

Eng Sulayman Faraj Sulayman says "Husni Mubarak had an interest in politics very early. He was a member of the political committee in the school and had an intense interest in the events taking place in the country." He was with him in the al-Masa'i al-Mashkurah School in the period 1942-1947, and, although he was not more than 14, he was the safety valve in that committee.

He says that he did not feel any surprise when Husni Mubarak chose the War College. All preparations had led to that. A young person who is described as being extremely precise about appointments and very punctilious in his conduct is bound to enroll in the War College.

The mother of Hajj Muhammad 'Ali al-Sayyid 'Abdallah, vice principal of the secondary girls' school in Shabin al-Kawm, was Husni Mubarak's father's first cousin. Of him, he says "I was his colleague in the school days. His most important characteristic was his devotion to principles, his adherence to those principles, and his refusal to deviate from them." He says that one of his earliest characteristics was his refusal to be deferential, even to the people closest to him. He relates a specific incident about that: "I had a brother who acquired a bachelor's degree in social services and was a soldier in the army," he said. "He was in Suez. I went to Husni Mubarak and asked him to have him transferred to someplace pleasant in the country. However, he refused and told me, 'He must be treated just like every other draftee in the army.'"

Muhammad Musa Mubarak, his father's first cousin, relates a story about him, saying "He entered primary school at age 8. He stood out among the people in the town for his tranquility, silence, and diligence and firmness in dealing with things. When he came home from school he would greet the men. He was good at listening to older people in the family. He spoke only if asked to. He wore gowns like all the children in the village and often went to the 'Abd-al-'Aziz Mosque, where he performed all prayers on time."

Musa Mubarak says that the family offered two martyrs in the October war, Rabi' Muhammad Mubarak and Sa'id Ahmed Mubarak, who received the military badge of the republic.

The Children of Kafr al-Musaylihah and the Planes in the Air

It is a spectacle that is repeated often in Kafr al-Musaylihah, and one which has been occurring since Husni Mubarak graduated from the Air College and found work as a combat pilot. The children in that small village do not know the difference between fighter planes and civilian aircraft and do not know the distance between civilian and military aircraft, for they look with a rare degree of enthusiasm at every plane flying in the sky; airplanes sow dreams in people's spirits and draw a picture of a remote country where no one has traveled in people's minds.

Finally, one of the people of the village became a pilot, flying an airplane that drinks from the heart of the sky perfumed with the scent of eucalyptus and pierces the clouds that look like carded cotton. The children stand and, whenever an airplane passes by, the picture of Husni, the son of the village, leaps to mind; for this reason when they observe an airplane they point their little fingers to the sky and their little throats call out with the voices of pristine innocence; they say:

"Husni! Husni!"

They raise their voices and try to overcome the noise issuing from the plane. They try to have a link with the son of their village, who went forth from here one day, but it is certain that our children will grow up and that accurate knowledge of this world will take the place of childish amazement. They will know that the young man who was a pilot has now become Egypt's fourth president and the man responsible for leading the land, all that is in it and all the people on it.

VARIOUS ATTRIBUTES OF MUBARAK'S PERSONALITY DESCRIBED

Cairo AL-MUSAWWAR in Arabic 16 Oct 81 p 96

/Article by Mamduh Mihran: "Simplicity and Decisiveness: Two Aspects of the New President's Personality"/

/Text/ Many of his political characteristics have come to prominence through his experience in the National Democratic Party, clearly showing that he possesses mature political thinking and that he is good at listening to everything around him. He conducts discussions quietly and with deliberation. He gives others every opportunity to state their opinions, spreading an atmosphere of familiarity, affection and brotherliness about himself. Everyone engaged in activity with him in the National Democratic Party has managed to learn all these aspects that have been latent in Husni Mubarak and to cooperate with him on their basis. However, the most prominent features of Husni Mubarak's responsibility in the party, as all party leaders who have been in contact with him unanimously agree, are simplicity and decisiveness.

Al-Sadat chose Husni Mubarak not just to be vice president--when he selected him he also put him in the position of his successor, and declared as much from the first moment.

Therefore, President al-Sadat transcended the powers that the constitution directly gives the vice president, which are to take his place when he is absent, and proceeded to train and prepare him for this day.

Therefore Husni Mubarak enters his new responsibility today not from a void but from the standpoint of long experience which has been acquired over 6 long years in which the late president had him take part in every decision he adopted and every step he took.

President al-Sadat did not content himself just with training his vice president in the field of foreign political activity or the field of domestic political activity--he chose him, rather, to be with him when he decided to establish the National Democratic Party and made him vice chairman of the party, although there was no reason stipulating that the vice president had to be party vice chairman.

Al-Sadat's objective in this step was to have his vice president become immersed in political activity with the masses through the National Democratic Party, and he chose him as secretary general of the party and member of the political bureau.

In this period, Husni Mubarak himself took charge of daily activity in the party through his meetings with the secretariat general of the party, his almost daily meetings with the board committee of the secretariat general, and his meetings with the party secretaries in the governorates or the party's parliamentary committee which would often meet under his chairmanship to discuss various public issues and drafts of important laws.

The late President Anwar al-Sadat would hold a weekly meeting, the Thursday meeting, which would be attended by National Party leaders from various governorates, levels and institutions.

Husni Mubarak chaired most of these meetings when President al-Sadat was not able to attend them.

President al-Sadat gave him the opportunity to meet directly with the broad masses on various party levels, listen to them, talk to them and feel their pulse in order to grasp their aspirations and hopes and draw from them as a source for every decision and inspiration for every idea.

Husni Mubarak actually has made field trips to many governorates on the republic and has been in contact with all party leaders of various levels.

During the long voyage that Husni Mubarak has had with the National Democratic Party, these qualities which everyone who followed him from close at hand through his party work could sense without trouble or effort have come to prominence.

Daily Meetings

He opened his office in the party and was anxious to be there constantly, at the disposal of everyone who asked to meet with him--not just People's Assembly and Consultative Assembly members, members of the party's central command, ministers, or party leaders in the governorates, but also any citizen who wanted to meet the vice president with regard to any matter.

His frequent contact with the party leaders was his way of getting to know them all personally by name and the position, responsibility and role of each in addition. He often held them to account on the job. Wherever he met any of them he would ask him, "What have you done on such and such a matter" or "why have you fallen short in carrying out what so-and-so asked of you here regarding such-and-such?"

He did not forget his job directives that he would issue to various leaders. It happened more than once that he would issue directives at a meeting with some leaders and would understand that that was just talk, but the leader to whom the instruction was issued would be taken by surprise when he met him again and asked him "What happened with the subject I talked to you about when I met you at the meeting held on such-and-such an occasion?"

When he attended any of the meetings that were held under his supervision he would insist on shaking the hand of everyone in attendance, no matter how many there were, especially at the weekly meetings of the party, and on exchanging conversation with them one by one. Thus the leaders understood his nature and method and came to realize that no conversation he held with any leader was transitory--it was an instruction on something that had to be carried out or an observation on a matter that had to be corrected.

Simplicity Is a Basic Characteristic

Through his party activity, a basic characteristic of his, extreme simplicity, has become apparent. It would not be possible for you to realize that the person you were talking to was the vice president unless you knew that in advance, because barriers did not exist within him. If you knew him, and gave him the consideration he merited, the barriers within you would disappear as soon as you came in contact with him and you would find yourself speaking most easily and naturally, because his conduct would encourage you to do so.

Another characteristic that Husni Mubarak was known for through his contact with political leaders was decisiveness. His decisiveness and simplicity were two sides of the same coin.

He would never fail to do what was right, even with the people closest to him.

This characteristic of his became evident in the most recent nominations for membership in the current People's Assembly. There were persons whom important personalities supported against ordinary people who had nothing but the affection of the people in their districts, and he severely opposed that. We have /seen/ more than one example when he ignored the desire of a minister who was close to him in order to be fair to an ordinary citizen whom he did not know but who was in the right.

Alongside this characteristic was another one which stamped Husni Mubarak, and that is that he does not listen to anyone who talks against anyone else. When a specific official gets close to him to talk on any subject, he does not take decisions on any matter immediately--he demands that the other party involved in the matter attend first, and hears the two views at the same time before taking a decision on the matter.

He Does Not Interfere in Anyone's Areas of Competence

Another characteristic that has become prominent in Husni Mubarak's conduct is the fact that he does not interfere in anyone's areas of competence.

Some journalists, for example, have complained that he does not have them accompany him on his foreign trips, although they cover the news about him in their capacity as correspondents in the Office of the Presidency, backing themselves with the argument that every official himself chooses the press delegation that accompanies him from the people who work with him.

His comment on that was, "I do not want to have it said of me that I prefer anyone to anyone else, or that I am favoring anyone. You are all my sons; therefore I ask your papers to determine for me who the editor in chief considers responsible, and that will be between you and your papers."

At the same time, correspondents with the weekly papers made the complaint about him that he has just the daily papers accompany him, and not the weekly ones. To this, he has said, "You have a point. From now on I will have a representative of each press organization accompany me; would that satisfy you?" He actually did as he had promised.

In addition to the above, he is not happy to get involved in things where he has no business. When an issue would be presented to him for discussion at a meeting bearing on the activity of some minister or person concerned, he would refuse to comment and ask the person concerned to do the talking, saying "Everyone has his areas of competence and he must engage in those himself."

Some leaders often complain about some ministries, but will agree only to talk in the presence of the party concerned and therefore says "Let us delay this issue so we can discuss it in the presence of the person in charge of it." If the issue is an important one he will quickly set another appointment to discuss it in his office.

The Management of Meetings

During Husni Mubarak's work with the party, a very important characteristic of his became conspicuous, and that was his ability to manage the meetings whose chairmanship he assumed most democratically but with great discipline at the same time. He would give everyone who wanted to talk an opportunity to do so.

He repeated a phrase for which he was well known and one which the National Party deputies would bandy about: "Here we are going to sit down till the morning. We will not get out of here until you tell me 'Enough, we are exhausted.'" However, at the same time he would not allow discussions to wander far off the subject. Whenever someone who is talking drifts away from the subject of a discussion, he brings him back to it, telling him, "When we finish with this subject, then we can talk about another one."

During the sessions, he listens more than he talks. He possesses an exceptional ability to listen, does not interrupt speakers and does not obstruct /the free flow of/ opinions no matter what the circumstances.

He gives everyone the power to discuss their affairs. For example, if a matter related to some governorate comes up, he will ask the people of the governorate to sit down together first of all to discuss the matter among themselves. Then he will set a meeting for them so that they can inform him of what went on among themselves. He is very happy when they reach agreement among themselves but, if the situation requires a decision on his part, he will not hesitate, no matter what the circumstances, as long as it is the right decision.

In pursuing this practice, a strong quality of presence of mind and sagacity has become apparent. He is able to comprehend everything. More than once he would take a position, then would listen to the views of the person talking to him until the end, then would laugh and say "Is this issue really as you say or are you saying that because the issue is thus-and-such?" The person talking to him would be amazed that he was so "talkative," then would laugh and retreat from his position, after Husni Mubarak had told him, jokingly, "Get to the point."

He is well known for starting the day very early, at 0600 hours in the morning, and starting work at 0800 hours. He often sets appointments for official meetings or meetings with the people at that time. In fact, the Council of Ministers, which is accustomed generally not to start its sessions before 1000 hours, reverted on many occasions to holding the sessions he chaired before 0900 hours.

Although he begins his day at 0600 hours, his day continues until late at night.

These are the qualities that have become apparent through Husni Mubarak's recent experience. They have become apparent when he is at his ease with people, listening, talking, discussing and making decisions with an utter flexibility interspersed with decisiveness. No one who does not know that Husni Mubarak's personality has two sides, simplicity and decisiveness, can deal with him. He is as decisive as he is simple and does not accept shortcomings on the job or any unreasonable excuses for them.

His simplicity makes it easy to contact him and his decisiveness makes it easy for him to carry out his tasks. I believe that these are the characteristics of a successful statesman: to be simple with the masses and decisive with officials. That is his road to the hearts of his people, who have installed him as their president.

MUBARAK'S DIPLOMATIC, POLITICAL MISSIONS REVIEWED

Cairo AL-MUSAWWAR in Arabic No 2975, 16 Oct 81 pp 91, 95

/Article by Ahmad Abu Kaff: "Difficult, Delicate Missions on 30 Trips to 40 Countries"/

/Text/ In the 6 years since he was appointed vice president to the late Anwar al-Sadat, Husni Mubarak has truly been a man of difficult, delicate missions. He has made more than 30 trips to more than 40 countries in the world. On some of them he was a delegate of President al-Sadat's or carried letters for kings or presidents, and on most of them he conducted difficult negotiations that required persuasion through logic, sound argument and frankness.

Among his important trips was the one to the People's Republic of China, which had been passing through a serious turning point at that time after the Cultural Revolution and the death of its prime minister Zhou Enlai. He met with President Mao and his premier Hua Guofeng. It was a successful journey by every standard. He then visited China again after the changes in the Far East, the events in Iran and the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. The trip was more than successful.

Also in the Far East, Husni Mubarak made numerous trips to Arab countries, explaining, negotiating and tending to fine points. The same was true of his trips to the countries of Western Europe.

In addition to that, there were his historic trip to northwest Africa and his shuttle trips between Morocco and Algeria on the Sahara problem. While the problem was not radically resolved, Mubarak managed at the time to stop the fighting, which had threatened to erupt into a conflagration.

He spoke about his African trips.

Then about his trips to the United States of America.

These are some of the details and some light on a few of the vice president's trips:

Among Husni Mubarak's first trips was the one he made to Paris in June 1975 to meet with President D'Estaing and discuss the file on French-Egyptian relations as well as issues related to arms, so that France would resume dealing with Egypt. It was a successful trip by all standards.

With the Leader Mao Zedong

In April 1979 Mubarak made a grip to China. It took 8 days, and during it he visited Iran on his way out and back. It was a historic trip in which Mubarak was given a popular and official reception that had been unprecedented, in Beijing and Shanghai both.

Mabarak, through his organized thinking, managed to win the heart of the leader Mao to the point where, after he met him, in the presence of Hua Guofeng, who was the prime minister of China, Mao advised his premier to engage in sincere cooperation with Egypt.

China had emerged from the Cultural Revolution and the events in it.

Hua Guofeng was a strong personality, and the fruits of the trip emerged during the visit.

China actually did agree to provide Egypt with spare parts for MiG aircraft; after the Soviets had suspended shipments of spare parts, China manufactured the aircraft Hsin-7, which is equal to the MiG-17 and -19.

The fact is that Egypt's relations have been growing and becoming consolidated with each year since Husni Mubarak's visit to China, not just in the field of arms but also in the economic and cultural fields.

Husni Mubarak made another visit to China in 1979 in the course of a trip that included North Korea, the United States and West Germany. This trip stimulated bilateral relations between the two countries. It occurred after the changes that had occurred in Southeast Asia following the former Shah's departure from Iran and the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan. It was a trip that realized its objectives.

Africa Is One

In July 1976 Husni Mubarak made an important trip as head of Egypt's delegation to the 13th African summit conference. The incidents in southern Africa were escalating, a plan was needed to cope with the bloody events, and it was necessary to review the methods being followed to deal with the racist minority regime in South Africa, which was cooperating with Israel.

Mubarak became the star of the conference when he called for an escalation of action against the racist regime allied with Israel. He demanded that surveillance over the companies that were engaged in supplying South Africa with oil be intensified and asserted to the Africans that the Arabs were fully prepared to join hands in any resolutions the African countries arrived at.

Husni Mubarak also made another trip in the African contaxt in June 1981, heading Egypt's delegation to the African summit conference that was held in Nairobi and achieved a great success.

The Longest Trip

The late President Anwar al-Sadat made a trip to West Germany, France and the United States of America.

In the wake of al-Sadat's trip, Husni Mubarak, in April 1977, made a long trip to 17 Arab, African and European countries; that was the longest trip Husni Mubarak had made. He had a delicate mission, which was to explain the goal of al-Sadat's trip in that period; in spite of the announcements made about it at the time, al-Sadat's trip was not clear in the minds of many people, and the notion of establishing a Palestinian nation needed explanation.

In addition, Egypt was being charged with abandoning the main cause and had started facing numerous fronts in Africa that could have diverted it from resolving the Palestine cause. There were also rumors, spread about by al-Qadhdhafi that Egypt would intervene militarily in Libya, there was a rumor in Jordan that the establishment of the Palestinian nation would be at Jordan's expense and that the east bank of the Jordan would be annexed to it, and there were many rumors on the Geneva conference.

On this trip, Husni Mubarak met with Hafiz al-Asad, King Hussayn, Prince Fahd, Shaykh Sabah al-Salim al-Sabah, Saddam Husayn, the Shah of Iran, Shaykh 'Isa ibn Sulayman /sic/ Al Khalifah, Shaykh Zayid ibn Sultan, Shaykh Khalifah ibn Hamad Al Thani, President Numayri, King Hasan the Second, King Khalid (in London), President Doumediene, Tunisian President Habib Bourguiba, President D'Estaing, President Tito and President Ceausescu.

Husni Mubarak told these leaders, and convinced them, that al-Sadat's talks with President Carter constituted a great move forward on the road toward resolution of the issue and had made positive steps, most importantly the recognition of Palestinian rights and the Palestinian entity, a limit to blind support for Israel, and a response to the notion of secure borders.

Husni Mubarak held a conversation with the kings and president on the fact that Egypt was faced with a major issue, the issue of the Middle East, and that it did not intend to enter into side struggles, open new fronts or slip into the conflicts that were being devised for it, ignoring the main one.

He said, "It is al-Qadhdhafi who is the problem of the whole Arab world. No one trusts him or his word and his behavior is against the interests of the Arab world. A Palestinian state should be established on the west bank and Gaza and a passageway should link the two segments.

"The basis for resolving the Middle East issue is total Israeli withdrawal and establishment of a Palestinian state."

The fact is that Husni Mubarak managed to dispel the rumors. This was clear from the announcements the kings and presidents made at that time.

After meeting Mubarak Hafiz al-Asad said, "The Arabs have attained significant progress in America. For the first time the Arab view has become sought out in America and Arab opinions have been heard. That is something that had not happened previously."

King Husayn said that he agreed and that he supported having an independent Palestinian delegation attend the Geneva conference representing the Palestine Liberation Organization.

Prince Fahd said, "The discussions that are going on in the context of Arab solidarity to solve the Middle East problem indicate that what is going on is in the interests of the Arab nation, and Saudi Arabia is totally in agreement with Egypt's point of view."

In Kuwait, Shaykh Sabah al-Salim al-Sabah said that he blessed al-Sadat's steps.

Even Saddam Husayn said "We here in Baghdad hope that God will grant President al-Sadat success in attaining a comprehensive resolution to the problem of Palestine. Egypt is the heart of the Arab nation."

The Shah of Iran said that he believed that the time was suitable for Egypt to move to resolve the Middle East problem and that he supported Egypt's steps in this context.

In Qatar, the emirates and Bahrain, statements were released that supported what Egypt was doing on behalf of the cause.

King Khalid, who was being treated in London, told Husni Mubarak "I support all of Egypt's steps."

King Hasan the Second declared that President al-Sadat was following a wise policy and said, "I am on your side in peace, just as I was on your side in war."

President Boumediene said, "We support you. You are on the firing line and the Egyptian political approach is the one that has achieved all the progress, in war and in peace."

In Tunisia, Habib Bourguiba said that Tunisia was on Egypt's side in all its steps.

In France, Mubarak's discussions with D'Estaing dealt with the world's problems, and there was complete agreement of views on the need to solve all the problems in the Middle East and Africa.

In Yugoslavia, President Tito stated that his country would use all the diplomatic contacts it could so that a Palestinian nation could be established and the Middle East problem solved.

In Rumanian, Ceausescu declared total support for the establishment of a Palestinian nation and a solution to the Middle East issue.

With the Rulers of Africa

This trip, in September 1977, was without a doubt a hard one and required unusual strength. A plane would barely land in a country than it would take off again in a few hours.

The trip took 35 flying hours in the course of 10 days, in which Husni Mubarak visited 10 countries and met 10 presidents--Julius Nyerere, Samora Machel, Kenneth Kaunda, Jomo Kenyatta, Idi Amin, Ja'far Numayri, the late president of North Yemen Ibrahim al-Hamdi, Felix Malloum, Siad Barre, and the prime minister of Djibouti, Ahmad Dini (President Hassan Gouled was not in the country but in New York).

On this long, stimulating trip, the Middle East issue took a serious turn while the southern part of the continent--Rhodesia and South Africa--was in flames. Husni Mubarak skilfully blended the two issues and their premises with the African leaders Nyerere, Kaunda, and Jomo Kenyatta and managed to convince them that the United States held the cards to a solution of both issues, which imposed the responsibility on it of exerting more pressure on the Zionist regime in Israel and the racist regimes in southern Africa to arrive at a sound, just settlement in both regions. From this introduction, Husni Mubarak explicitly described the steps of Egyptian movement on the Middle East issue, and support and agreement was obtained from the leaders on the details, timing and importance of Egyptian movement.

In Zambia Husni Mubarak also made his great coup, visiting the border area between Zambia and Rhodesia. This visit had been placed on Husni Mubarak's program because it was known that the man was basically a soldier and had something to offer Zambia, which was in conflict with and sustaining raids from Rhodesia. Husni Mubarak was the first Egyptian official to go to this area and meet the Rhodesian national leader Joshua Nkomo in Lusaka. Husni Mubarak then went back to Lusaka and at a dinner party said that Africa was not for sale and that it must be for the Africans. The hall reverberated with applause and the following day the papers came out with a picture of Mubarak and the headline "Africa is not for sale" alongside it.

However, what happened in Moazmbique was delightful. In spite of the Soviet plots against Egypt at that time, Husni Mubarak visited Mozambique and met the head of the Frelimo Party (the Mozambique Liberation Front before independence), President Samora Machel, who is a marxist leader. Although it was an overnight visit, Husni Mubarak explained Egypt's actions to him and Samora Machel declared his agreement with Egypt's steps and actions for the sake of the cause, indeed said that he was happy with al-Sadat's wise policy and that the Geneva conference would have to have adequate preparation in order not to fail, and considered that the Geneva conference would of necessity be a good end for resolving the issue.

Machel said, "You are like us; the ultimate end of armed struggle is to compel the enemy to negotiate and realize national hopes at the end. We are in agreement with your policies."

As the views in Zambia favored Egypt's movements, so were views on the situation in the horn of Africa in agreement with the leader of Kenya, Jomo Kenyatta; it was necessary that matters be settled between Somalia and Ethiopia on Ogaden and that their problems be resolved in sound ways.

The discussions in Djibouti also dealt with the situation in the horn of Africa. Husni Mubarak promised them that he would send Egyptian experts in a number of fields, and the discussions dealt with the same problems in Somalia.

In Uganda, the discussions dealt with an explanation of what had taken place in Husni Mubarak's visit to the other African countries and ways for consolidating relations between Egypt and Uganda.

The discussions with President Numayri in Khartoum and with President Felix Malloum in Ndjamena, the capital of Chad, were aimed at consultation on the latest developments in the situation in the region.

It is true that this African trip was the first high-level one of its kind to these African countries, and it had big repercussions among the African leaders, who considered the visit tantamount to a practical translation of Cairo's support for African positions. It also made it possible for the Africans to gain an understanding of Egypt's movements and to support and back them.

Continuous Success in America
